INTRODUCTION.

THE history of the United States presents a marked contrast with that of the nations and countries of the old world. The latter, commencing in the shadowy traditions of remote ages, comes down from barbarism or semi-civilization, through the slow progress of many centuries. The former, commencing less than three centuries back, when the civilized world had just emerged from the "middle ages," and a new life was infused into its material, intellectual, and moral condition, comprises the period of man's greatest progress in each of these conditions, and exhibits the wonderful growth of a nation planted on a new soil, and under the new influences of the modern ages.

Previous to the settlement of the country by European colonists, the history of America, and especially of the part comprised within the limits of the United States, is a blank page, on which it is hardly possible to write even the most vague traditions. Within the tropics the inhabitants were more advanced towards civilization; and ruins found in those regions, and extending more or less to the north, indicated, according to the views of some, a still greater degree of civilization, in some previous age, on the part of a people who had been forced to yield to the fiercer barbarism of the north. But all that is known of the previous history of these people is from uncertain traditions, and the unreliable stories of the old Spanish writers who came over with the early expeditions to Mexico.

That any colony was established in this country by Northmen, or that the continent was discovered by them in the eleventh century, as is claimed by some Danish writers, is as uncertain as the traditions of the aborigines. It is said that they not only explored the Atlantic coast from Labrador to Carolina, but that they made a settlement in the southeastern part of New England, to which country they gave the name of Vinland; and the mysterious inscriptions on the "Dighton Rock," in Massachusetts, and even the old building at Newport, in Rhode Island, are considered by some as evidences of the presence and settlement of these early explorers. The whole story, however, rests on narratives obscure in meaning, which recite the exploits of old vikings, the heroes and demigods of northern mythology, and the location of these exploits is mere conjecture. But if the supposition were true, the adventurers could have formed only a temporary lodgment, all traces of which disappeared long before the actual settlement of the country, unless the inscriptions and structure alluded to are indeed the work of their hands.

At the time of the establishment of settlements by the Europeans, the whole country was a vast wilderness, for the most part covered with a dense forest, except where at the west it opened into the wide prairies, or still farther west, where the wild and desert plains extended to the mountain ranges, presenting the same appearance as now.

This vast extent of country was held, though scarcely occupied, by the Indian tribes, who were scattered over it very sparsely, and ranged the interminable forests in pursuit of the game which was sufficiently abundant to supply their wants. The greater part of the aborigines, comprising the largest and most powerful tribes, were east of the Mississippi. The entire number of these has been estimated to be between two and three hundred thousand. This number, to occupy so large a territory, it will be seen, is very small, and the country may well be considered to have been an unpeopled wilderness. A brief glance at these Indian tribes, as they existed at the period of the settlement of the various parts of the country, and as they came in contact with the white man, may not be inappropriate in this place, before the reader enters upon the history of events with many of which they were connected.

The various tribes so closely resembled each other in features, color, general appearance, and customs, that to the early settlers they seemed to be all of one family, notwithstanding there might have been some slight differences in the customs, dress, and minor characteristics of those living in different parts of the country. But the investigations of those who have made the aborigines a study have led to the grouping of the numerous tribes into eight great families, the whole or portions of each of which have been found east of the Mississippi.

The Algonquin was the largest of these families, and embraced a great number of tribes, including most of those connected with the history of the early settlers. It occupied nearly half of the territory east of the Mississippi, and extended even north of the St. Lawrence, and in numbers it probably exceeded all the other families combined. Among the tribes of this family were the Abenakis, the Pautuckets, the Massachusetts, the Pokanokets, the Narragansetts, the Pequots, and the Mohegans, of New England; the Manhattans of New York; the Lenni Lenape, or Delawares, the Susquehannas, and the Nanticokes of New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Maryland; the Powhattans of Virginia, and the Pamlicos of South Carolina; and west of the Alleghanies, the Ottawas, the Chippewas, the Miamis, the Illinois, and the Shawanoes. This list, however, comprises only a part of the tribes, many smaller ones being scattered about among the larger. The Lenni Lenape, or Delawares, were the central tribe of this widely-extended family, and their name, which signifies aborigines, is supposed to distinguish them as the parent stock of the Algonquins. The common characteristic which marked these various tribes as of one family, was their language, which was spoken, though in different dialects, by all. But though their relationship has thus been established by the researches of the civilized student, long after the glory of the race had departed, many of these tribes were frequently at war with each other, and seemed to have no ties of relationship whatever, but rather traditional causes for hatred and hostility. Some of the smaller tribes in this way became extinct, or by their increasing weakness were at last absorbed into some more powerful tribes of their allies.

The next most important family was the Iroquois, or Huron Iroquois, as they are sometimes designated, who occupied the western part of New York and a portion of Canada north of Lakes Ontario and Erie. The Iroquois proper were composed of five tribes, the Mohawks, Oneidas, Onondagas, Cayugas, and Senecas, who were united in a remarkable confederacy, and were called by the Europeans the Five Nations. The Hurons and the Eries were the other principal tribes of the Huron Iroquois family. The Five Nations occupied the central and western part of New York. They were distinguished above many other tribes for their intelligence as well as warlike qualities. Their confederacy was maintained with the greatest care for many years, and this union gave them a strength exceeding that of any of the single tribes with whom they were from time to time at war. They had encroached upon the territory of the Lenni Lenape, and in a great measure subdued that tribe, which is supposed once to have been the most powerful of the Algonquin family. They were surrounded by the Algonquin tribes, but they maintained their position and extended their possessions, until, in common with the whole Indian race, they were compelled to retreat before the white man. The Five Nations afterwards became the Six Nations, (by which name they are known in their later history,) by the migration of a kindred tribe, the Tuscaroras, who had established themselves far to the south, in Carolina and Virginia.

The Mobilian family, from the extent of territory occupied, is the next most important group of tribes. It extended over the southern portion of the country, from Carolina to the Mississippi, including Florida and the coast of the Gulf of Mexico. In this family were the Creeks, the most powerful of the southern tribes, who maintained a confederacy with neighboring tribes similar to that of the Iroquois, and were thus more formidable not only to their native foes, but to the white man. The Seminoles, with whom the Creeks were allied, and with whom the last contest between the Indian and the white race east of the Mississippi was maintained, also belonged to the Mobilian family. The other tribes were either small or came little in contact with the settlers.

The three families above named occupied the greater part of the territory comprising the United States east of the Mississippi; but there were other tribes which have been assigned to distinct families. Among these were the Winnebagoes, who occupied lands on the western shore of Lake Michigan, and who belonged to the Dahcotah family. This family was, with the exception of the Winnebagoes, and perhaps one or two other small tribes, composed of tribes living west of the Mississippi, and known in the more recent history of the western progress of civilization. The Iowas, Osages, Kansas, and other tribes whose names are still familiar, belong to the Dahcotah family.

The Catawbias and the Uchees, said to have been once powerful tribes, but never formidable since known to the whites, are also considered distinct families, the language of the latter being extremely harsh and guttural.

The Cherokees occupied the mountain ranges of the central part of the country, comprising portions of what is now the States of Tennessee, Kentucky, Georgia, and probably Virginia and North Carolina. They were originally a hardy and formidable tribe, and have since become more civilized than other of the native tribes, while they have also shown a remarkable exception to the general rule, and have really flourished and increased in numbers under the influence of civilization. The Natchez, inhabiting a territory immediately east of the Mississippi, are supposed to have migrated from Mexico after the conquest by Cortez.

The four last named tribes are sometimes grouped in the Mobilian family, and the division into more than four distinct families may be rather the result of too nice distinctions discovered or fancied in the rude language of these savages, than of real differences which would presuppose any different origin. The most marked distinction between the various tribes was, that some lived by the chase alone, while others lived not only by the chase, but by agriculture. The Mobilian family comprised those who gave some attention to agriculture; and whether from living in a warmer and more genial climate, or from other causes, as a different origin, they were not so rude as the hunters of the north.

Still the Indians were every where much the same, with similar customs and institutions; every where untamed savages, leading the life of hunters or warriors. In some respects their institutions were comparatively advanced, as in the government of their tribes, the association of tribes in a confederacy, and the recognition and maintenance of some simple individual and social rights. To these institutions and to their tribes they always exhibited a devoted patriotism. But however their patriotism and bravery might suffice to cope with each other, they were no match, with their simplicity and ignorance of the useful arts, for the shrewdness, skill, and energy of the whites. They found their lands invaded and stolen from them as often as fairly purchased, and in their intercourse with civilized man they have met with wrong and injury. Often they resisted, and have visited upon the whites a terrible vengeance for their wrongs. But their resources were few, their numbers diminished, and they receded before the tide of civilization, until the vast territory occupied by the three great families, the Algonquin, Iroquois, and Mobilian, now scarcely contains a remnant of them all.

Such was the condition of the country—a vast wilderness, inhabited by these various tribes of savages and the game upon which they subsisted, when a few European colonies were planted along the Atlantic coast. Hitherto, ages had brought few changes, save those wrought by nature, throughout the whole continent; but the civilization thus planted needed only to be well established in order to effect a complete and wonderful change within the space of a few generations only.

In about a century and a half from the successful planting of the colonies, after the vicissitudes which must necessarily attend their situation, they had become firmly established. Settlements had been pushed into the interior along the rivers, and some bold pioneers had crossed the Alleghanies. But with the exception of a few trading posts and forts established by the French along the great lakes and on the great rivers of the west, the white population was confined to the Atlantic slope of the Alleghanies, and chiefly to places along the coast, or on the rivers. The population at this period (1760) was estimated at about one million seven hundred thousand. The chief towns, Boston and Philadelphia, had each about eighteen thousand inhabitants, and New York about twelve thousand. With the increase of population came an increase of wealth, and though the colonists were simple and frugal in their habits, yet the comforts and even the luxuries of life had taken the place of the want and suffering endured by the early settlers. The Indians had retreated before the march of civilization, and were known and feared only on the frontier, which was practically much more distant than the farthest settlement on our western frontier at the present time. The facilities for communication between the colonies and the different settlements were yet very limited. Along the coast communication was had mostly by small vessels, and in the interior the traveller was obliged to resort to chance conveyance, or more frequently accomplished his journey on horseback. Between New York and Philadelphia wagons were run once or twice a week, the journey being accomplished in two days, in 1766, which was thought to be a great achievement. The first stage coach was run between Boston and Providence in 1772, taking two days for the journey.

The printing press had at an early period been brought to America, but it had not been used without restrictions. The first newspaper was published in 1704, and in 1750 there were only seven published in all the colonies. Just previous to the revolutionary struggle, however, the press became of more importance, as well as more bold and free, and the newspapers increased, though few, if any, were issued more than once a week. Before this time few books had been published, and those were chiefly religious and historical treatises, or, as the struggle between the colonies and the mother country approached, political essays.

Industry and energy characterized the people, and whether in agriculture, commerce, or manufactures, they achieved success, notwithstanding the discouragements and restrictions which were imposed upon the two latter by the mother country—for England had become the possessor of all the territory which had at first been settled by various nations. Education in most of the colonies was encouraged by the establishment of common schools and colleges, which flourished under the fostering care of the government. A sense of the strength and the importance of the colonies was prevalent among the people, and a common interest, as well as the ties of mutual trade and friendship, united them, and to some extent made them one nation. And thus were they able to go into that contest with the mother country which resulted in their independence.

But it was not till after the revolutionary war and the repose which was necessary for a recovery from the effects of so exhausting a struggle, that the country made that rapid progress which has brought it to the important position which it now occupies in the civilized world. From the time when the Union of the states was formed, and a permanent common government established, the nation began really to grow, the resources of the country to be developed, and progress to be made in all that pertains to civilized life. The great and constant discoveries and improvements made since that period in science and the arts have indeed opened a new era in the progress of the world; but the free institutions, and the intelligence and energy of the people, have here made available, and at the same time encouraged, such discoveries and improvements, and no other country has ever enjoyed such advantages and facilities for growth and advancement as the United States.

Contrast the aspect and condition of the country as before described, as it was when the few weak colonies were first planted on the Atlantic coast, with its present state of national development and political importance. From those few scattered settlements of two centuries and a half ago, and from the thirteen colonies of less than one century ago, have grown thirty-two free and sovereign states, extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific Oceans, and from the great lakes of the north to the Gulf of Mexico, and forming, in their union under one federal government, one of the foremost nations of the world. From the few hundreds of the early settlers, from the two millions of colonists at the revolutionary period, the population of the country has grown to upwards of thirty millions. Its chief commercial city numbers three quarters of a million of inhabitants, its second half a million, while numerous others, of a hundred thousand inhabitants and upwards, are growing up not only on the Atlantic coast, but on the great rivers of the west and on the Pacific. In wealth, in strength, in all the resources which make a nation powerful, its progress has more than kept pace with the population. Its commerce extends to every part of the world, and every sea is whitened by its sails. Its products of agriculture, manufactures, and mining are consumed by distant nations. Forests have fallen and cities grown up, the desert has been made to bloom, the watercourses are dotted with mills. Steamboats plough the waters of its great rivers for thousands of miles from the sea, and for thousands of miles, in continuous line, railroads are constructed, connecting the Atlantic seaboard with the distant frontiers, and soon to stretch across the continent to new states on the Pacific coast, while the electric telegraph is extended in every direction, transmitting intelligence from the most remote points, and bringing together in instantaneous communication places divided by thousands of miles of distance.

While the country has thus increased in extent, population, and wealth, and the enterprise and energy of its people have made free use of scientific discoveries and improvements in the useful arts to develop its resources, it has grown also in the less material characteristics of civilization. Education is cared for in every part of the country. Colleges and seminaries of learning are to be found in every state, and in many the free schools offer to all opportunities for education rarely enjoyed elsewhere, except by the wealthier classes of society. Libraries of great magnitude, many of them free to the public, have been established in the larger cities, while those of less importance, but highly useful in their sphere, are growing up in every large community, and institutions for the diffusion of knowledge are found in almost every village. Valuable collections of art are not uncommon, and museums of natural history are being formed, which will in time rival those of the old world. The press, the great engine of civilization, pours out innumerable books and periodicals for the use of a larger reading public than the world can elsewhere boast. Hundreds of daily and thousands of weekly newspapers are published, circulating widely among the people, and read by all. Instead of the few hundred diminutive sheets that were worked off with much toil and care in the days of the revolution, the improved printing machine turns off its hundred thousand copies of mammoth sheets daily, to be read by thrice that number of readers, in all parts of the country.

All these and other blessings of advanced civilization are enjoyed and fostered under free institutions, the germs of which were planted by the Pilgrims and others of the early settlers, and which grew with slow but sure growth, and at last became firmly established by the successful war of independence. And the United States stand among the foremost nations of the world as the Great Republic, an example alike of the success of self-government by the people, and of material and intellectual progress under free institutions.

The story of the change that has come over the aspect of this country, and its progress from an unproductive solitude to a land teeming with wealth, and an industrious, free, and highly civilized population, is one of great intrinsic interest, and to the American who sees and enjoys the blessings of the present it may well have surpassing attractions. Nor is it less a duty than a pleasure to become familiar with the record of that past which has produced the rich fruits of the present, and offers instruction for the future. That record, it is believed, is faithfully, fully, and attractively presented in the following pages; and whatever may be said of the later narrative of events which tread close upon the present, all that relates to the earlier period, down to the time of the present generation, is an impartial and reliable history. As such it is commended to the reader, with the assurance that it will prove alike interesting and instructive.

DISCOVERY AND COLONIZATION OF NORTH AMERICA.

CHAPTER I.

FROM THE DISCOVERIES OF THE CABOTS TO THE SETTLEMENT OF VIRGINIA.

THE early history of most nations is of fabulous, or, at best, of doubtful character, and affords abundant opportunity for the exhibition of romantic conjecture. It might, however, have been naturally expected that no doubtful claims to the first visitation of a country so recently brought within the pale of history* as the American continent, should be found to exist; but this expectation is far from according with fact. Cambrian ambition, unsatisfied with claiming for her heroes the honour of being aboriginal Britons, would invest her sons also with the wreath of fame, as the discoverers of the western hemisphere. Dr. Powel (in his History of Wales) would have us believe that Madoc, son of Owen Gwyneth, prince of North Wales, reached the American shores in the year 1170; most probably, however, this worthy young prince did not extend his voyage of discovery beyond the coast of Spain, by no means an inconsiderable exploit for that age.*

* "Madoc, another of Owen Gwyneth his sonnes, left the land in contention betwixt his brethren, and prepared certaine ships, with men and munition, and sought adventures by seas, sailing west, and leaving the coast of Ireland so farre north, that he came unto a land unknown, where he saw many strange things. This land must needs be some part of that countrey of which the Spaniards affirme themselves to be the first finders since Hanno's time. Whereupon it is manifest that that countrey was by Brittaines discovered, long before Columbus led any Spaniards thither. Of the voyage and returne of this Madoc there be many fables fained, as the common people doe use in distance of place and length of time, rather to augment than to diminish: but sure it is, there he was. And after he had returned home, and declared the pleasant and fruitfull countreys that he had seene without inhabitants, and upon the contrary part, for what barren and wild ground his brethren

Of a far more probable character, though by no means uncontested, are the assertions of the Norwegian historians, who claim for their countrymen, confessedly the most adventurous navigators of the northern waters of the Atlantic in the earlier ages, the discovery of this vast continent, in the year 1001, designated Vinland by Biorn, their chief, from the profusion of wild grape-vines he found luxuriating in the plains. The discussion of this point, as also the narrative of the Zeni, we shall leave to those whose labours are less required in the more important practical researches which the nature of our undertaking especially embraces.†

In entering the region of indisputable authenticity, England ranks scarcely second to Spain, in the merit and the success of naval enterprise. It is a circumstance, however, too remarkable to be passed unnoticed, that England, Spain, and France, all derived their transatlantic possessions from the science and energy of Italian navigators, although not a single colony was ever planted in the newly-discovered continent by the inhabitants of Italy. Columbus, a Genoese, acquired for Spain a colonial dominion great and nephewes did murder one another, he prepared a number of ships, and got with him such men and women as were desirous to live in quietnesse: and taking leave of his friends, tooke his journey thitherward againe. Therefore it is to be supposed that he and his people inhabited part of those countreys: for it appeareth by Francis Lopez de Gomara, that in Acuzamil and other places the people honored the crosse. Whereby it may be gathered that Christians had bene there before the comming of the Spantards. But because this people were not many, they followed the maners of the land which they came unto, and used the language they found there."—Hakluyt's Voyages, vol. iii. p. 1.

† Those of our readers who are desirous of indulging their curiosity on this subject, can refer to Murray's Historical Account of the Discoveries and Travels in North America, volume i. p. 14 to 36.

enough to satiate the most craving ambition ; but, reaping no personal advantage from his labours, excepting an unprofitable fame, after having been ignominiously driven from the world he had made known to Europeans, he died in poverty and disgrace.* Cabot, a Venetian, sailing in the service of England, conferred on that nation a claim, the magnitude and importance of which he never lived to comprehend.† Verazzani, a Florentine, explored America for the benefit of France ; but, sailing hither a second time, for the purpose of establishing a colony, he perished at sea.‡ Amerigo Vespucci gave his name to the new world, and thus rendered his reputation as durable, probably, as the world itself, but without acquiring any advantage for his native country.§

From this slight digression we return to the discoveries of Cabot. The exploits of Columbus having excited a great sensation among the English merchants, and at the court of Henry VII., the adventurous spirit of John Cabot, heightened by the ardour of his son Sebastian, led him to propose to the king to undertake a voyage of discovery, with the two-fold object of becoming acquainted with new territories, and of realizing the long-desired object of a western passage to China and the Indies. A commission was accordingly granted, on the 5th of March, to him and his three sons, giving them liberty to sail to all parts of the east, west, and north, under the royal banners and ensigns, to discover countries of the heathen, unknown to Christians ; to set up the king's banners there ; to occupy and possess, as his subjects, such places as they could subdue ; giving them the rule and jurisdiction of the same, to be holden on condition of paying to the king one fifth part of all their gains. By virtue of this commission a small fleet was equipped, partly at the king's expense, and partly at that of private individuals, in which the Cabots embarked, with a company of three hundred mariners. Our knowledge of this voyage is collected from many detached and imperfect notices of it in different authors, who, while they establish the general facts in the most unquestionable manner, differ in many particular circumstances.¶ The most probable account is, that Cabot sailed north-west a few weeks, until his progress was arrested by floating ice-bergs, when he shaped his course to the south-west, and soon came in sight of a shore, named by him Prima Vista, and generally believed to be some part of Labrador, or Newfoundland. Thence he steered northward again, to the sixty-seventh degree of latitude, where he was obliged to turn back by the discontent of his crew. He sailed along the coast, in search of an outlet, as far as the neighbourhood of the gulf of Mexico, when a mutiny broke out in the ship's company, in consequence of which the farther prosecution of the voyage was abandoned. Cabot reached England with several savages and a valuable cargo, although some writers deny that he ever landed ; and it is certain, that he did not attempt any conquest or settlement in the countries which he discovered.

This voyage was not immediately followed by any important consequences ; but it is memorable as being the first that is certainly ascertained to have been effected to this continent, and as constituting the title by which the English claimed the territories that they subsequently acquired here. Through a singular succession of causes, during more than sixty years from the time of this discovery of the northern division of the continent by the English, their monarchs gave but little attention to this country, which was destined to be annexed to their crown, and to be one principal source of British opulence and power, till, in the march of events, it should rise into an independent empire. This remarkable neglect is in some measure accounted for by the frugal maxims of Henry VII., and the unpropitious circumstances of the reign of Henry VIII., of Edward VI., and of the bigoted Mary ; reigns peculiarly adverse to the extension of industry, trade, and navigation.

While English enterprise lay dormant, both France and Spain were on the alert. The French flag had not yet, indeed, waved on the western shores of the Atlantic. A monarch of such spirit as Francis I., however, could not be content to see Charles, his

¶ "An extract taken out of the map of Sebastian Cabot, cut by Clement Adams, concerning his discovery of the West Indies, which is to be seene in her Majesties prive gallerie at Westminster:—In the yere of our Lord, 1497, Iohn Cabot, a Venetian, and his sonne Sebastian, (with an English fleet, set out from Bristoll,) discovered that land which no man before that time had attempted, on the 24th of June, about five of the clocke, early in the morning. This land he called Prima Vista, that is to say, first seene, because, as I suppose, it was that part whereof they had the first sight from sea. That island which lieth out before the land, he called the Island of St. Iohn, upon this occasion, as I thinke, because it was discovered upon the day of Iohn the Baptist. The inhabitants of this island use to weare beasts skinned, and have them in as great estimation as we have our finest garments. In their warres they use bowes, arrowes, pikes, darts, wooden clubs, and slings. The soile is barren in some places, and yeeldeth litle fruit, but it is full of white beares and stagges, farre greater than ours. It yeeldeth plenty of fish, and those very great, as seales, and those which commonly we call salmons: there are soles also above a yard in length: but especially there is great abundance of that kinde of fish which the savages call baccalaos. In the same island also there breed hawks, but they are so blacke that they are very like to ravens, as also their partridges and eagles, which are in like sorte blacke."—Hakluyt, vol. iii. p. 6.

rival, carrying off all the brilliant prizes offered by the new world. He listened readily to the suggestion, that he too should send an expedition to the west, for the discovery of kingdoms and countries unknown; and Juan Verazzano, a Florentine, who had distinguished himself by successful cruises against the Spaniards, was sent with a vessel, called the Dolphin, to the American coast. In this voyage he discovered, with a considerable degree of accuracy, the coast of Florida. The whole extent of his discovery was upwards of 700 leagues of the North American coast, which he named New France.* He made another voyage the next year; but its records are equally brief and fatal:—Ramusio gives neither date, nor place, nor country; but states, that having landed with some of his crew, Verazzano was seized by the savages, and killed and devoured in the presence of his companions on board, who sought in vain to give any assistance. Such was the fate of one of the most eminent navigators of that age, whom Forster ranks as the type of Cook, both as to his exploits during life, and the dreadful mode of his death. The gloomy impression produced by the tragic fate of Verazzano, seems to have deterred others for some time from such enterprises; and, for several succeeding years, neither the king nor the nation seem to have thought any more of America.

After a lapse of ten years, on a representation made by Philip Chabot, admiral of France, of the advantages that would result from establishing a colony in a country from which Spain derived her greatest wealth, these enterprises were renewed, and Jacques Cartier, a bold seaman of St. Malo, who proposed another voyage, was readily supplied with two ships, under the direction of the Sieur de Melleraye, then vice-admiral of France. He set sail on the 20th of April, 1534, and on the 10th of May came in view of Cape Bonavista. As large masses of ice, however, were still floating about the coast, he deemed it wise to enter a harbour, which he called St. Catherine, and to remain there ten days. The sea then becoming favourable, he came out, and stood to the north, sailed almost round Newfoundland, and discovered the Baye des Chaleurs, and the Gulf of St. Lawrence. Having sailed to the fifty-first degree of latitude, in the fruitless hope of passing to China, he returned, in April, to France, without making a settlement.

A larger expedition was equipped the next spring, and they proceeded direct to Newfoundland. Discovering now the river of Canada, which gradually obtained the name of St. Lawrence, he sailed up this noble stream three hundred leagues, to a great and swift fall; formed alliances with the natives; took possession of the territory; built a fort; and wintered in the country, which he called New France. In sailing up the St. Lawrence, he discovered Hazel or Filbert Island, Bacchus Island, since called the Isle of Orleans, and a river, which he called St. Croix, since called Jacques Cartier's River, where he laid up his ships. From this river, before his final departure, partly by stratagem and partly by force, he carried off Donnacona, the Indian king of the country. He at this time visited Hochelaga, a large Indian settlement, which he called Montreal, where the French were well received; but they were soon infected with the scurvy, of which a considerable number died. The next spring, Cartier, taking with him Donnacona, and several of the natives, returned with the remains of his crew to France, and expatiated to the king on the advantages that would probably result from a settlement in this country, principally by means of the fur trade; but the fallacious opinion, then prevalent among all the nations of Europe, that such countries only as produced gold and silver were worth the possession, had such influence on the French, that they slighted the salutary advice of Cartier, and deferred making any establishment in Canada. But, although this object was generally neglected, individuals entertained just sentiments of its importance, and among the most zealous for prosecuting discoveries and attempting a settlement there, was John François de la Roche, lord of Roberval, a nobleman of Picardy. King Francis I., convinced at length of the expediency of the measure, resolved to send Cartier, his pilot, again, with Roberval, to that country. He accordingly furnished Cartier with five vessels for the service, appointing him captain-general, and Roberval his lieutenant and governor in the countries of Canada and Hochelaga. When the fleet was ready for sea, Roberval was not prepared with his artillery, powder, and munitions; but Cartier, having received letters from the king, requiring him to proceed immediately, sailed with five ships on the 23d of May, and after a very long and boisterous passage arrived at Newfoundland. Having waited here a while in vain for Roberval, he proceeded to Canada; and on the 23d of August arrived at the haven of St. Croix.

After an interview with the natives, Cartier sailed up the river, and pitched on a place about four leagues above St. Croix, to lay up three of his ships for the winter; the other two he sent to France, to inform the king of what they had done, and the disappointment of his expectations in the non-arrival of Roberval. At the new harbour there was a small river, and on the east side of its entrance, a high and steep cliff. On the top of this cliff he built a fort, and called it Charlesborough. Below, the ships were drawn up and fortified. After the fort was begun, Cartier went up the river with two boats furnished with men and provisions, with the intention of proceeding to Hochelaga; leaving Viscount Beauprê to govern during his absence. Having again explored the St. Lawrence, viewed the falls on that river, and had interviews with the natives, Cartier returned to the fort. Finding, on his return, that the Indians had discontinued their visits and traffic, and shown signs of hostility; that his provisions were spent, and that Roberval had not arrived, he prepared to return to France. Meanwhile, Roberval had been engaged in the prosecution of his design of reinforcing Cartier, and carrying forward the projected settlement of Canada. Whatever had retarded his embarkation, he at length sailed from Rochelle with three ships and two hundred persons, and arrived at St. John's harbour in Newfoundland; and while there, Cartier and his company arrived at the same harbour from the St. Lawrence. He informed Roberval of his intended return to France; yet commended the country of Canada as very rich and fruitful. Though the viceroy had brought a sufficient supply of men, military stores, and provisions, to dispel the fearful apprehensions of the adventurers, and had commanded Cartier to remain with him; yet Cartier, persisting in his purpose, eluded him in the night, and sailed for Bretagne. Roberval proceeded up the St. Lawrence, four leagues above the island of Orleans, where, finding a convenient harbour, he built a fort, and remained through the winter. In the following spring, he went higher up the river, and explored the country; but he appears soon after to have abandoned the enterprise. The colony was broken up; and for half a century the French made no farther attempt to establish themselves in Canada.

For the sake of continuity of narrative, in recording the attempts of France to colonize a portion of North America, we have been necessitated to deviate slightly from the direct order of chronological succession. It was in the year 1528, that Pamphilo de Narvaez, having obtained from Charles V. of Spain, the indefinite grant of all the lands lying from the River of Palms to the Cape of Florida, with a commission to conquer and govern the provinces within these limits, sailed in March from Cuba, with five ships, on board of which were four hundred foot and twenty horse, for the conquest of that country. Landing at Florida, he marched to Apalache, a village consisting of forty cottages, where he arrived on the 5th of June. Having lost many of his men by the natives, who harassed the troops on their march, and with whom they had one sharp engagement, he was obliged to direct his course toward the sea. Sailing to the westward, he was lost with many others, in a violent storm, about the middle of November; and the enterprise was frustrated.

Calamitous as was the issue of the expedition of Narvaez, it did not prevent, in that age of enterprise, captains of eminence from pursuing ardently the same course. Fernando de Soto, a native of Badajos, originally possessing only courage and his sword, had been one of the most distinguished companions of Pizarro, and a main instrument in annexing to Spain the golden regions of Peru: but in the conquest of Peru his part had been secondary—the first prize had been carried off by another; and he now sought a country, the glory of conquering and the pride of ruling which should be wholly his; and his wishes were fulfilled. He was created Adelantado of Florida, combining the offices of governor-general and commander-in-chief. On the 18th of May, 1539, Soto sailed from Havannah, on the Florida expedition, with nine vessels, nine hundred men besides sailors, two hundred and thirteen horses, and a herd of swine. Arriving on the 30th of May at the bay of Espiritu Santo, on the western coast of Florida, he landed three hundred men, and pitched his camp; but, about the break of day the next morning, they were attacked by a numerous body of natives, and obliged to retire.* Having marched several hundred miles, he passed through the Indian towns of Alibama, Talisee, and Tescalusa, to Mavila, a village enclosed with wooden walls, standing near the mouth of the Mobile. The inhabitants, disgusted with the strangers, and provoked by an outrage committed on one of their chiefs, brought on a severe conflict, in which two thousand of the natives and forty-eight Spaniards were slain. A considerable number of Spaniards died afterwards of their wounds, making their entire loss eighty-three; they also lost forty-five horses. The village was burnt in the action. After this engagement, Soto retreated to the territory of Chicaça, where he remained until April of this year. His army, now resuming its march through the Indian territory, was reduced to about three hundred men and forty horses. Soto, having appointed Lewis de Moscoso his successor in command, died at the confluence of the Guacoya and Mississippi. To prevent the Indians from obtaining a knowledge of his death, his body was put into an oak, hollowed for that purpose, and sunk in the river. Soto was only forty-two years of age, and had expended 100,000 ducats in this expedition. The small remains of his army, consisting of three hundred and eleven men, arrived at Panuco on the 10th of September, 1543; and the great expedition to Florida terminated only in the poverty and ruin of all who were concerned in it.

We must now advert to some of the most interesting but lamentable events that the history of colonization affords, in which the deadly poison of religious bigotry was deeply intermingled with the hostility excited by commercial jealousy.—The decided indications of a violent spirit of persecution, on the part of the Catholic priesthood of France, induced the brave Coligny to make an experiment, which might have issued in the provision of a safe retreat for a considerable portion of the oppressed Protestants. He formed a party of Huguenots, among whom were several of high respectability, who sailed under the command of Ribault, an officer of considerable spirit, with the intention of colonizing Florida. After a favourable voyage he arrived at the entrance of a river which he called May, from the month in which he reached the coast. He here erected a fort, and then, imprudently sailed for France, to bring out a re-enforcement. Albert, to whom he delegated his authority during his absence, appears to have been both unworthy and incompetent for so important a situation. From his extreme severity and ill management, the colonists formed an inveterate hatred against him, which terminated in his death. In the excitement of internal dissensions, the settlers had paid little or no attention to the production of food; and were compelled, after exhausting nearly all their stores, to make the desperate attempt of re-crossing the Atlantic with the small remainder of their provisions. Being detained by a calm, they had commenced preying upon one another, when they were providentially delivered from their unhappy condition by an English vessel, which conveyed them to their own country.

During the abode of these unfortunate men in Florida, Coligny had been so deeply engaged in the dissension at home, which had ripened into an open rupture and a civil war, that he was prevented from sending his intended re-enforcement; but no sooner had peace been concluded, than he despatched a fresh expedition, under M. René Laudonniere, who arrived in the river May, on the 25th of June, 1564. After sailing northward about ten leagues, he returned to the May, and erected a fort, which, in honour of his sovereign, he styled Fort Caroline. He proved, however, inadequate to the difficult task of presiding over a number of spirited young men, in a state of great excitement from the disappointment of their expectations, which had dwelt upon the prospect of golden harvests and unbounded wealth. Plots were formed against his life, and he was on the point of leaving, with the remains of his colony, for Europe, when a new expedition, under the command of Ribault, entered the river. That officer superseded Laudonniere, only, however, to experience still more melancholy disasters. Scarcely a week had passed after his arrival, when eight Spanish ships were seen in the same river, where several of the largest French vessels were lying at anchor. As the Spanish fleet made towards them, the French cut their cables, and put out to sea. Although they were fired upon and pursued, they escaped; but, finding that their enemies had landed on the shores of the river Dolphin, about eight leagues distant, they returned to the May. Ribault now called a council at Fort Caroline, which decided, that they ought to strengthen the fort with all possible diligence, and be prepared for the enemy. He was himself, however, of a different opinion. Apprehensive of the defection of the friendly and auxiliary natives, if they should discover that, at the first approach of the Spaniards, they should confine themselves to their camp and fortifications, he judged it best to proceed against the enemy at once, before they could collect their forces and construct a fortification in their vicinity. To strengthen this view, he produced a letter from Admiral Coligny, containing these words: "While I was sealing this letter, I received certain advice that Don Pedro Menendez is departing from Spain, to go to the coast of New France. See that you suffer him not to encroach upon you, and that you do not encroach upon him." It was, indeed, the fleet of Menendez, which had just arrived on the coast, and given the alarm. Philip II. had given him the command of a fleet and an army, with full power to drive the Huguenots out of Florida, and settle it with Catholics. Fixed in his purpose, Ribault instantly took all the best of his men at Fort Caroline, and set sail in pursuit of the Spanish fleet, leaving Laudonniere in charge of the fort, without any adequate means of defence. Most unfortunately he was overtaken by a tremendous storm, which destroyed all the vessels, the men only escaping.

Menendez now began to consider what advantage

he could take of this state of affairs. It appeared to him, that, by pushing across the country, he would have every chance of reaching the fort before circumstances would admit of Ribault's return. He set forth immediately with five hundred of his best troops, and, after overcoming the formidable obstacles of swamps swelled by torrents of rain, on the evening of the fourth day arrived within view of the fort. At day-break, Menendez mounted the hill, and saw no appearance of any watch, and, before Laudonniere could muster his little garrison, the Spaniards had rushed in and begun an indiscriminate massacre of men, women, and children. Laudonniere, though worn down with sickness, escaped from the fort with about twenty others, who concealed themselves in the woods. In this extremity, six of them ventured to throw themselves on the mercy of the Spaniards; but they were cruelly massacred in sight of their companions. Laudonniere, seeing no way of escape but by getting over the marshes to the ships at the mouth of the river, led the way, and several of his men followed him through the swamp into the water. Unable to proceed, he sent two of them, who could swim well, to the ships for help. At length he was carried on board a French shallop, which was in search of them, and, having picked up the remaining fugitives, who were concealed among the reeds, carried them to a little ship at the mouth of the river. In this they undertook to reach their native country; on their voyage they encountered want, cold, hunger, and thirst, but they ultimately entered, in a miserable state, the port of Bristol, where they met a hospitable reception. A more tragic end awaited Ribault; all his vessels were dashed to pieces (as we have before observed) in the tempest, which lasted some days. With great difficulty the crews succeeded in reaching the shore, and directed their steps towards the fort. After a toilsome journey of nine days through a rugged country, what was their amazement and grief to find the fort in the hands of the inveterate enemies, alike of their enterprise and their faith! Many of them were for enduring the worst extremity, rather than fall into the hands of the Spaniards; but Ribault, judging their situation otherwise wholly desperate, determined to open a treaty with Menendez, who received them in the most courteous manner, and pledged himself, on the faith of a soldier and a gentleman, that they should be well treated, and sent back to their country. Upon this pledge, the French delivered up their arms; but when they were all assembled on a plain in front of the castle, Menendez, with his sword, drew a line round them on the sand, and then ordered his troops to fall on, and make an indiscriminate massacre. The bodies were not only covered with repeated wounds, but cut in pieces, and treated with the most shocking indignities. A number of the mangled limbs of the victims were then suspended to a tree, to which was attached the following inscription:—"Not because they are Frenchmen, but because they are heretics and enemies of God."

When intelligence of this barbarous massacre reached France, it excited an almost universal feeling of grief and rage, and inspired a desire for vengeance of corresponding intensity. Though Charles IX. was invoked in vain, by the prayers of fifteen hundred widows and orphans, to require of the Spanish monarch that justice should be awarded against his murderous subjects, there was, in the nation itself, an energy which provided an avenger. Dominique de Gourgues determined to devote himself, his fortune, and his whole being, to the achievement of some signal and terrible retribution. He found means to equip three small vessels, and to put on board of them eighty sailors, and one hundred and fifty troops. Having crossed the Atlantic, he sailed along the coast of Florida, and landed at a river about fifteen leagues distance from the May. The Spaniards, to the number of four hundred, were well fortified, principally at the great fort, begun by the French, and afterwards repaired by themselves. Two leagues lower, towards the river's mouth, they had made two smaller forts, which were defended by a hundred and twenty soldiers, well supplied with artillery and ammunition. Gourgues, though informed of their strength, proceeded resolutely forward, and, with the assistance of the natives, made a vigorous and desperate assault. Of sixty Spaniards in the first fort, there escaped but fifteen; and all in the second fort were slain. After a company of Spaniards, sallying out from the third fort, had been intercepted, and killed on the spot, this last fortress was easily taken. All the surviving Spaniards were led away prisoners, with the fifteen who escaped the massacre at the first fort; and, after having been shown the injury that they had done to the French nation, were hung on the bows of the same trees on which the Frenchmen had been previously suspended. Gourgues, in retaliation for the label Menendez had attached to the bodies of the French, placed over the corpses of the Spaniards the following declaration:—"I do not this as to Spaniards nor as to mariners, but as to traitors, robbers, and murderers."* Having razed the three forts, he hastened his preparation to return; and on the 3d of May embarked all that was valuable in the forts and set sail for La Rochelle. In that Protestant capital he was received with the loudest acclamations. At Bordeaux these were reiterated, and he was advised to proceed to Paris, where, however, he met with a very different reception. Philip had already an embassy demanding his head, which Charles and Catherine were not disinclined to give, and had taken steps for bringing him to trial, but they found the measure so excessively unpopular, that they were obliged to allow him to retire into Normandy. Subsequently he regained royal favour, and found ample employment in the service of his country.

Thus terminated the attempts of the French Protestants to colonize Florida. Had the efforts of Ribault or Laudonniere been supported by the government, France might have had vast colonial dependencies before Britain had established a single settlement in the New World, instead of inscribing on the pages of history a striking instance of the ruinous and enduring effects of religious hatred, alike on individual and national fortune.

It has been observed, by one of the most eminent statesmen this or any other country ever produced—one who took a peculiar interest in the progress of the New World—that the present age bears in many points a striking resemblance to that of Queen Elizabeth, and certainly in no respect are the periods more assimilated, than in the singular, and to many, the inexplicable combination of commercial activity and general distress. That poverty among the lower and middling ranks of society was one of the strongest motives to colonization in the days of Elizabeth, as well as our own, the records of history do not permit us to doubt;* and if benefits accrue to the world, in the proportion in which the extent of emigration now exceeds that of the period of our present researches, posterity will see reason to admire the dispensations of Providence, which, however unwelcome to the present, are so richly beneficial to the future ages.

Before entering on the transactions which are so highly honourable to the reign of Elizabeth, it is our duty to record an event which almost may be said to counterbalance, in its baneful results, all the advantages, either to the Old World or the New, that render celebrated the era of the British Queen—the commencement of the slave trade. The first Englishman who brought this guilt upon himself and his country was Sir John Hawkins, who afterwards attained so much nautical celebrity, and was created an admiral, and treasurer of the British navy. A subscription was opened and speedily completed by Sir Lionel Duckett, Sir Thomas Lodge, Sir William Winter, and others, who plainly perceived the vast emolument that might be derived from such a traffic. By their assistance Hawkins was enabled to set sail for Africa in the year 1562, and, having reached Sierra Leone, he began his commerce with the negroes.† While he trafficked with them in the usual articles of barter, he took occasion to give them an inviting description of the country to which he was bound, contrasting the fertility of its soil and the enjoyments of its inhabitants with the barrenness of Africa and the poverty of the African tribes. The negroes were ensnared by his flattering promises, and three hundred of them, accepting his offer, consented to embark along with him for Hispaniola. On the night before their embarkation, they were attacked by a hostile tribe; and Hawkins hastening

* Edward Haies, in his report of the voyage of Sir Humphrey Gilbert, has the following observations on the motives to colonize which then prevailed:—"If his motives be derived from a vertuous and heroycall minde, preferring chiefly the honour of God, compassion of poore infidels captived by the devill, tyrannizing in most wonderfull and dreadfull maner over their bodies and soules, advancement of his honest and well disposed countreyemen, willing to accompany him in such honourable actions, reliefe of sundry people within this realme distressed: all these be honorable purposes, imitating the nature of the munificent God, wherwith he is well pleased, who will assist such an actour beyond expectation of man. And the same, who feeleth this inclination in himselfe, by all likelihood may hope, or rather confidently repose in the pre-ordinance of God, that in this last age of the world, or likely never, the time is compleat of receiving also these Gentiles into his mercy, and that God will raise him an instrument to effect the same: it seeming probable, by event of precedent attempts made by the Spaniards and French sundry times, that the countreys lying north of Florida, God hath reserved the same to be reduced unto Christian civility by the English nation."—Hakluyt, vol. iii. p. 144. Sir George Peckam also bears testimony to the correctness of this opinion. "God," he says, "had provided the means of colonization; for that, through his great mercy in preserving the people for so many years from slaughter, plague, and pestilence, they were in such penury and want, that many would hazard their lives for a year's food and clothing, without wages; and this armament might be most cheaply equipped."—Murray, vol. i. p. 191.

† "With this companie he put off and departed from the coast of England in the moneth of October, 1562, and in his course touched first at Teneriffe, where he received friendly entertainment; from thence he passed to Sierra Leona, upon the coast of Guinea, which place, by the people of the countrey, is called Tagarin, where he stayed some good time, and got into his possession, partly by the sword, and partly by other meanes, to the number of three hundred negroes, at the least, besides other merchandises which that countrey yeeldeth. With this praye hee sayled over the ocean sea unto the island of Hispaniola, and arrived first at the port of Isabella, and there hee had reasonable utterance of his English commodities, as also of some part of his negroes, trusting the Spaniards no further, then that by his owne strength he was able still to master them. From the port of Isabella he went to Puerto de Plata, where he made like sales, standing alwaies upon his guard; from thence, also, hee sayled to Monte Christi, another port on the north side of Hispaniola, and the last place of his touching, where he had peaceable traffique, and made vent of the whole number of his negroes."—Hakluyt, vol. iii. p. 500.

with his crew to their assistance, repulsed the assailants, and carried a number of them as prisoners on board his vessels. The next day he set sail with his mixed cargo of human creatures, and, during the passage, treated the negroes who had voluntarily accompanied him in a different manner from his prisoners of war. On his arrival at Hispaniola, he disposed of the whole cargo to great advantage, and endeavoured to inculcate on the Spaniards who purchased the negroes, the same distinction in the treatment of them which he himself had observed. But the Spaniards, having given the same ratio for the one as for the other, considered them as slaves of the same condition, and treated them all alike.*

The Spaniards have many cruelties to answer for, not only in their islands, but on the continent of South America. They never knew the true philosophy of self-interest in their treatment of their slaves. They never learned the maxim, that kindness is more effectual than severity in subduing ignorant and savage man. The Spaniards were, notwithstanding their love of enterprise and war, naturally an indolent race of people, and rejoiced in finding those who could take the labours of agriculture off their hands. Men, deceived, as most of those were who came with Hawkins, were not very docile; and their masters found in their tempers excuse for rigid discipline.

While the nefarious traffic of Sir John Hawkins was attended with the advantages of a profitable though iniquitous speculation, the meritorious exertions of others were fraught with destruction to themselves, and disappointment to the nation at large; affording a powerful lesson that the characters of men are not to be estimated by their financial success, but by the honourable motives by which their conduct is actuated. The efforts which followed those of the founder of the slave trade were directed to the discovery of a passage to India by the north of America;† but, notwithstanding the utmost exertions of the most eminent naval characters, Frobisher, Davis, and Hudson, they proved entirely abortive, at least, as to the accomplishment of their immediate object.

In the same year, however, in which Frobisher's third voyage terminated so unsuccessfully, Sir Walter Raleigh, in conjunction with his half-brother and kindred spirit, Sir Humphrey Gilbert, projected the establishment of a colony in that quarter of America which the Cabots had visited in the reign of Henry VII.; and a patent for this purpose was procured without difficulty in favour of Gilbert, from Elizabeth. As this is the first charter to a colony granted by the crown of England, the articles in it merit particular attention as they unfold the ideas of that age with respect to the nature of such settlements. Elizabeth authorizes him to discover and take possession of all remote and barbarous lands, unoccupied by any Christian prince or people; invests in him the full right of property in the soil of those countries wherof he shall take possession; empowers him, his heirs and assigns to dispose of whatever portion of those lands he shall judge meet, to persons settled there, in fee simple, according to the laws of England; and ordains that all the lands granted to Gilbert shall hold of the crown of England by homage, on payment of the fifth part of the gold or silver ore found there. The charter also gave Gilbert, his heirs and assigns, full power to convict, punish, pardon, govern, and rule, by their good discretion and policy, as well in causes capital or criminal as civil, both marine and other, all persons who shall, from time to time, settle within the said countries; and declared, that all who settled there should have and enjoy all the privileges of free denizens and natives of England, any law, custom, or usage to the contrary notwithstanding. And finally, it prohibited all persons from attempting to settle within two hundred leagues of any place which Sir Humphrey Gilbert, or his associates, shall have occupied during the space of six years.‡

Invested with these extraordinary powers, Gilbert

* On another occasion Hawkins took advantage of a conflict between the hostile tribes. "In that present instant," says the narrator, "there came to us a negro, sent from a king, oppressed by other kings, his neighbours, desiring our aide, with promise that as many negros as by these warres might be obtained, as well of his part as of ours, should be at our pleasure; whereupon, we concluded to give aide, and sent a hundred and twenty of our men, which, the 15th of Januarie, assaulted a towne of the negros of our allies' adversaries, which had in it eight thousand inhabitants, being very strongly impaled and fenced after their manner; but it was so well defended, that our men prevailed not, but lost sixe men and fortie hurt, so that our men sent forthwith to me for more helpe, whereupon, considering that the good successe of this enterprise might highly further the commoditie of our voyage, I went myselfe, and with the helpe of the king on our side, assaulted the towne, both by land and sea, and very hardly with fire, (their houses being covered with dry palme leaves) obtained the towne, and put the inhabitants to flight, where we tooke two hundred and fifty persons, men, women, and children, and by our friend the king of our side, there were taken sixe hundred prisoners, whereof we hoped to have had our choice; but the negro, in which nation is seldom or never found truth, meant nothing lesse, for that night he remooved his campe and prisoners, so that we were faine to content us with those few which we had gotten ourselves. Now had we obtained between four and five hundred negroes, wherwith we thought it somewhat reasonable to seeke the coast of the West Indies, and there, for our negroes and our other merchandize, we hoped to obtaine, whereof to countervaille our charges with some gaines."—Hakluyt, vol. iii. p. 522.

† In the reign of Edward VI. it was also the general opin ion that a passage to India might be found by coasting along the northern shores of Europe; and, when in pursuit of this object, Sir Hugh Willoughby and his gallant crew were frozen to death.

began to collect associates, and to prepare for embarkation. The first equipment, however, of Sir Humphrey, may be said to have failed, even before it set out. Being composed in a great measure of "voluntary men of diverse dispositions," there was a great falling off when it came to the point, and Sir Humphrey was at last obliged to set out with only a few of his own tried friends. He encountered the most adverse weather, and was necessitated to return, "with the loss of a tall ship, and, more to his grief, of a valiant gentleman, Miles Morgan." This was a severe blow, as Sir Humphrey had embarked a large portion of his property in this undertaking. However, his determination continued unshaken; and by the aid of Sir George Peckham, Sir Walter Raleigh, and other persons of distinction, he was enabled to equip another expedition, with which, in the year 1583, he again put to sea.

On the 30th of July, Gilbert discovered land in about 51° of north latitude; but, finding nothing but bare rocks, he shaped his course to the southward, and on the 3d of August arrived at St. John's harbour, at Newfoundland. There were at that time in the harbour thirty-six vessels, belonging to various nations, and they refused him entrance; but, on sending his boat with the assurance that he had no ill design, and that he had a commission from Queen Elizabeth, they submitted, and he sailed into the port. Having pitched his tent on shore in sight of all the shipping, and being attended by his own people, he summoned the merchants and masters of vessels to be present at the ceremony of his taking possession of the island. When assembled, his commission was read and interpreted to the foreigners. A turf and twig was then delivered to him; and proclamation was immediately made, that, by virtue of his commission from the queen, he took possession of the harbour of St. John, and two hundred leagues every way around it, for the crown of England. He then, as the authorized governor, proposed and delivered three laws, to be in force immediately; by the first, public worship was established according to the church of England; by the second, the attempting of any thing prejudicial to her majesty's title was declared treason;

by the third, if any person should utter words to the dishonour of her majesty, he should lose his ears, and have his ship and goods confiscated. When the proclamation was finished, obedience was promised by the general voice, both of Englishmen and strangers. Not far from the place of meeting, a pillar was afterwards erected, upon which were engraved the arms of England. For the better establishment of this possession, several parcels of land were granted by Sir Humphrey, by which the occupants were guaranteed grounds convenient to dress and dry their fish, of which privilege they had often been debarred, by those who had previously entered the harbour. For these grounds they covenanted to pay a certain rent and service to Sir Humphrey Gilbert, his heirs or assigns, for ever, and to maintain possession of them, by themselves or assignees. This formal possession, in consequence of the discovery by the Cabots, is considered the foundation of the right and title of the crown of England to the territory of Newfoundland, and to the fishery on its banks. Gilbert, intending to bring the southern parts of the country within his patent, the term of which had now nearly expired, hastened to make farther discoveries before his return to England. He therefore embarked from St. John's harbour with his little fleet, and sailed for the Isle of Sable, by the way of Cape Breton. After spending eight days in the navigation from Cape Race towards Cape Breton, the ship Admiral was cast away on some shoals before any discovery of land, and nearly one hundred persons perished; among these was Stephen Parmenius Budeius, a learned Hungarian, who had accompanied the adventurers, to record their discoveries and exploits. Two days after this disaster, no land yet appearing, the waters being shallow, the coast unknown, the navigation dangerous, and the provisions scanty, it was resolved to return to England. Changing their course accordingly, they passed in sight of Cape Race on the 2d of September; but when they had sailed more than three hundred leagues on their way home, the frigate, commanded by Sir Humphrey Gilbert himself, foundered in a violent storm at midnight, and every soul on board perished.*

* Hakluyt has preserved a very masterly performance from the pen of Sir Humphrey Gilbert, entitled, "A Discourse to prove a Passage by the North-west, to the East Indies," &c. Although the recent expeditions, under Captains Ross and Parry, have fully demonstrated that no passage, of an available nature at least, exists between America and the North Pole, it may be interesting to our readers to form some idea of the reasons by which Sir Humphrey convinced himself, and endeavoured to persuade others, of the certainty of a north-west passage; we, therefore, extract the contents of this discourse:—

CHAPTER II.

HISTORY OF VIRGINIA, FROM ITS SETTLEMENT TO
THE FRENCH WAR OF 1756.

TERRIBLE as was the fate of Gilbert and his associates, the ardour of Raleigh was not daunted, nor his energies depressed. High in favour with Elizabeth, he found no difficulty in procuring a patent similar to that which had been granted to his unfortunate brother. Prompt in the execution, as intrepid in the projection of his plans, he speedily equipped two small vessels, under Amadas and Barlow, to obtain further information of the coasts, the soil, and the inhabitants of the regions he designed to colonize. Approaching America by the Gulf of Florida, they touched first at the island of Ocaoke, which runs parallel to the greater part of North Carolina, and then at Roanoke, near the mouth of Albemarle Sound. In both they had some intercourse with the natives, whom they found to be savages, with all the characteristic qualities of uncivilized life—bravery, aversion to labour, hospitality, a propensity to admire and a willingness to exchange their rude productions for English commodities, especially for iron, or any of the useful metals of which they were destitute. After spending a few weeks in this traffic, and in visiting some parts of the adjacent continent, Amadas and Barlow returned to England, and gave a most fervid description of the country they had been sent to explore. Their own words, as contained in their report to Sir Walter Raleigh,* will convey a better idea of the mode of narrative adopted, and the effect produced, than any language of ours. “The soile,” say they, “is the most plentifull, sweete, fruitfull and wholsome of all the worlde; there are above fourteene severall sweete smelling timber trees, and the most part of their underwoods are bayes and such like; they have those ookes that we have, but farre greater and better. After they had bene divers times aboard our shippes, myselfe, with seven more, went twentie mile into the river that runneth towarde the citie of Skicoak, which river they call Occam; and the evening following, we came to an island, which they call Rao-

noak, distant from the harbour by which we entered seven leagues; and at the north end thereof was a village of nine houses, built of cedar, and fortified round about with sharpe trees to keep out their enemies, and the entrance into it made like a turnepike, very artificially; when we came towardes it, standing neere unto the waters' side, the wife of Granganimo, the king's brother, came running out to meete us very cheerfully and friendly; her husband was not then in the village; some of her people shee commanded to drawe our boate on shore for the beating of the billoe, others she appointed to cary us on their backes to the dry ground, and others to bring our oares into the house for feare of stealing. When we were come into the utter roome, having five roomes in her house, she caused us to sit down by a great fire, and after tooke off our clothes and washed them, and dried them againe; some of the women plucked off our stockings, and washed them, some washed our feete in warm water, and she herself tooke great paines to see all things ordered in the best manner she could, making great haste to dresse some meate for us to eate. After we had thus dried ourselves, she brought us into the inner roome, where shee set on the boord standing along the house, some wheate like furmentie; sodden venison and roasted; fish, sodden, boyled and roasted; melons, rawe and sodden; rootes of divers kindes; and divers fruites. Their drinke is commonly water, but while the grape lasteth, they drinke wine, and for want of caskes to keepe it, all the yere after they drink water, but it is sodden with ginger in it, and black sinamon, and sometimes sassaphras, and divers other wholesome and medicinable hearbes and trees. We were entertained with all love and kindnesse, and with as much bountie, after their maner, as they could possibly devise. We found the people most gentle, loving, and faithfull, voide of all guile and treason, and such as live after the maner of the golden age. The people onely care howe to defend themselves from the cold in their short winter, and to feed themselves with such meat as the soile afforeth; their meat is very well sodden, and they make broth very sweet and savorie; their vessels are earthen

Although the lapse of time has evinced the futility of the speculation of Gilbert, the style of this treatise places this author on a level with the most distinguished writers of this age. In the Senate he was admired for his eloquence, not less than for his patriotism and integrity; but the most interesting feature in his character was the strength of his piety. In the extremity of danger at sea, he was observed sitting unmoved, with a bible in his hand, and heard to say, “Courage, my lads! we are as near heaven at sea as at land.”

pots, very large, white, and sweete; their dishes are wooden platters of sweet timber. Within the place where they feede was their lodging, and within that their idoll, which they worship, of whom they speake incredible things. While we were at meate, there came in at the gates two or three men with their bowes and arrowes from hunting, whom, when we espied, we beganne to looke one towards another, and offered to reach our weapons; but as soone as shee espied our mistrust, shee was very much mooved, and caused some of her men to runne out, and take away their bowes and arrowes and breake them, and withall, beate the poore fellowes out of the gate againe. When we departed in the evening, and would not tarry all night, she was very sorry, and gave us into our boate our supper half dressed, pottes and all, and brought us to our boate side, in which we lay all night, removing the same a prettie distance from the shoare; shee perceiving our jelousie, was much grieved, and sent divers men and thirtie women to sit all night on the banke-side by us, and sent us into our boates five mattes, to cover us from the raine, using very many wordes to intreate us to rest in their houses; but because we were fewe men, and if we had miscarried the voyage had bene in very great danger, we durst not adventure any thing, although there was no cause of doubt, for a more kinde and loving people there cannot be found in the worlde, as far as we have hitherto had triall."

Delighted with the prospect of possessing a territory so far superior to any hitherto visited by her subjects, Elizabeth was pleased to honour both the newly discovered country and herself, by bestowing upon it the title of Virginia.

These favourable circumstances not only encouraged the enterprising spirit of Raleigh, but, by their effect on public opinion, assisted him in his arrangements to form a permanent settlement; and he was soon enabled to despatch seven ships, under the command of Sir Richard Grenville, one of the most valorous spirits of the age, with Ralph Lane, as governor of the colony, accompanied by Heriot, a mathematician of celebrity, and some other men of science. Sailing from Plymouth on the 9th of April, they proceeded to Virginia by the way of the West Indies, and, having narrowly escaped shipwreck at Cape Fear, anchored at Wocokon, on the 26th of

June. From this island Grenville went to the continent, accompanied by several gentlemen, and discovered various Indian towns. He then proceeded to Cape Hatteras, where he was visited by Granganimo, the prince seen by Amadas and Barlow the preceding year; and having viewed the island of Roanoke, he embarked for England, leaving one hundred and seven persons under the government of Mr. Lane, to form a plantation, and to commence the first English colony ever planted in America. The chief employment of this party, during their year's residence in the New World, consisted in obtaining a more correct and extensive knowledge of the country; a pursuit in which the persevering abilities of Heriot were exercised with peculiar advantage. His unremitting endeavours to instruct the savages, and diligent inquiries into their habits and character, by adding to the stock of human knowledge, rendered the expedition not wholly unproductive of benefit to mankind. He endeavoured to avail himself of the admiration expressed by the savages for the guns, the clock, the telescopes, and other implements that attested the superiority of the colonists, in order to lead their minds to the great source of all sense and science.* But, unfortunately, the majority of the colonists were much less distinguished by piety or prudence, than by a vehement impatience to acquire sudden wealth: their first pursuit was gold; and eagerly listening to the agreeable fictions of the natives, the adventurers consumed their time, and endured amazing hardships, in pursuit of a phantom, to the utter neglect of the means of providing for their future subsistence. The stock of provisions brought from England was exhausted; and the colony, reduced to the utmost distress, was preparing to disperse into different districts of the country in quest of food, when Sir Francis Drake appeared with his fleet, returning from a successful expedition against the Spaniards in the West Indies. A scheme which he formed, of furnishing Lane and his associates with such supplies as might enable them to remain with comfort in their station, was disappointed by a sudden storm, in which the vessel he had destined for their service was dashed to pieces; and as he could not supply them with another, at their joint request, as they were worn out with fatigue and famine, he carried them home to England.†

* "Most things they saw with us, as mathematicall instruments, sea-compasses, the vertue of the loadstone, perspective glasses, burning glasses, clocks to goe of themselves, bookes, writing, guns, and such like, so far exceeded their capacities, that they thought they were rather the workes of gods then men, or at least the gods had taught us how to make them, which loved us so much better than them; and caused many of them to give credit to what we spake concerning our God. In all places where I came, I did my best to make his immortall glory knowne; and I told them, although the bible I shewed them contained all, yet of itselfe, it was not of any such vertue as I thought they did conceive. Notwithstanding, many would be glad to touch it, to kisse, and embrace it, to hold it to their breasts and heads, and stroke all their body over with it."—Smith's History of Virginia, p. 11.

Had the Virginia adventurers, however, remained but a little time longer at their plantation, they would have received supplies from home ; for, a few days after their departure, a ship, sent by Sir Walter Raleigh to their relief, arrived at Hatteras, and made diligent search for them, but, not finding them, returned to England. Within a few days after this ship had left the coast, Sir Richard Grenville arrived at Virginia with three new vessels laden with provisions. Searching in vain for the colony that he planted, but yet unwilling to lose possession of the country, he left fifty* of his crew to keep possession of the island of Roanoke, and returned to England. This was, indeed, but an inauspicious commencement for English attempts at transatlantic colonization ; but, though its immediate results did not realize the high expectations which had been formed, its consequences were indirectly very beneficial. It gave Heriot opportunity to describe its soil, climate, productions, and the manners of its inhabitants, with a degree of accuracy which merits no inconsiderable praise, when compared with the childish and marvellous tales published by several of the early visitants of the New World. Another consequence of this abortive colony is important enough to entitle it to a place in history. Lane and his associates, by their constant intercourse with the Indians, had acquired a relish for their favourite enjoyment of smoking tobacco ; to the use of which, the credulity of that people not only ascribed a thousand imaginary virtues, but their superstition considered the plant itself as a gracious gift of the gods, for the solace of human kind, and the most acceptable offering which man can present to heaven." They brought with them a specimen of this new commodity to England, and taught their countrymen the method of using it ; which Raleigh and some young men of fashion fondly adopted. From its being deemed a fashionable acquirement, and from the favourable opinion of its salutary qualities entertained by several physicians, the practice of smoking spread rapidly among the English ; and by a singular caprice of the human species, no less inexplicable than unexampled, it has become almost as universal as the demands of those appetites originally implanted in our nature.

Amidst all the discouraging circumstances with which the settlement of Virginia was attended, Raleigh still remained devotedly attached to the object ; and early in the year 1587, equipped another company of adventurers, incorporated by the title of the Borough of Raleigh, in Virginia. John White was constituted governor, in whom, with a council of twelve persons, the legislative power was vested. They were directed to plant at the bay of Chesapeake, and to erect a fort there. This expedition sailed from Plymouth on the 8th of May, and about the 16th of July fell in with the Virginian coast. Arriving at Hatteras on the 22d of July, the governor, with a select party, proceeded to Roanoke, and landed at that part of the island where the men were left the year preceding ; but discovered no signs of them, excepting the bones of one man, who had been slain by the savages. The next day the governor and several of his company went to the north end of the island, where Lane had erected his fort, and had built several decent dwelling houses, hoping to obtain some intelligence of his fellow-countrymen ; but, on coming to the place, and finding the fort razed, and all the houses, though standing unhurt, overgrown with weeds and vines, and deer feeding within them ; they returned, in despair of ever seeing the objects of their research alive. Orders were given the same day for the repair of the houses, and for the erection of new cottages ; and all the colony, consisting of one hundred and seventeen persons, soon after landed, and commenced a second plantation. In the month of August, Manteo, a friendly Indian, who had been to England, was baptized in Roanoke, according to a previous order of Sir Walter Raleigh ; and, in reward of his faithful service to the English, was called lord of Roanoke. About the same period, Mrs. Dare, daughter of the governor, and wife of one of the assistants, was delivered of a daughter in Roanoke, and baptized the next Lord's day by the name of Virginia, being the first English child born in the country.

Before the close of the month of August, at the urgent solicitation of the whole colony, the governor sailed for England to procure supplies. Unfortunately, on his arrival, the nation was wholly engrossed by the expected invasion of the grand Spanish Armada ; and Sir Richard Grenville, who was preparing to sail for Virginia, received notice that his services were wanted at home. Raleigh, however, contrived to send out White with two more vessels ; but they were attacked by a Spanish ship of war, and so severely shattered, that they were obliged to return. It was not till 1590 that another expedition reached Virginia, when they beheld a similarly dreadful scene to that which had been presented on the former occasion. The houses were demolished, though still surrounded by a palisade ; and a great part of the stores was found buried in the earth ; but as no trace was ever found of this unfortunate colony, there is every reason to apprehend that the whole must have miserably perished.* Thus terminated the noble and persevering efforts of Raleigh in the western hemisphere; in which he sent out in four years several expeditions, at a cost of £40,000, without any profitable return. It cannot be a matter of surprise, therefore, that he should be induced to assign his right of property in that country, with all the privileges of his patent, to other hands, especially as he was engaged in several other projects which now presented, to his imagination at least, a much more promising appearance. Sir Thomas Smith, and a company of mercantile men, were invested with the patent; but, finding it difficult, probably, to procure emigrants for a spot which had proved the grave of so many of their brave companions, they satisfied themselves with the traffic carried on by a few small barks, and made no attempt to take possession of the country. Thus, after a period of a hundred and six years from the time that Cabot discovered North America in the service of Henry VII., and of twenty years from the time that Raleigh planted the first colony, not a single Englishman remained in the New World; and the colonization of America awaited the energy of a new impulse.

In the last year of Elizabeth, the voyage of Bartholomew Gosnold tended to revive the spirit of emigration. He set sail in a small bark from Falmouth, with thirty-two persons, for the northern parts of Virginia, with the design of beginning a plantation. Instead of making the unnecessary circuit by the Canaries and West Indies, he steered, as steadily as the winds would permit, due west, and acquired the honour of being the first Englishman who came in a direct course to this part of America.† After a passage of seven weeks, he descried the American coast; and sailing along the shore, arrived at a head land, in the latitude of 42°, where they came to anchor. Having taken a great number of cod at this place, they designated it Cape Cod. On the day following they coasted the land southerly; and, in attempting to double a point, came suddenly into shoal water, at a place they called Point Care. On the 24th they discovered an island, which they called Dover Cliff; and the next day came to anchor, a quarter of a mile from the shore, in a large bay they termed Gosnold's Hope. On the northern side of it was the main; and on the southern, four leagues distant, was a large island, which, in honour of the queen, they determined should bear the name of Elizabeth. Consulting together on a fit place for a plantation, they concluded to settle on the western part of this island. In it they found a small lake of fresh water, two miles in circumference, in the centre of which was a rocky islet; and here they began to erect a fort and storehouse. While the men were occupied in this work, Gosnold crossed the bay in his vessel, went on shore, trafficked amicably with the natives, and, having discovered the mouth of two rivers, returned to the island.‡ In nineteen days the fort and storehouse were finished; but discontents arising among those who were to have remained in the country, the design of a settlement was relinquished,§ and the whole company returned to England.||

However inconsiderable this voyage may appear, its results were by no means insignificant. It was now discovered that the aspect of America was very inviting far north of any portion the English had hitherto attempted to settle. The coast of a vast country, stretching through the most desirable climates, lay before them. The richness of its virgin soil promised a certain recompense to their industry. In its interior provinces unexpected sources of wealth might open, and unknown objects of commerce might be found. Its distance from England was diminished almost a third by the new course which Gosnold had pointed out; and plans for establishing colonies began to be formed in different parts of the kingdom. The accession of James to the English crown was also highly favourable to the colonization of America, and ‡ "Point Care is supposed by Dr. Belknap to be Malebarre, or Sandy Point, forming the south-eastern extremity of the county of Barnstable, in Massachusetts. Martha's Vineyard was not the island which now bears that name, but a small island, now called No-Man's Land. Dover Cliff was Gay Head. Gosnold's Hope was Buzzard's Bay. The narrator in Purchas says, 'it is one of the stateliest sounds that ever I was in.' Elizabeth Island was the westernmost of the islands which now bear the name of Elizabeth Islands. "In 1797, Dr. Belknap, with several other gentlemen, went to the spot which was selected by Gosnold's company on Elizabeth Island, and had the supreme satisfaction to find the cellar of Gosnold's storehouse; the stones of which were evidently taken from the neighbouring beach; the rocks of the islet being less moveable, and lying in ledges."—Belknap, Biog. vol. ii. p. 115.

fatal to the illustrious projector of this design. Peace was immediately concluded with Spain ; and England, in the enjoyment of uninterrupted tranquillity, was enabled to direct to more bloodless pursuits the energies matured in a war which had strongly excited the spirit of the nation without impairing its strength. These projects were powerfully aided by the judicious counsel and zealous encouragement of Richard Hakluyt, prebendary of Westminster, a man of eminent attainments in naval and commercial knowledge, the patron and counsellor of many of the English expeditions of discovery, and the historian of their exploits. By his persuasion, two vessels were fitted out by the merchants of Bristol, to examine the discoveries of Gosnold, and ascertain the correctness of his statements. They returned with an ample confirmation of his veracity. A similar expedition, equipped and despatched by Lord Arundel, not only produced additional testimony to the same effect, but reported so many additional particulars in favour of the country, that all doubts were removed ; and an association sufficiently numerous, wealthy, and powerful, to attempt a settlement, being soon formed, a petition was presented to the king for the sanction of his authority to its being carried into effect.

Fond of directing the active genius of his English subjects towards occupations not repugnant to his own pacific maxims, James listened with a favourable ear to the application. But as the extent as well as value of the American continent began now to be better known, a grant of the whole of such a vast region to any one body of men, however respectable, appeared to him an act of impolitic and profuse liberality. For this reason he divided that portion of North America, which stretches from the thirty-fourth to the fifty-fifth degree of latitude, into two districts nearly equal ; the one called the first or south colony of Virginia, the other, the second or north colony. He authorized Sir Thomas Gates, Sir George Summers, Richard Hakluyt, and their associates, mostly resident in London, to settle any part of the former which they should choose, and vested in them a right of property to the land extending along the coast fifty miles on each side of the place of their first habitation, and reaching into the interior country a hundred miles. The latter district he allotted, as the place of settlement to sundry knights, gentlemen, and merchants of Bristol, Plymouth, and other parts of the west of England, with a similar grant of territory. The supreme government of the colonies that were to be settled, was vested in a council, resident in England, named by the king, with laws and ordinances given under his sign manual ; and the subordinate jurisdiction was committed to a council, resident in America, which was also nominated by the king, and to act conformably to his instructions. The charter, while it thus restricted the emigrants in the important article of internal regulation, secured to them and their descendants all the rights of denizens, in the same manner as if they had remained or had been born in England ; and granted them the privilege of holding their lands in America by the freest and least burdensome tenure. The king permitted whatever was necessary for the sustenance or commerce of the new colonies to be exported from England, during the space of seven years, without paying any duty ; and, as a farther incitement to industry, he granted them liberty of trade with other nations ; and appropriated the duty to be levied on foreign commodities, as a fund for the benefit of the colonies, for the period of twenty-one years. He also granted them liberty of coining for their own use, of repelling enemies, and of detaining ships that should trade there without their permission.* "In this singular charter," says Robertson, "the contents of which have been little attended to by the historians of America, some articles are as unfavourable to the rights of the colonists as others are to the interest of the parent state. By placing the legislative and executive powers in a council nominated by the crown, and guided by its instructions, every person settling in America seems to be bereaved of the noblest privilege of a free man ; by the unlimited permission of trade with foreigners, the parent state is deprived of that exclusive commerce which has been deemed the chief advantage resulting from the establishment of colonies. But in the infancy of colonization, and without the guidance of observation or experience, the ideas of men, with respect to the mode of forming new settlements, were not fully unfolded or properly arranged. At a period when they could not foresee the future grandeur and importance of the communities which they were about to call into existence, they were ill qualified to concert the best plan for governing them. Besides, the English of that age, accustomed to the high prerogative and arbitrary rule of their monarchs, were not animated with such liberal sentiments, either concerning their own personal or political rights, as have become familiar in the more mature and improved state of their constitution."†

We may regard the colonies of North and South

Virginia, or Virginia and New England, as they were subsequently denominated, as forming, from this period, the subject of two distinct and continuous histories, that of the former, being earliest in point of time, will continue to occupy our attention during the remainder of this chapter.

The proprietors of the royal patent lost no time in carrying their plans into effect. It cannot, however, be said, that they commenced their operations on a scale at all worthy of the magnitude of the undertaking, as their fleet consisted only of three ships, conveying one hundred emigrants; and, although some persons of rank were among the number of proprietors, their pecuniary resources were but scanty. The charge of this embarkation was committed to Christopher Newport, already famous for his skill in western navigation. He sailed from the Thames on the 20th of December, 1606, having, in a sealed box, the royal instructions, and the names of the intended colonial council, with orders not to break the seal till twenty-four hours after the expedition had effected a landing; to which singular policy, may be attributed the dissensions which soon commenced among the leaders, and which continued to distract them during a voyage long and disastrous.* Captain Newport had designed to land at Roanoke; but fortunately, being driven by a storm to the northward, he stood into the spacious bay of Chesapeake, that grand reservoir into which are poured almost countless tributaries, which not only fertilize the country through which they flow, but open to it a commercial intercourse which can scarcely be said to be surpassed in any portion of the globe. The promontory on the south of the bay was named Cape Henry, in honour of the prince of Wales; and that on the north, Cape Charles, after the then duke of York. At night the box, containing the sealed instructions, was opened, in which Bartholomew Gosnold, John Smith, Edward Wingfield, Christopher Newport, John Ratcliffe, John Martin, and George Kendall, were constituted the council of government, with power to elect a president from among their number. The adventurers were employed in seeking a place for settlement until the thirteenth of May, when they took possession of a peninsula, on the north side of the river Powhatan, called by the emigrants James River, about forty miles from its mouth. To make room for their projected town, they commenced clearing away the forest, which had for centuries afforded shelter and food to the natives. The members of the council, while they adhered to their orders in the choice of their president, on the most frivolous pretences excluded from a seat among them, the individual, who was probably of all others the best fitted for the office, Captain Smith,† though nominated by the same instrument from which they derived their authority. His superior talents, and the fame he had previously acquired in war, excited their envy, while possibly they induced him to assume, that a greater deference was due to his opinion than his coadjutors were willing to admit. At length, however, by the prudent exhortations of Mr. Hunt, their chaplain, the animosities which had arisen were composed, Smith was admitted into the council, and they all turned their undivided attention to the government of the colony. In honour of their monarch, they called the town, the erection of which they now commenced, James Town. Thus was formed the first permanent colony of the English in America.

The vicinity of the settlement was a vast wilderness, though a luxuriant one, inhabited by a race of Indian savages, possessing both the virtues and the vices peculiar to their state. At first, they treated the colonists with kindness; but misunderstandings, from various causes, ere long interrupted the peace, and annoyed the proceedings of the English. Nor was the hostility of the natives the only occasion of discomfort; the extreme heat of the summer, and the intense cold of the succeeding winter, were alike fatal to the colonists. From May to September, fifty persons died, among whom was Bartholomew Gosnold, a member of the council. The storehouse at James Town accidentally taking fire, the town, thatched with reeds, burned with such violence, that the fortifications, arms, apparel, bedding, and a great quantity of private goods and provision, were consumed.

These distresses naturally led them to reflect upon

* Chalmers, Political Annals, b. i. c. 2. "Their animosities were powerfully inflamed by an arrangement which, if it did not originate with the king, at least evinces a strong affinity to that ostentatious mystery and driftless artifice which he affected as the perfection of political dexterity."—Grahame, vol. i. p. 47.

† "It would perhaps be difficult to find any individual who experienced more gallant adventures and daring enterprises, of a highly romantic character, in various countries, than Captain Smith. His life, without any fictitious additions, might easily be taken for a mere romance. He appears to have possessed many great qualities, and to have been deficient in nothing but that mean cunning and sordid spirit, by the aid of which inferior men were able to thwart his views, and deprive him of those stations and rewards which his services amply merited. He was one of the earliest and most ardent of those who undertook the settlement of Virginia; his bravery and capacity more than once saved that infant colony from destruction, and kept the enterprise from being abandoned for several years, though the absurdity of the schemes, and the profligacy, folly, and dishonesty of those who were to execute them, exposed the colony for many years to every calamity, and often brought it to the brink of ruin."—North American Review, vol. iv. p. 146.

their situation ; and having become sensible of their injustice to Smith, his personal talents and activity were, in their adversity, appealed to with that regard and deference which, in prosperous times, are yielded only to vested authority and official station. From some unaccountable jealousy on the part of the governor, the fort had been left in an unprotected state, but, by the advice of Smith, it was now put into a state to defend them against the attacks of the Indians. To procure provisions and explore the country, he made frequent and distant excursions into the wilderness. In one of these, he seized an Indian idol, made with skins stuffed with moss, for the redemption of which as much corn was brought him as he required. Some tribes he gained by caresses and presents, and procured from them a supply of provisions ; others he attacked with open force, and defeating them on every occasion, whatever their superiority in numbers might be, compelled them to impart to him some portion of their winter stores. As the recompense of all his toils and dangers, he saw abundance and contentment re-established in the colony, and hoped that he should be able to maintain them in that happy state, until the arrival of ships from England in the spring. But in the midst of his energetic measures, while exploring the source of the river Chickahominy, he was surprised and attacked by a party of Indians. He defended himself bravely until his companions were killed, when he took to flight ; but running incautiously, he sunk up to his shoulders in a swamp, and was taken prisoner. The exulting savages conducted him in triumph through several towns to Werowocomoco, where Powhatan, their king, resided in state, with a strong guard of Indians around him. When the prisoner entered the apartment of the sovereign, all the people gave a shout. The queen of Appamatuck was appointed to bring him water to wash his hands ; and another person brought a bunch of feathers, instead of a towel, to dry them. Having feasted him in their best manner, they held a long consultation, at the conclusion of which, two great stones were brought before Powhatan. Smith had now reason to consider his career as drawing to a close ; by the united efforts of the attendants, he was forcibly dragged, his head laid upon one of the stones, and the mighty club up-raised, a few blows from which were to terminate his existence. But a very unexpected interposition now took place. Pocahontas, the favourite daughter of Powhatan, was seized with emotions of tender pity, and ran up to her father, pathetically pleading for the life of the stranger. When all entreaties were lost on that stern and savage potentate, she hastened to Smith, snatched his head in her arms, and laid her own on his, declaring that the first blow must fall upon her. The heart even of a savage father was at last melted, and Powhatan granted to his favourite daughter the life of Smith.*

It appears at first to have been the intention of the savage monarch to have detained the captive, and employed him in manufacturing utensils and ornaments for his majesty's use ; but from some cause he speedily changed his mind, and in two days after his deliverance, sent him, to his high gratification, with a guard of twelve of his trusty followers, to James Town, upon condition that he should remit two culverins and a millstone as his ransom.†

After an absence of seven weeks, Smith arrived barely in time to save the colony from being abandoned. His associates, reduced to the number of thirty-eight, impatient of farther stay in a country where they had met with so many discouragements, were preparing to return to England ; and it was not without the utmost difficulty, and alternately employing persuasion, remonstrance, and even violent interference, that Smith prevailed with them to relinquish their design. Pocahontas, persevering in her generous designs, continued to supply the colony with provisions till a vessel arrived from England with supplies. Having preserved the settlement during the winter by his active exertions and his careful management, Smith embraced the earliest opportunity, in the following manner, to explore the extensive and multifarious ramifications of the Chesapeake. In an open barge, with fourteen persons, and but a scanty stock of provisions, he traversed the whole of that vast extent of water from Cape Henry, where it meets the ocean, to the river Susquehannah ; trading with some tribes of Indians, and fighting with others. He discovered and named many small islands, creeks, and inlets ; sailed up many of the great rivers ; and explored the inland parts of the country. During

† "So to James Towne with twelve guides Powhatan sent him. That night they quartered in the woods, he still expecting (as he had done all this long time of his imprisonment) every houre to be put to one death or other, for all their feasting. But Almighty God (by his divine providence) had mollified the hearts of those sterne barbarians with compassion. The next morning betimes they came to the fort, where Smith having used the salvages with what kinnesse he could, he showed Rawhunt, Powhatan's trusty servant, two demi-culverings and a mill-stone to carry Powhatan ; they found them somewhat too heave, but when they did see him discharge them, being loaded with stones, among the boughs of a great tree loaded with isickles, the yee and branches came so tumbling downe, that the poore salvages ran away halfe dead with feare. But at last we regained some conference with them, and gave them such toyes, and sent to Powhatan, his women, and children, such presents as gave them in generall full content."—Smith's Hist. Virg. p. 49

this enterprise, the Susquehannah Indians visited him, and made him presents. At this early period they had hatchets, and utensils of iron and brass, which, by their own account, originally came from the French of Canada. After sailing about three thousand miles, Smith returned to James Town. Having made careful observations during this excursion of discovery, he drew a map of Chesapeake Bay, with its tributary rivers, annexing to it a description of the countries, and of the nations inhabiting them, and sent it to the council in England.*

The superior abilities of Smith had now been so manifestly subservient to the general welfare, that they had silenced, at least, the malignity of envy and faction, and although it was comparatively a short period since he had been so unjustly calumniated, and deprived of his seat at the council-board, immediately after his return from his voyage, he was, by the election of the council and the request of the settlers, invested with the government, and received letters-patent to be president of the colony. The wisdom of his administration inspired confidence, its vigour commanded obedience, and the military exercises, which he obliged all to perform, struck the Indians with astonishment, and inspired them with awe.†

The colony continued to proceed, under the administration of President Smith, as favourably as the nature of its materials would permit. They were, indeed, by no means of the most desirable description, being chiefly "poor gentlemen, tradesmen, serving-men, libertines, and such like, ten times more fit to spoil a commonwealth than either to begin or maintain one." As they went out usually with extravagant hopes of sudden and brilliant wealth, they paid little regard to any solid or substantial pursuit, and scorned even the slight labour which was necessary to draw subsistence from this fertile soil. The caprice and suspicion of the Indians also assailed him with numberless trials. Even Powhatan, notwithstanding the friendly ties that united him to his ancient guest, was induced, by the treacherous artifices of certain Dutchmen, who deserted to him from

James Town, first to form a secret conspiracy, and then to excite and prepare open hostility against the colonists. Some of the fraudulent designs of the royal savage were revealed by the unabated kindness of Pocahontas, others were detected by Captain Smith, and from them all he contrived to extricate the colony with honour and success, and yet with little and only defensive bloodshed. But Smith was not permitted to complete the work he had so honourably begun. His administration was unacceptable to the company in England, for the same reasons that rendered it beneficial to the settlers in America. The patentees, very little concerned about the establishment of a happy and respectable society, had eagerly counted on the accumulation of sudden wealth by the discovery of a shorter passage to the South Sea, or the acquisition of territory replete with mines of the precious metals. In these hopes they had been hitherto disappointed; and the state of affairs in the colony was far from betokening even the retribution of their heavy expenditure.

The company of South Virginia, therefore, treated for, and obtained from king James a new charter with more ample privileges.‡ This measure added materially to the list of proprietors, among whom we find some of the most respectable and wealthy, not only of the commoners, but of the peers of the realm. The council of the new company appointed Lord Delaware governor of Virginia for life; Sir Thomas Gates, his lieutenant; Sir George Somers, admiral; and Christopher Newport, vice-admiral; and fitted out seven ships, attended by two small vessels, having on board five hundred emigrants. Lord Delaware did not, however, accompany this expedition, not from any want of attachment to the cause, but from a desire to preside for a period over the council at home, and to make more efficient arrangements for further reinforcements. The ship in which the three other officers§ sailed, becoming separated from the rest of the fleet in a violent storm, was wrecked on the Bermudas Islands, where all the company, consisting of one hundred and fifty persons, were providentially saved. One small vessel was lost in the

* This map was made with such admirable exactness, that it is the original from which all subsequent maps and descriptions of Virginia have been chiefly copied. In Purchas, and in some copies of Smith's History of Virginia, his own original map is still to be found, but it is very rare.

† "About this time there was a marriage betwixt John Laydon and Anne Burras, which was the first marriage we had in Virginia."—Smith's Hist. Virg. p. 73.

‡ Copies of this second charter, containing the names of the proprietors, are preserved in Smith, Virg. Appendix, No. ii. and in Haza d, Coll. i. 58—72. By this charter the company was made "one Body or Commonalty perpetual," and incorporated by the name of "The Treasurer and Company of Adventurers and Planters of the City of London, for the First Colony in Virginia." Charter. To them were now granted in absolute property, what seem formerly to have been conveyed only in trust, the lands extending from Cape Comfort along the sea coast southward, two hundred miles; from the same promontory two hundred miles northward; and from the Atlantic westward to the South Sea; and also all the islands lying within one hundred miles along the coast of both seas of the aforesaid precinct.—Chalmers.

§ Each of these had a commission; and the first who should arrive, was authorized to recall the commission that had been granted for the government of the colony; but "because they could not agree for place, it was concluded they should go all in one ship."—Smith's Hist. Virg. p. 89.

storm; the other ships, much damaged and distressed, arrived about the middle of August at James river; but so little were they expected, that when they were first descried at sea, they were mistaken for enemies; and these apprehensions, which were dissipated by the nearer approach of the fleet, only gave place to more substantial and more formidable evils, arising from the composition of the reinforcement which it brought to the colonial body.* A great proportion of these new emigrants consisted of profligate and licentious youths; indigent gentlemen, too proud to beg, and too lazy to work; idle retainers; dependants too infamous to be decently protected at home, less fitted to found a commonwealth than to destroy one. In fact, the whole colony was speedily involved in distress and disorder by the anarchical state introduced by their pride and folly, while the Indian tribes were alienated and exasperated by their turbulence and injustice.

A systematic design was now meditated against the whole colony by the sovereign of the country; but it was providentially discovered and frustrated. Pocahontas, the tutelary friend of Virginia, though but a child of thirteen years of age, went in a very dark and dreary night to James Town, and, at the hazard of her life, disclosed to the president a plot of her father to kill him and all the English. This timely notice put the colony on its guard; and some favourable occurrences soon after contributed still farther toward its preservation. An Indian, apparently dead through the effect of a charcoal fire in a close room, was, on the application of vinegar and aqua vitæ by the president, reanimated. This supposed miracle, with an explosion of powder, which killed two or three Indians, and scorched and wounded others, excited such astonishment, mingled with such admiration of English power and art, that Powhatan and his people came to them with presents of peace; and the whole country, during the remainder of Smith's administration, was entirely free from molestation, and the colonists pursued

* Speaking of this company, Smith says, "To a thousand mischiefs those lewd Capitaines led this lewd company, wherein were many unruly gallants, packed thither by their friends to escape ill destinies, and those would dispose and determine of the government, sometimes to one, the next day to another; to-day the old commission must rule, to-morrow the new, the next day neither; in fine, they would rule all, or ruine all: yet in charitie we must endure them thus to destroy us, or by correcting their follies, have brought the worlds censure upon us to be guiltie of their blouds. Happie had we beene had they never arrived, and we for ever abandoned, as we were left to our fortunes; for on earth, for the number, was never more confusion, or misery, then their factions occasioned."

"The president seeing the desire those braves had to rule; seeing how his authoritie so unexpectedly changed would willingly have left all, and have returned for England. But seeing there their plans of improvement, both in agriculture and in some of the manufactures, with tolerable success. Unhappily, however, the president, while exerting himself with his usual energy in the concerns of the settlement, received a dangerous wound from the accidental explosion of a quantity of gunpowder. Completely disabled by this misfortune, and destitute of surgical aid, he was compelled to resign his command, and take his departure (and it was a final one) for England. "It was natural," observes Grahame, "that he should abandon with regret the society he had so often preserved, the settlement he had conducted through difficulties as formidable as the infancy of Carthage or Rome had to encounter, and the scenes he had dignified by so much wisdom and virtue. But our sympathy with his regret is abated by the reflection, that a longer residence in the colony would speedily have consigned him to very subordinate office, and might have deprived the world of that stock of valuable knowledge, and his own character of that accession of fame, which the publication of his travels has been the means of perpetuating."†

The departure of Smith was, as might have been anticipated, a most inauspicious circumstance for the colony. The Indians, finding that the person whose vigour they had so often felt no longer ruled the English settlers, generally revolted, and destroyed them wherever they were found. Captain Ratcliff, in a small ship, with thirty men, going to trade, and trusting himself indiscreetly to Powhatan, he and all his people, excepting two, were slain; one boy was saved by the benevolent Pocahontas. The provisions of the colony being imprudently wasted, a dreadful famine ensued, and prevailed to such extremity, that this period was many years distinguished by the name of "the starving time." Of nearly five hundred persons left in the colony by the late president, sixty only remained at the expiration of six months. In this extremity, they received unexpected relief from Sir Thomas Gates, and the company wrecked the previous year at the Bermudas, who, having built two small vessels, were at length able to leave the Island, and reached Virginia on the 23d of May. Finding the small remains of the colony in a famishing condition, Sir Thomas Gates consulted with Sir George Somers, Captain Newport, and the gentlemen and council of the former government; and the conclusion was, that they would abandon the country. It was their intention to sail for Newfoundland, where they expected to meet with many English ships, into which, it was hoped, they might disperse most of the company, and thus get back to England. On the 7th of June they all embarked in four small vessels, and about noon, fell down the river with the tide. The next morning they discovered a boat making toward them; and it proved to be the long-boat of Lord Delaware, who had just arrived at the mouth of the river, with three ships and a hundred and fifty men. Hearing at the fort of the company's intention to return to England, he had despatched an officer with letters to Sir Thomas Gates, informing him of his arrival. Gates instantly changed his purpose, and that night relanded all his men at James Town. On the 10th, Lord Delaware came up with his ships, bringing plentiful supplies to the colony, which he proceeded to resettle.*

was small hope this new commission would arrive, longer he would not suffer those factious spirits to proceede. It would be too tedious, too strange, and almost incredible, should I particularly relate the infinite dangers, plots, and practices, he daily escaped amongst this factious crew, the chiefs whereof he quickly layd by the heeles, till his leasure better served to doe them justice."—Smith's Hist. Virg. p. 90.

* "The History of the Rise and Progress of the United States of North America, till the Revolution in 1688. By James Grahame, Esq. 2 vols. 8vo." This work appears to have been the result of lengthened and extensive research, and we know not which most to commend, its general correctness, its vigorous and just conceptions, or its decided advocacy of Christian principles;—and we take the liberty of expressing our hope that the volumes containing the subsequent portions of the history will not be longer delayed.

Having published his commission, which invested him with the sole command, he appointed a council of six persons to assist him in the administration. An essential change now took place in the form of the ancient Virginia constitution; for the original aristocracy was converted into a monarchical government, over whose deliberations the people had no control. Under the auspices of this intelligent and distinguished nobleman, the affairs of the colony were soon re-established. He allotted to every man his particular business;—the French who had been imported for the purpose, he commanded to plant the vine; the English, to labour in the woodlands; and he appointed officers to see his orders obeyed. All patiently submitted to an authority, which experience had taught them to be wise and necessary; and peace, industry, and order, now succeeded tumult, idleness, and anarchy. Lord Delaware speedily erected two more forts for the more effectual protection of the colony; the one he designated Fort Henry, the other Fort Charles. On the report of his deputy governors of the plenty they had found in Bermudas, he despatched Sir George Somers to that island for provisions, accompanied by Captain Samuel Argal in another vessel. They sailed together until, by contrary winds, they were driven towards Cape Cod; whence Argal, after attempting, pursuant to instructions, to reach Sagadahock, found his way back to Virginia. He was next sent for provisions to the Potomac, where he found Henry Spelman, an English youth, who had been preserved from the fury of Powhatan by Pocahontas; and by his assistance procured a supply of corn. Somers, after struggling long with contrary winds, at length arrived safely at Bermudas, and began to execute the purpose of his voyage; but, exhausted with fatigues, to which his advanced age was inadequate, he soon after expired. Previously to his death, he had charged his nephew, Matthew Somers, who commanded under him, to return with the provisions to Virginia; but, instead of obeying the charge, he returned to England, carrying the body of his deceased uncle for interment in his native country.

The health of Lord Delaware not permitting him to remain in his office of captain general of the Virginia colony, he departed for England, leaving above two hundred people in health and tranquillity. Not long after his departure, Sir Thomas Dale arrived at Virginia with three ships, three hundred emigrants, and a supply of cattle, provisions, and other articles needful for the colony. In August, Sir Thomas Gates also arrived with six ships, two hundred and eighty men, and twenty women, a considerable quantity of cattle and hogs, military stores, and other necessaries; and assumed the government. Finding the people occupied with but little amusements, and verging towards their former state of penury, he directed their employment in necessary works. The colony now began to extend itself up James river, where several new settlements were effected, and a town built, enclosed with a palisade, which, in honour of prince Henry, was called Henrico.

To avenge some injuries of the Appamatuck Indians, Sir Thomas Dale assaulted and took their town, at the mouth of the river of that name, about five miles from Henrico. He kept possession of it, calling it New Bermudas, and annexed to its corporation many miles of champaign and woodland ground, in several hundreds.

* Smith, Virg. p. 106. Stith, p. 115. Beverly, p. 34, 35. Belknap, Biog. Art. DELAWARE. The narrator, in Purchas, gives this vivid description of the scene:—"The three and twentieth day of May we cast anchor before James Towne, where we landed, and our much grieved governour first visiting the church, caused the bell to be rung, at which all such as were able to come forth of their houses, repayed to church, where our minister, Master Bucke, made a zealous and sorrowfull prayer, finding all things so contrary to our expectations, so full of misery and misgovernment. After service our governour caused mee to reade his commission, and Captaine Percie (then president) delivered up unto him his commission, the old patent, and the councell seale."

In the following year, application was made to the king, by the patentees, for a new charter. The principal objects which they were desirous of obtaining, and in which they succeeded, were, their investiture with the islands situated within three hundred leagues of the coast; the prolongation of the period of their exemption from the payment of duties on their exports; power to raise additional funds by lottery; and some fresh regulations in the internal management.

The Bermudas, lying within the limits assigned by their new charter, were sold by the company to one hundred and twenty of its own members, who, in honour of Sir George Somers, named them the Somers Islands. To these islands they sent a colony of sixty persons, with Richard Moor as their governor. These colonists having landed in June on the

* To give a detail of the history of this Indian princess seems scarcely compatible with a due regard to other departments of our work; and yet it is of too remarkable and interesting a character to be omitted. We therefore insert, as a note, Captain Smith's own account, in a narration made to the Queen of James I.—'Some ten yeeres agoe being in Virginia, and taken prisoner by the power of Powhatan, their chiefe king, I received from this great salvage exceeding great courtesie, especially from his sonne Nantaquans, the most manliest, comeliest, boldest spirit, I ever saw in a salvage, and his sister Pocahontas, the king's most deare and wel-beloved daughter, being but a childe of twelve or thirteene yeeres of age, whose compassionate pitifull heart, of my desperate estate, gave me much cause to respect her: I being the first Christian this proud king and his grim attendants ever saw: and thus intrahled in their barbarous power, I cannot say I felt the least occasion of want that was in the power of those my mortall foes to prevent, notwithstanding al their threats. After some six weeks fasting amongst those salvage courtiers, at the minute of my execution, she hazarded the beating out of her owne braines to save mine, and not onely that, but so prevailed with her father, that I was safely conducted to Iames Towne, where I found about eight and thirtie miserable poore and sicke creatures to keepe possession of all those large territories of Virginia. Such was the weakness of this poore commonwealth, as had the salvages not fed us, we directly had starved.

"And this reliefe, most Gracious Queene, was commonly brought us by this Lady Pocahontas; notwithstanding all these passages when inconstant fortune turned our peace to warre, this tender virgin would still not spare to dare to visit us, and by her our jarres have beene oft appeased, our wants still supplied; were it the policie of her father thus to employ her, or the ordinance of God thus to make her his instrument, or her extraordinarie affection to our nation, I know not; but of this I am sure, when her father with the utmost of his policie and power, sought to surprize mee, having but eighteene with me, the darke night could not affright her from coming through the irksome woods, and with watered eies gave me intelligence, with her best advice, to escape his furie, which had hee knowne, hee had surely slaine her. Iames Towne, with her wild traine, she has freely frequented as her fathers habitation; and, during the time of two or three yeeres, she next, under God, was still the instrument to preserve this colonie from death, famine, and utter confusion, which, if in those times, had once beene dissolved, Virginia might have lyne as it was on our first arrivall to this day. Since then, this businesse having beene turned and varied by many accidents from that I left it at, it is most certaine, after a long and troublesome warre after my departure, betwixt her father and our colonie, all which time she was not heard of; about two yeeres after shee herselfe was taken prisoner, being so detained neere two yeeres longer, the principal island, in August subscribed to articles of government; and in the course of the year received an accession of thirty persons. The Virginia company, at the same time, took possession of other small islands discovered by Gates and Somers, and prepared to send out a considerable reinforcement to James Town. The expense of these extraordinary efforts was defrayed by the profits of a lottery, which amounted nearly to £30,000.

It was in the year following* the grant of the new charter, that the marriage of Pocahontas, the famed daughter of Powhatan, was celebrated; an alliance which secured peace to Virginia many years. Having been carefully instructed in the Christian religion, it was not long before she renounced the idolatry of her country, made profession of Christianity, and was baptized in the name of Rebecca.*

colonie by that meanes was relieved, peace concluded, and at last, rejecting her barbarous condition, was married to an English gentleman, with whom at this present she is in England; the first Christian ever of that nation, the first Virginian ever spake English, or had a childe in marriage by an Englishman, a matter surely, if my meaning bee truly considered and well understood, worthy a princes understanding.

"Being about this time preparing to set saile for New England, I could not stay to doe her that service I desired, and she well deserved; but hearing shee was at Brenford with divers of my friends, I went to see her. After a modest salutation, without any word, she turned about, obscured her face, as not seeming well contented; and in that humour her husband, with divers others, we all left her two or three houres, repenting my selfe to have writ she could speake English; but not long after, she began to talke, and remembered mee well what courtesies she had done, saying, 'you did promise Powhatan what was yours should bee his, and he the like to you; you called him father, being in his land a stranger, and by the same reason so must I doe you;' which, though I would have excused, I durst not allow of that title, because she was a kings daughter; with a well set countenance, she said, 'Were you not afraid to come into my fathers countrie, and caused feare in him and all his people, (but mee,) and feare you here I should call you father? I tell you then I will, and you shall call mee child, and so I will bee for ever and ever your countryman. They did tell us alwaies you were dead, and I knew no other till I came to Plimoth, yet Powhatan did command Vitamatomakkin to seeke you and know the truth, because your countrymen will lie much.'

"The treasurer, councell, and companie, having well furnished Captaine Samuel Argall, the Lady Pocahontas, alias Rebecca, with her husband and others, in the good ship called the George, it pleased God, at Gravesend, to take this young lady to his mercie, where she made not more sorrow for her unexpected death, than joy to the beholders, to heare and see her make so religious and godly an end."—Smith's Hist. Virg. p. 121—123.

As this eulogy of Pocahontas does not give us such a detail as the reader might wish to have, the American editor adds the following from "Knapp's Female Biography."

POCAHONTAS. In every age and nation, rare instances of genius and benevolence have been found; but in the whole range of uneducated nations, no female can be produced that has superior claims to Pocahontas, the Indian princess, daughter to the sachem of Virginia, Powhatan. This princess was born somewhere about 1594, according to Captain Smith's conjecture, for the savages have no methods of keeping an exact register of births, or deaths, and their computations by seasons or moons were seldom accurate. The first that was known of Pocahontas was in the year 1607, when that prince of chivalry, Captain John Smith, whose fame had filled the old world, came to this continent for adventures,

In some measure connected with this event, by the influence so powerful an alliance was calculated to have upon the minds of the natives in the vicinity, was the treaty which Sir Thomas Dale effected with the Chickahominy tribe of Indians, a bold and free people, who now voluntarily relinquished their name, for that of Tassantessus, or Englishmen; and solemnly engaged to be faithful subjects to King James.

During the interval of tranquillity procured by the alliance with Powhatan, an important change was made in the state of the colony. Hitherto no right of private property in land had been established. The fields that were cleared had been cultivated by the joint labour of the colonists; their product was carried to the common storehouses, and distributed weekly to every family, according to its number and exigencies. However suitable such an arrangement might have been deemed for the commencement of a colony, experience proved that it was decidedly opposed to its progress in a more advanced state. In order to remedy this, Sir Thomas Dale divided a considerable portion of the land into small lots, and

and in exploring the country about James's river, was taken prisoner by some of the warriors of the tribes under Powhatan, and brought this powerful chief to be disposed of according to his will and decree. The fame and exploits of Smith had reached Powhatan. The prowess he had shown when taken was sufficient for their justification in taking him off; for he had been a wonder and terror to all his foes. Powhatan was as far an absolute despot as can exist in a state of nature. But the chief did not decide alone upon Captain Smith's fate; he called a council of his chiefs upon his case. In this convention the most wonderful stories of the white man's prowess, since he had been in this country, were told. Smith understood enough of the Indian language to comprehend the course of the debate, and made up his mind to die. Pocahontas was a listener in the council. Heroism and beauty have always an effect on the female heart; and even age and philosophy are not proof against these magicians. It was decided that he must die, as being too formidable a foe to suffer to escape. His death was to be by beating him on the head with clubs while he was in a recumbent posture, with a stone for a pillow. He was first bound, and then thrown down, and the clubs were uplifted, when Pocahontas, then a mere child, rushed forward and threw herself on the body of Smith, and protected his life at the risk of her own. The fierce savage hearts of the warriors were affected, and Smith was at once released and became an inmate, for a while, of the wigwam of Powhatan, and soon afterwards released, carrying with him a grateful sense of the services rendered him by this noble daughter of the forest. Sometime after this the Indians became alarmed, by witnessing the extraordinary feats of Smith, and laid a plan to get him into their power, under the pretence of wishing an interview with him in their territory. But Pocahontas, knowing the designs of the warriors, left the wigwam after her father had gone to sleep, and ran more than nine miles through the woods to inform her friend Captain Smith of the dangers that awaited him, either by stratagem or attack. For this service, Captain Smith offered her some trinkets; but young as she was, and no doubt had a natural fondness for finery, which belongs to her age, sex, and nation, yet she refused to accept any thing, or stop to refresh herself, for fear of being discovered by her father, or his wives. She returned before any one awaked, and laid herself gently in her blanket near where her father slept.

For several years she continued to assist the whites against her father's plots for their destruction. Although she was a great favourite with her father, he was so incensed against her for favouring the English, that he sent her to a chief of a neighbouring tribe; or, perhaps, he feared that the other chiefs of his own might, in Indian style, sacrifice her for want of patriotism. Such a sacrifice would not be a rare occurrence in Indian history. Here she remained for some time, when Captain Argall coming up the Potomac, and finding out that she was with Jopazaws, tempted the deceitful wretch to deliver her to him as a prisoner, for the bribe of a brass kettle, of which the chief had become enamoured, as the biggest trinket he had ever seen. Argall thought, by having her as a hostage, he should be able to bring Powhatan to terms of peace, but he refused to ransom her on the hard terms proposed by the colonists. He offered five hundred bushels of corn for her ransom, which was not accepted. She was well treated while a prisoner, and Mr. Thomas Rolfe, a pious young man, and a brave officer, undertook to teach her the English language, as it was an object to have an influential interpreter among them. From a knowledge of what she had done for his friend Smith, and from finding her intelligent, brave, and noble, he became attached to her, and offered her his hand. This was communicated to Powhatan, who gave his consent to the union, and she was married after the form of the church of England, in presence of her uncle and two brothers. She was then but little past seventeen years of age. Powhatan did not attend the marriage, perhaps from a fear that some treachery might be in the business, but finding none, he extended the hand of friendship to his new allies as long as he lived.

The colony was now relieved from war, and for a while seemed to flourish. Pocahontas was a great favourite among the colonists, and her husband having business in England, it was thought best for her to make the voyage with him. She took several Indians of both sexes with her, such a number as her brothers and uncle thought belonged to her lineal honours. In England she was baptized and called Rebecca. She was there a subject of great curiosity, and was treated by all classes as a princess. She had made great progress in the English studies, and spoke the language with wonderful fluency. In London she was visited by Captain Smith, whom she supposed to have been dead. When she first beheld him, she was overcome with emotion, and shrunk from him as from one from the grave, hiding her face with her hand. An explanation soon took place, and she again used the endearing appellation of father, in conversation with her old friend. The only solution of this deception is, that the colonists wished to bring about a match between her and some one of their number, and feared, perhaps, that she cherished too fond a recollection of the gallant Smith, to think of uniting herself to another, while he was living.

Captain Smith wrote a memorial to the queen in her behalf, setting forth in a free and noble manner the services of the Indian princess, rendered to himself and to the colony; and the queen became her personal friend. She only lived long enough in England to prove to them that genius and virtue are the productions of every age and clime. She died as she was about to embark for her native land, at Gravesend, leaving an infant son. She was deeply lamented in England, and sincerely mourned in Virginia. The son she left, was educated by his uncle in England, and afterwards became a worthy and highly respectable character in Virginia, from whom has descended several distinguished families, now of that state. Several works of fiction have been founded on the incidents in the life of Pocahontas, but they have not been successful. The whole of her story surpasses all that fiction could create, and the embellishments were not wanted along side of the simple character of this child of nature. A thousand artificial flowers, in gilded vases, have not, to the true botanist, the beauty and perfume of the rose in the garden where it grew; nor can the Geraldines and Cherubines, those monsters of loveliness in fiction, reach the unsophisticated elegance of character displayed in Pocahontas. There is now a strong sympathy felt and acknowledged for the Indians. Books are written to defend them from many slanders which have been thrown upon them by former historians, and when this race has become nearly extinct, all will feel how greatly they have been injured.

granted one of these to each individual in full property. From the moment that industry had the certain prospect of a recompense, it advanced rapidly. The articles of primary necessity were cultivated with so much attention as secured the means of subsistence; and such schemes of improvement were formed as prepared the way for the introduction of opulence into the colony.

The increased industry of the colonists was not long before it found a new and somewhat singular channel—the cultivation of tobacco; indeed, so inconsiderately and exclusively were their energies directed to that object at this time, that the most fatal consequences were rendered almost inevitable. The land which ought to have been reserved for raising provisions, and even the streets of James Town, were planted with tobacco. Various regulations were framed to restrain this ill-directed activity; but, from eagerness for present gain, the planters disregarded every admonition. Tobacco, however, had many trials to pass through before it reached its present established station. King James declared himself its open enemy, and drew against it his royal pen. In the work which he entitled “Counterblast to Tobacco,” he poured the most bitter reproaches on this “vile and nauseous weed.” He followed it up by a proclamation to restrain the disorderly trading in tobacco, as tending to a general and new corruption of both men’s bodies and minds. Yet tobacco, like other proscribed objects, thrived under persecution, and achieved a final triumph over all its enemies.

The prosperity of the colony, in a financial point of view, may now be considered as rapidly advancing; but its government was by no means in a satisfactory state. After the brief and somewhat lax administration of Mr. Yeardley, the office of presiding over the affairs of the colony devolved on Captain Argal. The severity of his measures occasioned a multiplicity of complaints, though some of them appear to have been for the general benefit. The representations made by the colonists to the company in London, induced Lord Delaware, who ever took a lively interest in their welfare, to venture a second time to embark for America. He took with him two hundred passengers and abundant supplies. He was not, however, permitted to realize his benevolent purposes, but died on the voyage, in or near the bay which bears his name. His ship safely arrived at Virginia, and was soon after followed by another, with forty passengers. On the death of Lord Delaware, the administration of Argal, deputy governor of Virginia, became increasingly severe. Martial law, which had been proclaimed and executed during the former turbulent times, was now made the common law of the land. He published several edicts of most absurd severity: as a specimen of his tyranny we quote his decree, “That every person should go to church on Sundays and holidays, or be kept confined the night succeeding the offence, and be a slave to the colony the following week; for the second offence, a slave for a month; and for the third, a year and a day.”

The tidings of the death of Lord Delaware were followed to England by increasing complaints of the odious and tyrannical proceedings of Argal; and the company having conferred the office of captain-general on Mr. Yeardley, the new governor received the honour of knighthood, and proceeded to the scene of his administration. He arrived in April, and immediately proceeded, in a truly liberal spirit, to take measures for convoking a colonial assembly, which accordingly met at James Town, on the 19th of June. The people were now so increased in their numbers, and so dispersed in their settlements, that eleven corporations appeared by their representatives in this convention, where they exercised the noblest rights of freemen, the power of legislation. They sat in the same house with the governor and council, and acted as one body.* This was the first legislature which ever assembled in the transatlantic states, and may be considered the progenitor of the most pure and effective system of representative government which the world has ever witnessed. The laws which they enacted were transmitted to England for the approbation of the treasurer and company, who passed an ordinance by which they approved and established this constitution of the Virginian legislature, reserving to themselves the creation of a council of state, which should assist the governor, and form a part of the colonial assembly.

This period of the history of the colony is distinguished by several other occurrences, the narration of which may be regarded as the history of the “home department” of the colony. We shall first notice the efforts which were made to introduce education, both among the natives and the settlers. King James having formerly issued his letters to the several bishops of the kingdom for collecting money to erect a college in Virginia for the education of Indian children, nearly £1500 had been already paid towards this benevolent design. Henrico had been selected as a suitable place for the seminary, and the Virginia company granted 10,000 acres of land, to be laid off for the university of Henrico; a donation which, while it embraced the original object, was intended also for the foundation of a seminary of learning for the English. Two other circumstances, of a different character to that which we have now recorded, occurred about this time. The company were directed by James to transport to Virginia one hundred idle and dissolute persons, then in custody for various misdemeanors. They were distributed through the colony as servants to the planters. Much has been said on this subject by writers; but the influence of these outcasts was not of long continuance, for nearly the whole number of them died single. The stain upon the colony is unjustly continued by modern historians, who copy their predecessors without examining the sources of the information they retail. In this manner, error and prejudice are often perpetuated, and, when once fixed, however inconsistent with the whole current of events, if they have a slight foundation, gain strength by the lapse of years. In 1620, a Dutch man-of-war brought into James River twenty Africans, and landed them for sale. The scarcity of labourers made them acceptable to the planters. These were the first seen in North America. The other colonies soon followed the example. The race, prolific every where, soon multiplied in the colonies, and became new sources of wealth to their owners, greatly increasing the exports of the country.

At this early period of colonial enterprise, it may readily be supposed that few females had ventured to cross the ocean. This was necessarily a great impediment to the prosperity of the colony, as it not only prevented the increase of the population, but prohibited the settlement being regarded as a permanent residence. Most of the adventurers sought only to amass wealth with all possible expedition, that they might return to their native country, where only the enjoyments of domestic life were attainable. It was therefore proposed by some intelligent members of the company in London to send out a number of agreeable and virtuous young women, and no less than ninety were prevailed on, by the high probability of forming respectable matrimonial engagements, to embark for Virginia. The speculation proved so acceptable to the planters, and so profitable to the company, that, in the following year, sixty more were sent over, and, like the former, were very speedily disposed of to the young planters as wives.

The price was at first one hundred, and afterwards one hundred and fifty, pounds of tobacco, then valued at three shillings per pound; and it was ordered, that debts contracted for wives should be paid in preference to all others.*

The full tide of prosperity was now enjoyed by the colony. Its numbers greatly increased, and its settlements became widely extended. At peace with the Indians, it reposed in perfect security, and realized the happiness its fortunate situation and favourable prospects afforded, without suspecting the sudden and terrible reverse of fortune it was doomed to experience. Opechankanough, the successor of Powhatan, had adopted with ardour all the early enmity of his native tribe against the settlers; and he formed one of those dreadful schemes, so frequent in Indian annals, of exterminating the whole race at one blow. Such was the fidelity of his people, and so deep the power of savage dissimulation, that this dire scheme was matured without the slightest intimation reaching the English, who neither attended to the movements of the Indians, nor suspected their machinations; and though surrounded by a people whom they might have known from experience to be both artful and vindictive, they neglected those precautions for their own safety that were requisite in such circumstances. All the tribes in the vicinity of the English settlements were successively gained, except those on the eastern shore, from whom, on account of their peculiar attachment to their new neighbours, every circumstance that might discover what they intended was carefully concealed. To each tribe its station was allotted, and the part it was to act prescribed. On the morning of the day consecrated to vengeance, each was at the place of rendezvous appointed; and at midday, the moment they had previously fixed for this execrable deed, the Indians, raising a universal yell, rushed at once on the English in all their scattered settlements, butchering men, women, and children, with undistinguishing fury, and every aggravation of brutal outrage and savage cruelty. In one hour, three hundred and forty-seven persons were cut off, almost without knowing by whose hands they fell.† Indeed, the universal destruction of the colonists was prevented only by the consequences of an event, which perhaps appeared but of little im-

† "The two and twentieth of March, as also in the evening before, as at other times they came unarmed into our houses, with deere, turkies, fish, fruits, and other provisions to sell us, yea, in some places set downe at breakfast with our people, whom immediately, with their own tooles, they slew most barbarously, not sparing either age or sex, man, woman, or child, so sudden in their execution that few or none discerned the weapon or blow that brought them to destruction; in which manner also they slew many of our people at severall works in the fields, well knowing in what places and quarters each of our men were, in regard of their familiaritie with us, for the effecting that great masterpiece of work, their conversion; and by this means fell, that fatall morning, under the bloody and barbarous hands of that perfidious and inhumane people, three hundred and forty-seven men, women, and children, most by portance in the colony at the time when it took place—the conversion of an Indian to the Christian faith. On the night before the massacre, this man was made privy to it by his own brother, but as soon as his brother left him he revealed the dreadful secret to an English gentleman in whose house he was residing, who immediately carried the tidings to James Town, and communicated them to some of the nearest settlers, scarcely in time to prevent the last hour of the perfidious truce from being the last hour of their lives.*

The horrid spectacle before them roused the English from repose to vengeance; and peace was succeeded by a vindictive and exterminating war. The colonists were victorious, destroying many of their enemies, and obliging the remainder to retire far into the wilderness. But their own number melted away before the miseries of war; their settlements were reduced from eighty to eight, and famine again visited them with its afflicting scourge. These calamities, and the dissensions which had agitated the company, having been represented to King James and his privy council as subjects of complaint, a commission was issued under the great seal, to inquire into all matters respecting Virginia, from the beginning of its settlement. A writ of quo warranto was also issued by the court of king's bench against the company. The colony, however, had received information of the whole proceedings in England, and had already in its possession copies of several papers which had been exhibited against it. A general assembly was called, which met on the 14th of February, and drew up answers to the charges in a spirited and masterly style, appointing an agent to go to England to advocate its cause. The quo warranto was brought to trial in the court of king's bench, and, as was usually the case with the courts in this reign, judgment was given in favour of the king, and against the company; James, therefore, availed himself of the opportunity, vacated the charter, and dissolved a company which had consisted of gentlemen of noble and disinterested views, who expended more than 100,000*l.* of their own fortunes, and sent out more than nine thousand persons from the mother country, to plant the first English colony in America. It is true that success, though considerable, had not equalled the expenditure, either of money or of human life. The annual exportation of commodities from Virginia to England did not exceed 20,000*l.* in value; and, at the dissolution of the company, scarcely two thousand persons survived.

King James now issued a new commission for the government of Virginia, continuing Sir Francis Wyat governor, with eleven assistants or counsellors. The governor and council were appointed during the king's pleasure; and, in correspondence with the arbitrary tendencies of the father of Charles I., no assembly was mentioned or allowed. Though the commons of England were submissive to the dictates of the crown, yet they showed some regard to the interest of Virginia, in petitioning the king that no tobacco should be imported but of the growth of the colonies; and his majesty condescended to issue a new proclamation concerning tobacco, by which he restrained the culture of it to Virginia and the Somer Islands.†

James I. died on the 8th of April, 1625; and the demise of the crown having annulled all former appointments for Virginia, Charles I. reduced that colony under the immediate direction of the crown, appointing a governor and council, and ordering all patents and processes to issue in his own name. His proclamation "for settling the plantation of Virginia," is dated the 18th of May. It partakes of all the self-sufficiency and tyrannical ideas of royal prerogative which so fatally distinguished that unfortunate monarch. "Our full resolution is," says Charles, "that there may be one uniforme course of government in and through the whole monarchie, that the government of the colony of Virginia shall ymmediately depend upon ourselfe, and not be commytted to anie company or corporation, to whom itt maie be proper to trust matters of trade and commerce, but cannot be fitt or safe to communicate the ordering of state affairs, be they of never soe mean consequence." That his Majesty possessed no eminent capacity for "ordering state affairs," the issue of his reign afford their own weapons; and not being content with their lives, they fell againe upon the dead bodies, making as well as they could a fresh murder, defacing, dragging, and mangling their dead carcases into many peeces, and carrying some parts away in derision, with base and brutish triumph."—Smith's Hist. Virg. p. 145.

* "The slaughter had beene universal, if God had not put it into the heart of an Indian, who, lying in the house of one Pace, was urged by another Indian, his brother, that lay with him the night before, to kill Pace, as he should doe Perry, which was his friend, being so commanded from their king, telling him also how the next day the execution should be finished: Perry's Indian presently arose and reveales it to Pace, that used him as his sonne; and thus them that escaped was saved by this one converted infidell; and though three hundred and fortie-seven were slaine yet thousands of ours were by the meanes of this alone thus preserved, for which Gods name be praised for ever and ever. Pace, upon this, securing his house, before day, rowed to Iames Towne, and told the governor of it, whereby they were prevented, and at such other plantations as possibly intelligence could be given."—Ibid. p. 147.

ample proof; and it was speedily evident to the Virginians, whose commerce was injured by the restraints, as their persons were enslaved by the prerogatives of "ourselfe."*

The first governor appointed by Charles to preside over the "state affairs" of Virginia was Sir George Yeardley; but his early death prevented the evils of the despotic principles, of which he was the representative, from being felt to their full extent. He was succeeded by one who was the very type of his royal master, Sir John Harvey. He exercised his authority with insolence, and even with cruelty; and took pains to evince that the system of tyranny he was selected to conduct, was perfectly congenial with his disposition. Indeed, such was his excessive solicitude to play the part of a tyrant in a bold style, that even Charles himself deemed it expedient at first to appear to check his career. Roused at length by reiterated provocation, the Virginians seized the person of Harvey, and sent him a prisoner to England, along with two deputies, charged to represent the grievances of the colony, and the misconduct of the governor. So far from redressing their wrongs, however, Charles regarded their conduct as little short of rebellion; he refused even to hear a single charge against Harvey, and sent him back to Virginia, with an ample renewal of the powers which he had so grossly abused, where he resumed and aggravated a tyrannical sway that has entailed infamy on himself and disgrace on his sovereign. Had his government been continued much longer, it must have ended in the revolt or the ruin of the colony. But a great change was now at hand, which was to reward the patience of the Virginians with a bloodless redress of their grievances. After a long intermission, Charles was forced to contemplate the re-assembling of a parliament; and, well aware of the ill humour which his government at home had excited, he had the strongest reason to dread that the displeasure of the commons would be inflamed by complaints of the despotic sway he had exercised over Virginia. There was yet time to soothe the irritation, and even to secure the adherence of a people, who, in spite of every wrong, retained a generous attachment to the prince whose sovereignty was felt still to unite them with the parent state. Harvey was therefore recalled, and the government of Virginia committed to Sir William Berkeley, a person distinguished by every popular virtue in which Harvey was deficient.

The new governor was instructed to restore the colonial assembly, and to invite it to enact a body of laws for the province. Thus, all at once, and when they least expected it, was restored to the colonists the system of freedom which they had originally derived from the Virginia Company; universal joy and gratitude were excited throughout the colony; and the king, amidst the hostility that was gathering around him in every other quarter, was addressed in the language of affection and attachment by this people. Indeed, such was their gratitude to the king for this favour, that, during the civil wars, they were faithful to the royal cause, and continued so even after he was dethroned, and his son driven into exile. The parliament was irritated by this conduct of the Virginians, and it was not the mode of that age to wage a war of words alone. The efforts of a high spirited government in asserting its own dignity were prompt and vigorous. A powerful squadron, with a considerable body of land forces, was despatched to reduce the Virginians to obedience. Berkeley, obtaining the assistance of some Dutch vessels, with more spirit than prudence, opposed this formidable armament; but, after making a gallant resistance, was obliged to yield. His bravery, though unsuccessful in its primary object, obtained the most favourable terms for the colony,† while he disdained to make any stipulations in his own favour, with those whose authority he disowned. Withdrawing to a retired situation, he lived beloved and respected by the people whom he had governed.

The political state of the colony, from the time of this capitulation to the restoration of Charles II. has not, until lately, been perfectly understood. The early historians of Virginia have stated, that, during this period, the people of that colony were in entire subjection to the government of Cromwell; and that the acts of parliament in relation to trade were there rigidly enforced, while they were relaxed in favour of the New England colonies. Recent researches, however, prove these statements to be incorrect.‡ Under the articles of capitulation, parliament and the

† "By these it was agreed, among other things, that the inhabitants of the colony should remain in due obedience and subjection to the commonwealth of England; should enjoy such freedom and privileges as belonged to the free-born people of England; and that the former government, by commission and instruction, be null and void; that the grand assembly should convene and transact the affairs of the colony; but nothing was to be done contrary to the laws of the commonwealth; that they should have as free trade as the people of England do enjoy, to all places and with all nations, according to the laws of that commonwealth, and enjoy all privileges, equal with any plantations in America; and likewise be free from all taxes, customs, and impositions whatsoever, and none to be imposed upon them, without the consent of the grand assembly."—Pitkin's Civil and Political History, vol. i. p. 74.

lord protector, left the inhabitants of the colony to govern themselves. The burgesses, or grand assembly, elected their governor and councillors, and all other officers, and the people enjoyed a free trade with all the world. The inhabitants, indeed, expected instructions and orders from England concerning the government, but none were sent during this whole period. The commissioners of parliament assumed the government for a short time, but in April, 1652, the grand assembly met, and, with the consent of the commissioners, proceeded to elect a governor and councillors. Richard Bennet, one of the commissioners, was appointed governor, until the further pleasure of the commonwealth should be known. In 1655, Edward Digges was chosen governor by the house of burgesses, and after him, in 1657, Samuel Matthews. After the resignation of Richard Cromwell, the house expressly declared, that the supreme power of government should reside in the assembly, and that all writs should issue in the name of the "grand assembly of Virginia," until such a command and commission come out of England, as should be by the assembly judged lawful. At the same session, Sir William Berkeley was appointed governor,* and, by a special act, was directed to call an assembly once in two years at least, and oftener if necessary. He was empowered to choose a secretary and council of state, with the approbation of the assembly, and restrained from dissolving the legislature, without the consent of a major part of the house.

The colonists of Virginia, or a majority of them, were episcopalians, and attached to the church of England; the religion of that church, indeed, was established by law in the colony; and it is evident that they were strongly in favour of the royal cause. Their warm-hearted loyalty could not fail to be exhilarating to the spirits of Charles II., during his banishment. He transmitted from Breda a new commission to Sir William Berkeley, as governor of Virginia, declaring his intention of ruling and ordering the colony according to the laws and statutes of England, which were to be established there. Thus, while that prince was not permitted to rule over a foot of ground in England, he exercised the royal jurisdiction over Virginia. On receiving the first account of the restoration, the joy and exultation of light on the history of that colony, and does great credit to the industry and researches of the publisher, and to the state, under whose patronage, it is understood, the publication was made.

* Robertson, following Beverley and Chalmers, gives a different account of these transactions; but he is incorrect, at least as to the government being appointed by Cromwell. "On the death of Matthews, the last governor named by Cromwell," observes Robertson, "the sentiments and inclination of the people, no longer under the control of authority, burst out with violence. They the colony were universal and unbounded, though not of long continuance.

It had been observed with concern, during the commonwealth, that the English merchants for several years past had usually freighted the Hollander's shipping for bringing home their own merchandise, because their freight was lower than that of the English ships. For the same reason the Dutch ships were made use of for importing American products from the English colonies into England. The English ships meanwhile lay rotting in the harbours; and the English mariners, for want of employment, went into the service of the Hollanders. The government, therefore, not unnaturally, turned its attention towards the most effectual mode of retaining the colonies in dependence on the parent state, and of securing to it the benefits of their increasing commerce. With these views the parliament enacted, "That no merchandise, either of Asia, Africa, or America, including also the English plantations there, should be imported into England in any but English built ships and belonging either to English or English plantation subjects, navigated also by an English commander, and three fourths of the sailors to be Englishmen; excepting such merchandise as should be imported directly from the original place of their growth or manufacture in Europe solely; and that no fish should thenceforward be imported into England or Ireland, nor exported thence to foreign parts, nor even from one of their own home ports, but what should be caught by their own fishers only." The first house of commons after the restoration, instead of granting the colonies that relief which they expected from the restraints on their commerce imposed by Cromwell, not only adopted all their ideas concerning this branch of legislation, but extended them further. Thus arose the navigation act, the most important and memorable of any in the statute-book with respect to the history of English commerce. By these several and successive regulations, the plan of securing to England a monopoly of the commerce with its colonies, and of shutting up every other channel into which it might be diverted, was perfected, and reduced into complete system. On one side of the Atlantic these laws have been extolled as an extraordinary effort of political sagacity, and have forced Sir William Berkeley to quit his retirement; they unanimously elected him governor of the colony: and as he refused to act under a usurped authority, they boldly erected the royal standard, and acknowledging Charles II. to be their lawful sovereign, proclaimed him with all his titles; and the Virginians long boasted, that as they were the last of the king's subjects who renounced their allegiance, they were the first who returned to their duty."—Robertson's History of America, b. ix. Chalmers, p. 125. Beverley, p. 55.

been considered as the great charter of national commerce, to which the parent state is indebted for its opulence and power; on the other, they have been regarded as instruments of oppression, more characterized by ignorance of the true principles of political economy, than by legislative wisdom. At this moment that branch of the colonial code which regulates, or rather restrains, the intercourse of the West India islands with the United States, forms the subject of continued negotiation between the American and British governments.*

This oppressive system excited great indignation in Virginia, where the extensive commerce and pre-eminent loyalty of the people rendered the pressure of the burden more severe, and the infliction of it more exasperating. No sooner was the navigation act known in Virginia, and its effects experienced, than the colony warmly remonstrated against it as a grievance, and petitioned earnestly for relief, but without success; so that the discontents, far from being abated by the lapse of time, were aggravated by the constant pressure of the commercial restrictions. Various additional causes concurred to inflame the angry feelings of the colonists; a considerable native population had now grown up in Virginia, whose dissatisfaction was not mitigated by the fond remembrance which emigrants retain for the parent state, which is also the land of their individual nativity; and a complication of exasperating circumstances brought the discontents of the colony to a crisis. The indignation of the people became general, and was worked up to such a pitch, that nothing was wanting to precipitate them into the most desperate acts, but some leader qualified to unite and to direct their operations. Such a leader they found in Nathaniel Bacon. He was a lawyer, educated in London, and was appointed a member of the council a short time after his emigration to Virginia. Young, bold, ambitious, with an engaging address, and commanding eloquence, he harangued the colonists upon their grievances; inflamed their resentment against their rulers; declaimed particularly against the languor with which the war, then existing with the Indians, had been conducted; and such was the effect of his representations, that he was elected general by the people. To give some colour of legitimacy to the authority he had acquired, and perhaps expecting to precipitate matters to the extremity which his interest required that they should speedily reach, he applied to the governor for an official confirmation of the popular election, and offered instantly to march against the common enemy. This Sir William Berkeley firmly refused, and issued a proclamation commanding the dispersion of the insurgents. Bacon had advanced too far to recede; and he hastened, at the head of six hundred armed followers, to James Town, surrounded the house where the governor and council were assembled, and repeated his demand. Intimidated by the threats of the enraged multitude, the council hastily prepared a commission, and, by their entreaties, prevailed on the governor to sign it. Bacon and his troops then began their march against the Indians; but no sooner were the council relieved from their fears, than they declared the commission void, and proclaimed Bacon a rebel. Enraged at this conduct, he instantly returned, with all his forces, to James Town. The aged governor, unsupported, and almost abandoned, fled precipitately to Accomack, on the eastern shore of the colony; collecting those who were well affected towards his administration, he began to oppose the insurgents, and several skirmishes were fought, with various success. A party of the insurgents burned James Town, laid waste those districts of the colony which adhered to the old administration, and confiscated the property of the loyalists. The governor, in retaliation, seized the estates of many of the insurgents, and executed several of their leaders. In the midst of these calamities, Bacon sickened and died. Destitute of a leader to conduct and animate them, their sanguine hopes of success subsided; all began to desire an accommodation; and after a brief negotiation with the governor, they laid down their arms, on obtaining a promise of general pardon.

* "Great Britain has, in her colonial regulations, deemed it expedient, on the ground of political necessity, to overlook our just claims in measuring out general privileges to all nations. She might have had some excuse, barely plausible, however, for declining to negotiate on this question in 1826; but she can now have no sound apology for persevering in the same course towards those who advocated the acceptance of her colonial commerce, on the terms proposed by the acts of Parliament in 1825. Should she continue to suffer her commercial interests to be controlled and sacrificed through a jealousy of us; should her councils be too much influenced by the apprehension expressed by one of her late ministers, that 'in commerce, in navigation, in naval power, and maritime pretensions, the United States are her most formidable rival;' she must pardon us for responding that sentiment, and for adopting the most efficient measures to countervail a spirit and policy so unfriendly to our navigation. If her peculiar conduct towards us should drive us to measures of specific retaliation—to a more extensive and effective interdiction of our intercourse with her colonies—she will have no just reason to complain, that we have not afforded her every opportunity to re-establish our intercourse on terms of the most general and friendly reciprocity. It will remain for Great Britain to determine, whether she will open the whole of her vast empire to our commerce on mutually advantageous terms; or whether, by persisting in excluding us from a part of her dominions, she will allow other nations to supersede her in the trade with North America."—Report of the Committee on the Commerce and Navigation of the United States, 1830, p. 47, 48.

Thus terminated an insurrection, which, in the annals of Virginia, is distinguished by the name of Bacon's rebellion. During seven months this daring leader was master of the colony, while the royal governor was shut up in a remote and ill-peopled corner of it. In addition to the cause already referred to, the prejudicial influence of the navigation laws, this popular commotion was probably much influenced by the extremely low price of tobacco; the splitting of the territory into proprietaries, contrary to the original charters; the extravagant taxes to which the colonists were subjected; and the ineffective manner in which the governor and council had protected the inhabitants against the Indians. It is said to have injured the colony to an amount not less than 100,000*l*. As soon as Berkeley found himself reinstated in his office, he called together the representatives of the people, that by their advice and authority public order might be re-established. Although this assembly met while the memory of reciprocal injuries was still recent, and when the passions excited by such a fierce contest could scarcely have subsided, its proceedings were conducted with a moderation seldom exercised by the successful party in a civil war. No man suffered capitally, and a small number only were subjected to fines. The council made, however, a somewhat singular exception to their charitable forbearance. While they spared the living, they wreaked their vengeance on the dead, and passed an act of attainder against Bacon long after he was beyond the reach of their enmity.

On hearing of the disturbances in Virginia, Charles despatched, though with no great haste, a fleet with some troops for its pacification. These did not arrive, however, till they might well have been dispensed with. With them came Colonel Jeffreys, appointed to recall and replace Sir William Berkeley in the government of the colony. This brave and benevolent man did not long survive his dismissal, and may justly be said to have lived and died in the service of Virginia.

The only event of importance during the administration of Colonel Jeffreys, was the conclusion of the Indian war, which, by the aid of the troops he brought with him, he speedily effected, and arranged a treaty which afforded universal satisfaction. On the death of Jeffreys, the government devolved on Sir Henry Chicheley. During his presidency, the extensive and unjustifiable grants of the crown, which had long been a most ruinous grievance, were recalled, and the colony enjoyed an interval of repose previous to the arbitrary rule of Lord Culpepper, who had been sometime appointed by Charles, but, happily for the colony, delayed the assumption of his office.

In May, 1680, Lord Culpepper commenced his administration, in the true spirit of a representative of the then British monarch; and, as a masterpiece of tyrannical legislation, he endeavoured to silence all complaints, both against his despotism and his plunder, by creating a law which prohibited, under the severest penalties, all disrespectful allusions to his person, and all observations on his proceedings. A just discontent, thus denied its natural and legitimate mode of expression, broke forth as it should do, as much for the good of the oppressor as the oppressed, in a more substantial form; and an insurrection ensued, which would have been attended with very serious consequences, had not the prudence, kindness, and vigour of Sir Henry Chicheley been ready at hand. Having diffused terror through the colony by his trials and executions, Lord Culpepper proceeded to England to report the success of his experiments on colonial government. His services do not appear to have been appreciated even by the kindred spirit of his royal master; for, on his arrival, he was ordered into confinement for returning without leave; and being brought to trial, he was found guilty, and deprived of his commission.*

In the exercise of his royal pleasure, Charles selected, for the loyal colony of Virginia, a governor very little better than his predecessor. Lord Effingham, among other instructions equally illiberal, brought with him an order that no person should use a printing press in the colony on any pretence whatever!—an example, by the way, which both our African and Indian colonial governments have frequently evinced a considerable inclination to imitate. Having thus set the press perfectly free from all its labours, he felt himself at ease in the pursuit of plans of aggrandizement, which have frequently formed a most important branch of the science of colonial political economy; and, in order to attach to plunder the sanction of a mock legality, he established a court of chancery, with suitable powers, appointing himself the judge! He instituted fees worthy of so high an office, provided that nearly the whole should centre in himself, and even divided with the clerks of the court the emoluments which nominally appertained to them.

Although the press was silenced, the governor could not prevent the assembly from delegating an agent to advocate their cause in England, and to urge his removal. But before Lord Effingham or his accuser could cross the Atlantic, the revolution of 1668 had happily occurred. Some of the requests forwarded by Colonel Ludwell were complied with, but William was either unable or unwilling to displace the officers appointed by the preceding government; and Lord Effingham was continued till 1692, when he was replaced by Sir Edmund Andros, who, as might have been anticipated from his proceedings in New England, was no less obnoxious to the colonists.

It was during this year that William and Mary, at the solicitation of the general assembly of Virginia, granted a charter for "The College of William and Mary in Virginia." The preamble states, "that the church of Virginia may be furnished with a seminary of ministers of the gospel, and that the youth may be piously educated in good letters and manners; and that the Christian faith may be propagated among the Western Indians, to the glory of Almighty God"—their trusty and well beloved subjects, constituting the general assembly of their colony of Virginia, have had it in their minds, and have proposed to themselves, to found and establish a certain place of universal study, or perpetual college of divinity, philosophy, languages, and other good arts and sciences, consisting of one president, six masters or professors, and a hundred scholars more or less, according to the ability of said college, and its statutes, to be made by certain trustees nominated and elected by the general assembly of the colony.* An attempt was also made at this time to establish a post throughout Virginia. A patent was laid before the Virginian assembly, for making Mr. Neal post-master-general of that and other parts of America; but, though the assembly passed an act in favour of this patent, it had no effect. The reason assigned is, that it was impossible to carry it into execution, on account of the dispersed situations of the inhabitants.

From this period to the French war in 1756, (which, as it affected the interests of all the settlements, will form a distinct chapter subsequent to the history of the several colonies,) there is scarcely any memorable occurrence in the history of Virginia. Notwithstanding some unfavourable circumstances, the colony continued to increase. The use of tobacco becoming general in Europe, gave constant employment to the industry of the planters, and diffused wealth among them. Its position, remote from the settlements of the French in Canada, and of the Spaniards in Florida, was favourable to its quiet; and New England and New York, on the one hand, Georgia and the Carolinas on the other, protected it from savage incursions.

New England had no rest until the peace of 1763. The French and Indians were constantly harassing the frontier settlers, by massacres and conflagrations, while Virginia was building up her institutions. She had in her infancy drunk deeply of the cup of miseries which is filled by Indian warfare; but now it had passed from her, and peace and plenty were in all her borders—a most desirable situation for any country.

CHAPTER III.

MASSACHUSETTS.

THE world presents no parallel to the history on which we now enter. The love of glory or of gold has been the impelling cause of the commencement of other colonies, and the foundation of other empires; but in this instance religion, and that of no ordinary kind, either as to its purity or its intensity, was the grand principle of colonization. It was a church rather than a kingdom that these master-spirits of the age sought to establish on the transatlantic shores; and the selection of their location seems to have well accorded with their object. "Arrived at this outside of the world, as they termed it, they seemed to themselves to have found a place where the Governor of all things yet reigned alone. The solitude of their adopted land, so remote from the communities of kindred men that it appeared like another world,—a wide ocean before them, and an unexplored wilderness behind,—nourished the solemn deep-toned feeling. Man was of little account in a place where the rude grandeur of nature bore as yet no trophies of his power. God, in the midst of its stern magnificence, seemed all in all; and with a warmer and

The Rev. James Blair, nominated and elected by the assembly, was made first president, and the bishop of London was appointed and confirmed by their majesties to be the first chancellor of the college. To defray the charges of building the college, and supporting the president and masters, the king and queen gave nearly 2000*l.*, and endowed the college with 20,000 acres of the best land, together with the perpetual revenue arising from the duty of one penny per pound on all tobacco transported from Virginia and Maryland to the other English plantations. By the charter, liberty was given to the president and masters or professors to elect one member of the house of burgesses of the general assembly. In grateful acknowledgment of the royal patronage and benefaction, the college was called William and Mary."—Holmes's American Annals, vol. i. p. 143.

devouter fancy than that which of old peopled the groves, the mountains, and the streams, each with its tutelary tribe, they mused in the awful loneliness of their forests on the present Deity, saw him directing the bolt of the lightning, and pouring out refreshment in the flood; throned on the cloud-girt hill, and smiling in the pomp of harvest. If ever the character of men has been seen more than any where else in powerful action or development, and operated on by the force of peculiar and strongly-moving causes, it was here. Nor, wrought on as all were by similar influences of place, fortune, and opinion, was ever any thing produced like a lifeless unpoetical monotony of character. Nothing could be more opposed to this than was the spirit of puritanism. Wrong or right, every thing about these men was at least prominent and high-toned. Excitement was their daily bread, as it is other men's occasional luxury; and the diversities of character in this community, where, for the most part, people thought so much alike, were more strongly marked than they have often been in other places in the most violent conflicts of opinion. To a religious model, by force or accord, every thing, even relating to the most private and secular concerns, was made as far as might be to conform; for 'noe man,' saith Mr. Cotton, 'fashioneth his house to his hangings, but his hangings to his house.' Religion, politics, fashion, and war, never came elsewhere into so close companionship. The meeting-house and the armory were built side by side, as yet, by the force of old habit, they stand the country through. A desperate courage and dexterity in arms were enjoined as religious duties. The old considered questions of polity at the meeting. The demure youth went from testifying with his mouth in the assembly, to testify with his firelock in the field; and the muffled maiden lisped in biblical phrase her soft words of encouragement or welcome."* This is a powerful description; but the reality will be found much to exceed it.

We can barely allude to the attempt to form a settlement on the Sagadahock, or Kennebeck river, in the year 1607;† the voyage of Hudson in the service of the Dutch, in 1609; and the discoveries of the celebrated Captain Smith.‡ Although these voyages tended to keep alive the spirit of colonization, they did not produce any permanent results. It is not till the arrival of Mr. Robinson's church, in 1620, that the settlement of New England can date its origin.

As the whole history of this important colony is so closely interwoven with the religious sentiments of its founders, it will be desirable briefly to notice the circumstances in which they originated. The reformation is an event, with the character of which, doubtless, all our readers are well acquainted; but of all the churches that underwent the purifying process of that age, the English was placed, perhaps, in circumstances the least favourable. While governed by a proverbially libidinous and tyrannical monarch, who sought his own aggrandizement from the revenues of the monasteries, and revenge on the papacy for opposition to his insatiable desires, rather than any beneficent influence on the corruptions of the clergy, little could be expected, and less was realized. The young and pious Edward would have effected a thorough reform, both in the constitution and the forms of the church, but his life was too brief to allow of the completion of his designs. The horrors of the reign of Mary had a powerful tendency to promote the spirit of puritanism which had arisen during the previous reigns; and Elizabeth found that her most strenuous endeavours, though plentifully sealed with innocent blood, could not quell it, but only left her to indulge in unavailing self-reproach for the cruelties which disgraced her otherwise brilliant reign.

The accession of James of Scotland to the English crown naturally excited the hopes of the puritans. He had been bred a presbyterian, and was known to have publicly declared that the Scotch church was the purest under heaven, and that the English liturgy sounded to him like "an ill-mumbled mass;" but availing himself liberally of that privilege of altering his opinion with circumstances, which kings have at all times found a most convenient and truly royal prerogative, when he found himself safely seated on the English throne, he discovered that "a Scottish presbytery agreed as well with monarchy, as God with the devil." He gratified the puritans so far as to appoint a conference between them and the high church party, at Hampton Court, but the result showed that they had no reason to expect favour or justice at his hands.

In these circumstances, many of them prepared to seek a refuge in Virginia, but were prevented from carrying their intentions into effect by a proclamation, commanding that none should settle in that colony without express license under the authority of the great seal. Thus harassed and oppressed, the puritans emigrated in considerable numbers to the protestant states of Europe. Among these dissentients, it might very naturally be expected that considerable variety of opinion should exist; some were for a total separation from the established church, and would not even receive any as members of their association, who would hold any kind of communion with their episcopal and endowed brethren; others were desirous only of a more effectual reformation of the corruptions of the church, and objected little, either to its episcopal form, or its emoluments. The former class were termed Brownists, from one of their principal ministers; but Mr. Robinson* and his church were of the more liberal party: they retired to Amsterdam. in the year 1607, and subsequently removed to Leyden.

After residing several years in that city, various causes influenced them to entertain serious thoughts of a removal to America. The unhealthiness of the low country where they lived; the hard labours to which they were subjected; the dissipated manners of the Hollanders, especially their lax observance of the sabbath; the apprehension of war at the conclusion of the truce between Spain and Holland; the fear, lest their young men would enter into the military and naval service; the tendency of their little community to become absorbed and lost in a foreign nation; the natural and pious desire of perpetuating a church, which they believed to be constituted after the simple and pure model of the primitive church of Christ; and a commendable zeal to propagate the gospel in the regions of the New World; all concurred to direct their attention to the selection of an abode free from the evils they dreaded, and affording a field for the perpetuation and extension of their religious sentiments. In 1617, having concluded to go to Virginia,† and settle in a distinct body under the general government of that colony, they sent two of their brethren to England to treat with the Virginia company, and to ascertain whether the king would grant them liberty of conscience, in that distant country. Though these agents found the company very desirous of the projected settlement, and willing to grant them a patent with as ample privileges as they had power to convey, yet they could prevail with the king no farther, than to engage that he would connive at them, and not molest them, provided they should conduct themselves peaceably. Toleration in religious matters by his public authority, under his seal, was denied; the agents therefore returned to Leyden with tidings which tended to discourage the design of the congregation. Resolved to make ano-

* Most of the historians of New England have confounded Mr. Robinson and his congregation with the Brownists. Robertson has done so; and even Grahame, who is usually peculiarly accurate, has followed him. From the attention we have given this point, we agree with the opinion of the writer in the North American Review. "The term Brownist," says the reviewer, "is one by which the people, who emigrated to Leyden and afterwards founded the Plymouth colony, were stigmatized by their contemporaries; but it was an appellation which they disavowed, and which Dr. Prince, in his invaluable New England Chronology, has satisfactorily shown did not belong to them. The Brownists were the most rigid sect of the puritans, and vehemently insisted on a total separation from the church of England. Robinson, on the contrary, the father of the Leyden church, published a book, in which he allowed and defended the lawfulness of communicating with the church of England 'in the word and prayer,' and allowed the pious members of the church of England, and of all the reformed churches, to communicate with his church. This liberality was so offensive to the Brownists, that they would hardly hold communion with the church of Leyden. The members of this church were more properly called Independents or Congregationalists. They acknowledged all the doctrinal articles of the church of England, and differed from it only in matters of an ecclesiastical nature. In respect to these, they maintained the principles which are at the foundation of the congregational churches of this country to this day. Robinson, in his farewell address to that part of his flock which embarked for this continent, after a discourse which breathes a noble spirit of Christian charity, not only remarkable at that day, but which has been often quoted with admiration in the present age, adds, 'I must also advise you to abandon, avoid, and shake off the name of Brownist. It is a mere nickname; and a brand for the making religion, and the professors of it, odious to the Christian world.' The followers of Brown, who emigrated to Amsterdam, never came to this country. There is no truth, therefore, in tracing the origin of the New England settlements to 'the obscure sect of the Brownists.'"—North American Review, vol. ix. p. 368, 369. So far, indeed, from Mr. Robinson being a bigot, he was in advance of his age in the liberality of his sentiments; and many who now boast much of their attachment to truth alone, would do well to attend to this excellent man's charge to his congregation delivered two centuries ago. "If God reveal anything to you, by any other instrument of his, be as ready to receive it as ever you were to receive any truth by my ministry; for I am verily persuaded, I am very confident, the Lord has more truth yet to break forth out of his holy word. For my part, I cannot sufficiently bewail the condition of the reformed churches, who are come to a period in religion, and will go at present no farther than the instruments of their reformation. The Lutherans cannot be drawn to go beyond what Luther saw; whatever part of his will our God has revealed to Calvin, they will rather die than embrace it; and the Calvinists, you see, stick fast to where they were left by that great man of God, who yet saw not all things. This is a misery much to be lamented, for though they were burning and shining lights in their times, yet they penetrated not into the whole counsel of God; but, were they now living, would be as willing to embrace farther light, as that which they first received. I beseech you remember it, 'tis an article of your church covenant, that you be ready to receive whatever truth shall be made known to you from the written word of God. Remember that, and every other article of your sacred covenant. But I must herewithal exhort you to take heed what you receive as truth. Examine it, consider it, and compare it with other scriptures of truth, before you receive it; for 'tis not possible the Christian world should come so lately out of anti-christian darkness, and that perfection of knowledge should break forth at once."—Mather, b. i. c. iii. § 8.

ther trial, they sent two other agents to England, in the following February, to make arrangements with the Virginia company; but dissensions then arising in that body, the business was necessarily procrastinated. After long attendance, the agents obtained a patent; but, though procured with much expense and labour, it was never used, because the gentleman, in whose name it was taken out, was prevented from executing his purpose of accompanying his intended associates. This patent, however, being carried to Leyden for the consideration of the people, with several proposals from English merchants and friends for their transportation, they were requested to prepare immediately for the voyage. It was agreed that some of their number should go to America to make preparation for the rest. Mr. Robinson, their minister, was prevailed on to stay with the greater part at Leyden; * Mr. Brewster, their elder, was to accompany the first adventurers; but these, and their brethren remaining in Holland, were to continue to be one church, and to receive each other to Christian communion, without a formal dismissal, or testimonial. Several of the congregation sold their estates, and made a common bank, which, together with money received from other adventurers, enabled them to purchase the Speedwell, a ship of sixty tons, and to hire in England the May-flower, a ship of one hundred and eighty tons, for the intended enterprise. Preparation being thus made, the emigrants having left Leyden for England in July, sailed on the 5th of August from Southampton for America; but, on account of the leakiness of one of the vessels they were twice obliged to return. Dismissing this ship, as unfit for the service, they sailed from Plymouth on the 6th of September in the May-flower. After a boister-

* "It was his intention to follow them with the majority that remained, but various disappointments prevented. He died March 1, 1625, in the fiftieth year of his age, and in the height of his usefulness. Another portion of his church, with his widow and children, afterwards came to New England."—Allen's Biography, p. 501.

† It was as follows:—"In the name of God, amen. We, whose names are under-written, the loyal subjects of our dread sovereign Lord, King James, &c., having undertaken, for the glory of God and advancement of the Christian faith, and honour of our king and country, a voyage to plant the first colony in the northern parts of Virginia, do, by these presents, solemnly and mutually, in the presence of God, and of one another, covenant and combine ourselves together, into a civil body politic, for our better ordering and preservation and furtherance of the ends aforesaid; and by virtue hereof, to enact, constitute, and frame such just and equal laws and ordinances, acts, constitutions, and officers, from time to time, as shall be thought most meet and convenient for the general good of the colony; unto which we promise all due submission and obedience."—Pitkin's Civil and Political History of the United States, vol. i. p. 33.

‡ John Carver, the first governor of the Plymouth colony, was a native of England, and one of those who fled to Holland with Mr. Robinson, to enjoy, in that Protestant country, without fear of

ous passage, they, at break of day, on the 9th of November, discovered the land of Cape Cod. Perceiving that they had been carried north of the place of their destination, they stood to the southward, intending to find some place near Hudson's river, for settlement; but they were ultimately induced, by the advanced season of the year, and the weakness of their condition, to relinquish that part of their original design. The master of the ship, availing himself of the fears of the passengers, and of their extreme solicitude to be set on shore, gladly shifted his course to the northward; and it is said he had been clandestinely promised a reward in Holland, if he would not carry the English to the Hudson river. Steering again, therefore, for the cape, the ship was clear of danger before night; and the next day, a storm coming on, they dropped anchor in Cape harbour, where they felt themselves secure.

Never were any civilized people placed more completely in a state of nature than this little band of pilgrims, as they have been justly called. They had, indeed, literally, a world before them; but that world was a wilderness, and Providence was their only guide. Being without the limits of the South Virginia patent, they were destitute of any right to the soil on which they landed; nor had they any powers of government derived from authority. Sensible of the necessity of some compact or form of civil government among themselves, they voluntarily entered into, and subscribed a written constitution.† This brief but comprehensive code of civil government, was signed by forty-one persons. It contained the elements of those forms of government peculiar to the New World. Under this system, John Carver‡ was, by general consent, chosen their first governor, a hierarchy that dealt in fagots and stakes, the religion of their choice. New difficulties beset them here; although they were not persecuted for their belief, they were apprehensive that their children would be led away by the people about them, who were not sufficiently strict for those pilgrims.—The history of these adventurers ought never to be forgotten. It is wonderful to think what changes have been produced in the world by the simple circumstance that a handful of men should have left one continent to find a resting place on another. On the 22d day of December, 1620, a small vessel, of a hundred and eighty tons burthen, not much larger than some of our coasting vessels at this period, on board of which, according to the notions of modern comfort, not more than a dozen passengers could be accommodated for a short voyage, entered the harbour of Plymouth, and from her landed, with the intention of making it a permanent residence, one hundred and one persons. The bleak shores of New England received this little band of pilgrims, at this inclement season of the year, after they had been a hundred and sixty-nine days from Holland, and a hundred and seven from England. The deed was one of daring, and one which could alone have been supported by religion, enthusiasm, and fortitude: their minds were braced up to it; there was something of that glow which beamed from the countenance of the first martyr in every breast of the pilgrims. They had lived nearly eleven years in a strange land, and had learned to concentrate their mental

"confiding," as the electors say, "in his prudence, that he would not adventure upon any matter of moment without the consent of the rest, or, at least, advice of such as were known to be the wisest among them."

Government being thus established, sixteen men, energies, and to bring them to bear on this one purpose—on finding an asylum, where they could, without being molested, enjoy their religion in their own way. The whole time of their exile was one continued training for the enterprise, both as to body and mind. Their great leader and patriarch, John Robinson, was a man of true evangelical piety, and of the most consummate political sagacity; his religious creed was simple and pure—the doctrines of his divine Master. He held in reverence the mighty names of the reformers, but he spurned the thoughts of holding on the skirts of the garments of mortal, sinful man, to raise him to eternal life, and he bade his followers beware of names. His parting blessing to the pilgrims should have a brighter glory than being written in letters of gold, in temples reared by hands; they should be written on the hearts of every Christian republican. His doctrines were the essence of human reasoning, aided by the lights of revelation. He implored them in the name of his Father in heaven; by all they suffered, and by all they enjoyed, to become wiser and better. They followed his principles from love and duty; and every wind that lacerated the branches of the trees they planted, drove the roots deeper into the soil.

The first days of the pilgrims were dark and sorrowful; before the return of spring, many of them had paid the debt of nature: mourning was in every family, and the cold and snowy bosom of the virgin earth had been consecrated by the ashes of their beloved dead, and hallowed by the hopes of the resurrection and the life to come, before the soil had been turned up for the planting of a single vegetable for their sustenance, or a flower had sprung from it by the hand of cultivation. Forty-four had died before the end of March, and the rest were weary and heavy laden with many cares; but the sickened soul has a communion with God that no language can reach; it rests on the promises of revelation, and has a foretaste of immortality.

The settlement of Massachusetts Bay, ten years after the landing of the pilgrims, was in pursuance of the same great plan of enjoying their own thoughts in their own way. This expedition was on a tenfold broader scale than the former, with a better digested system of operations, and, of course, was more successfully executed: but those settlers had days of sickness, of heart-ache, of hardships and trials; but in their march, they cheered the pilgrims, and made their safety a common cause. The usual view of this subject is, that the settlement of New England grew out of the religious persecutions in England, after the death of Elizabeth. I am not content with so confined a view, and will venture on a wider range of thought than this; for I consider the discovery and settlement of this country the greatest event in the history of man, saving and excepting the introduction of our holy religion; and I think I see through the vista of history the finger of God pointing to it for six centuries before its accomplishment. The crusades opened the drama; they did indeed exhaust Europe, ignorant and fanatical Europe, of her best blood and treasure; but they brought home many lessons of experience. They learnt much from the virtues of the infidels they went out to extirpate or proselyte. In the Saracenic character was a sturdiness of virtue, far transcending that which passed well in the Christian world at that time; and that they were far better informed, cannot now be questioned. Every battle, and all the bloodshed of the crusades sprung, from the excitement which at that period awakened the human mind to action; and out of the sum of human errors were brought many true results. In the year 1453, the Turkish emperor turned his sword on Europe; and Constantinople, so long the proud seat of the Greek emperors, fell before his conquering arm. The Christian world was amazed and terrified beyond description: they saw in the standard of the Turk, a meteor, that was to blaze over Europe. Churches were to sink before minarets and mosques; and the Alcoran was to supplant the Sacred Scriptures: but short sighted man was disappointed most happily in this: the arms of the conqueror went no farther, and the seeming evil produced abundance of good. The Mussulman drove out, from this ancient and lovely seat of learning, the Greek scholars and philosophers who had long congregated there, and made them schoolmasters for all Europe. They brought out with them many rich manuscripts, which had been concealed from the greatest portion of the world for ages. Kings, nobles, and sovereign pontiffs, contended with one another for the possession of these treasures; but while they were engaged in this noble strife, the art of printing was discovered; and almost faultless copies of the classics were multiplied, until the humblest scholar could enjoy the company of the poets and orators of ancient days, with the same freedom as the potentates of the earth. From this moment the intellectual world was changed. This invention was at once the sign and the proof, that the world should never again be deluged by a flood of ignorance: not only were the classics disseminated, but the Scriptures also were put into every one's hands. The human mind began to throw off its shackles, and a spirit of free inquiry went abroad. Every one was active in the pursuit of knowledge. This was not all: about this time gunpowder, which had been previously discovered, came into general use, in military and naval warfare, and the campaign was now more often decided by science and skill than by mere physical force.

This change in warfare was absolutely necessary to the settlement of this country, in order that the skill of the few should be equal to the strength of the many. This skill saved the New England colonies in the Pequot war. If printing had not been discovered, in all probability, Columbus would not have received sufficient of the elements of geometry to have assisted him in traversing the Atlantic; and if fire-arms and cannon had not been in use, the handful of Spaniards would not have got a footing on the continent.

The discovery of the new world gave a new spring to human enterprise, opened new trains of thought, new paths of gain and of information. Man, before this period, was more dependant on his own thoughts for improvement than afterwards, when by a rapid circulation of books his mind became enriched by the rays of light from ten thousand other minds. Guided by these new impulses, he arose and swept away the thousand little errors of thinking, and grappled with dogmas, which in former days he feared to touch. The sovereign pontiff, whose ecclesiastical reign was not bounded by seas and empires, grew more proud by this extent of authority, and more lavish of his wealth, believing that the western world was full of gold. Still the fulness of time had not come for planting a colony in New England. It was necessary not only that man should become enlightened and polished, but that his morals should become stricter, and his reasoning powers made more acute and discriminating, before he could set out upon the doctrine of self-government, and to fix his own articles of belief. The awful responsibility of reasoning for one's self had not been for ages assumed. Scintillations of freedom of thought were seen here and there, when Luther burst in a blaze upon the errors of the pontiff, the church, and all who had sustained them. Like other reformers, he was often more zealous than wise, and sometimes laboured harder to correct a folly, than to destroy a false principle; but his ends were noble, and his means honest and primitive. He dared, single-handed, to pluck the wizard beard of hoary error; to meet the idols of wealth and power, with reason and scripture, as his only weapons. He wrestled with ignorance and sophistry; fought bigotry; and unappalled, met tyranny and oppression. With the natural courage of a Cesar, he united the inflexible spirit of the Christian martyr. His labours were wonderful, and their effects still more so. In imitation of his divine master, he entered the temple with a scourge, and drove out the changers of money, the extortioners, and those who daily polluted the sacred fane. But one man, however great his powers, could not reform an age, or correct a church, grown callous and proud, and grasping at still greater sway over the minds of men. Another reformer followed with equal genius, and equal zeal. Luther attacked practices and habits; but Calvin, striving to root out false principles, plunged into the depths of metaphysics, and set the world to reasoning on all abstruse subjects. He came more to reform thoughts and passions, than acts and deeds; still he was not well armed, with a few others, were sent on shore the same day, to fetch wood and make discoveries; but they returned at night without having found any person or habitation. The company, having rested unmindful of these things. In the ways of God, the wrath of man shall praise him; so do his weaknesses, his follies, and his passions; the quarrel between Henry VIII. and the Pope, was another cause of the advancement of true religion. Henry's case proved that all that was done on earth, by man assuming to be holy, was not ratified in heaven; for England flourished notwithstanding all the anathemas launched from the Vatican. After men had begun to reason for themselves in every part of Europe, sects grew up, and boldly assailed the established order of things. Some of them rose in frenzy, and died in shame; but others have continued, and will continue, because they were founded upon immutable principles. Among those who held their faith steadfast and immovable, were our Pilgrim Fathers; for their belief contained what no other creed ever did before—a declaration that it was susceptible of improvement, and with this frank avowal—that God has more truth yet to break forth from his holy word; and it was their firm persuasion, that new lights would constantly arise, and new and refreshing views of the will of God would be given from the Scriptures; that man, as a religious being, was to be progressive, as well as an intellectual one. The pilgrims were of the order called Puritans, and of the sect improperly called Brownites; but the great divine at their head conjured them to sink the name, and they did so among themselves, after they arrived in this country; but the appellation of Pilgrims they retained with fondness; for the first child born among them, on these shores, they baptized Peregrine, in allusion to their wanderings.

Thus the moral, intellectual, religious, and political seed sown on these northern shores, was as pure and as full of life as any ever sown on any soil in any age of the world. In examining the course pursued by the pilgrims, every one must be struck with the strong moral honesty, in their first intercourse with each other. A community of interests they soon found would not answer their purpose, and they came to an amicable understanding of having separate worldly interests, preserving the integrity of ecclesiastical, legislative, and military power. There were still so few of them for many years, and they were so closely connected in every thing, that they understood each other's minds, dispositions, and course of thinking, as well as acting. They were truly one people, of one heart, and of one mind. Labour gave them muscular strength, and their habits of reasoning upon every thing, taught them sagacity and quickness of thought. The philosophy of man as a thinking and an immortal being, tried by the standard of the Scriptures—the nature of governments—the doctrine of equal rights—the duties of rulers—how far obedience to civil institutions should extend—were constant topics of discussion in the labours of the field, in the chase over the hunting grounds, in the fishing smack, or on their travels in search of their foes. The constant alarm they were in for their personal safety, and the protection of their dwellings, instructed them in the true grounds of human courage—a confidence in themselves and in one another. Almost any man will fight bravely who is sure of the courage of his associates. They knew with whom they went out to fight, against whom they were to fight, and for what they fought; not only for their own existence, but for their wives and little ones. It was necessity that made them warriors; there was no prince or potentate to reward their valour; no spoil of an opulent enemy to gain and divide; no wreaths of glory; no buzzes of a grateful people were known to them. To fight well, was an every day duty, and their ties grew stronger by every shock. They were anxious for their offspring; and not for their immediate descendants alone, but for more remote posterity. They wisely came to the conclusion, that a republican government could not be supported without a more than ordinary share of intelligence, and they set about establishing schools on the broadest basis; and declared, that as the community shared in the benefits of a general diffusion of knowledge, they should be at the expense of educating the whole mass of the children. In the seventeenth year of the settlement of Massachusetts Bay, (May, 1647,) they passed this or-during the sabbath, disembarked on Monday, the 13th of November; and soon after proceeded to explore the interior of the country. In their researches they discovered heaps of earth, one of which they dug dinance, the most remarkable on the page of history. It was at once a proud tribute to their ancestors, and a spirited determination of their own, not to suffer their descendants to degenerate. They ordered that every town containing fifty families, or householders, should maintain a school for reading and writing; and that every town that numbered one hundred families or householders, should support a grammar school. The reasons given may seem quaint at the present day, but they are most admirable, and should never be forgotten. Some have attempted to take from them the honour of first establishing public schools at the common expense; this was a vain attempt; our records show the fact without difficulty; and we know that our records are true. The ordinance was carried into effect, if possible, in a more republican manner than one would expect from the very letter of the ordinance; for when a town was divided into school districts, each district was taxed in proportion to its property, and the school money was divided among the districts in proportion to the number of persons in it. And this principle, in many parts of New England, is still extant. The ordinance referred to runs thus: "It being one chief project of Satan, to keep men from the knowledge of the Scriptures, as in former times, keeping them in unknown tongues, so in these latter times, by persuading from the use of tongues, that so at least the true sense and meaning of the original might be clouded and corrupted with false glosses of deceivers; to the end that learning may not be buried in the graves of our forefathers in church and commonwealth, the Lord assisting our endeavours; it is ordered," &c., making the requisitions we have mentioned. In May, 1671, the penalty for neglect of this ordinance was increased; and in October, 1683, it was ordered, that every town, consisting of more than five hundred families or householders, should support two grammar schools and two writing schools. At the very threshold of their political existence, a college was founded; and from that time to this, most liberally supported. The system of parish, town, and county government, gave all, who strove for it, an opportunity to display their talents in some public way; there was no particular rank aside from the elective franchise, for the aspiring youth to bow to for office or favour. A man must then have had regard to the feelings of a virtuous and an enlightened people to rise into power. The government was in its form simple; but there is more wisdom in simplicity than in complexity.

The machinery of government was understood by all, for there were no concealed wires or hidden springs known to a favoured few, but unknown to the mass of the people; and there was but very little party spirit existing among them. The good of the whole was the happiness of each.

For the first century their growth was slow, but solid and hardy. Their numerous wars, and their traffic to the unhealthy climate of the West Indies, made great inroads upon the ranks of those just entering, and of those who had just entered, into life. The whole community were like that class in other countries, in which it has been said, that nearly all virtue and intelligence centres; in the class which has not reached opulence, and yet is above want. Our forefathers put in no claims for ancestral honours or splendid alliances, but they were justly proud of a pure honest blood; there were no left-hand marriages among them, and none of the poison of licentiousness, or the taint of crime. The women were as brave as the men, and a heroic mother seldom has a coward son. He who learns his lessons of valour on the knee of her who bore him, never shrinks from tales of fear, told by other tongues. Pure principles, early instilled into the human mind, where there are no evil communications to corrupt them, generally last through life. The other portions of New England were settled principally by emigrants from the old colony and Massachusetts Bay, and possessed the same characteristics, and have retained them quite as well as the parent states.

Carver did not live long to enjoy this land of religious freedom, for after enacting a few laws, and making a treaty with the In-open, but, finding within implements of war, they concluded these were Indian graves; and therefore, replacing what they had taken out, they left them inviolate. In different heaps of sand they also found baskets of corn, a large quantity of which they carried away in a great kettle, found at the ruins of an Indian house. This providential discovery gave them seed for a future harvest, and preserved the infant colony from famine.* On the 6th of December the shallop was sent out with several of the principal men, to sail round the bay in search of a place for settlement. During their researches, part of the company travelled along the shore, where they were surprised by a flight of arrows from a party of Indians; but, on the discharge of the English muskets, the Indians instantly disappeared. The shallop, after imminent hazard from the loss of its rudder and mast in a storm, and from shoals, which it narrowly escaped, reached a small island on the night of the 8th; here the company reposed themselves, grateful for their preservation during the week; and on this island they kept the sabbath. The day following they sounded the harbour, and found it fit for shipping; went on shore, and explored the adjacent land, where they saw various corn-fields and brooks; and, judging the situation to be convenient for a settlement, they returned with the welcome intelligence to the ship.

On the 23d, as many of the company as could, with convenience, went on shore, and felled and carried timber to the spot appropriated for the erection of a building for common use. On the 25th, they commenced the erection of the first house. A platform for their ordnance demanding the earliest attention, they formed one upon a hill, which commanded an extensive prospect of the plain beneath, of the expanding bay, and of the distant ocean. They divided their whole company into nineteen families; measured out the ground; and assigned to every person by lot half a pole in breadth, and three poles in length, for houses and gardens. In grateful remembrance of the Christian friends whom they found at the last town they left in their native country, they called their settlement Plymouth. Thus was founded the first British town of New England.†

The climate was found much more severe than the colonists had anticipated; and they had arrived when winter was nearly one third advanced. They had every thing to do, and in this season could do very little, even of what was indispensable. Their shelter was wretched; their sufferings were intense; their dangers were not small, and were rendered painful by an absolute uncertainty of their extent. All these evils they encountered with resolution, and sustained with fortitude. To each other they were kind: to the savages they were just: they loved the truth of the gospel; embraced it in its purity; and obeyed it with an excellence of life, which added a new wreath to the character of man.

"Such," says Dr. Dwight, "was the first colonization of this country. Almost every country on this globe has been originally settled by savages; or, if settled by civilized people, has been peopled solely for political or commercial purposes. Here the enjoyment and perpetuation of civil and religious liberty, conformity to the dictates of conscience, and a reverential obedience to the law of God, were the controlling principles. It is not contended that every individual was governed by these principles; but that this was the character of the great body is unanswerably evinced, if history can evince any thing. The manner in which they acted, and the spirit with which they endured distress, both in England and in Holland; the cool determination with which they resolved on so difficult an enterprise; the honourable testimonies which they received from the Dutch magistrates and people; the sacrifices which they made of property, safety, and comfort; the affection which they manifested to each other; the serenity, firmness, and submission with which they sustained the distresses of their voyage; the undiscouraged perseverance with which they encountered danger and suffering after they had landed; the wisdom of the government which they established; the steadiness of their submission to its regulations; their ardent piety to God; and the equity, gentleness, and good-will with which they treated the Indians, form a constellation of excellence eminently brilliant and distinguished. No intelligent Englishman would hesitate to acknowledge it as a luminous spot on the character of his nation; were he not, in a sense, compelled to remember, that he may be descended from those very men, by whose injustice these pilgrims were driven into this melancholy exile."‡

James I. about this time, being dissatisfied with the limited extent of the colony which had proceeded to dians, he died suddenly on the 23d of March, 1621, and was succeeded by Mr. Bradford, as governor. Carver was a man of talents and integrity, and was a great loss to the infant colony,—as these pioneers of religious and political liberty required all that was firm in purpose and steadfast in faith to surmount the difficulties that beset them.—American Editor.

establish his dominion on the vast tract over which he claimed the sovereignty; and the old chartered company of Plymouth having done nothing effectual towards any permanent settlement, he issued a new charter to the duke of Lenox, the marquis of Buckingham, and several other persons of distinction in his court, by which he conveyed to them a right to a territory in America, still more extensive than what had been granted to the former patentees, incorporating them as a body politic, in order to plant colonies there, with powers and jurisdictions similar to those contained in his charters to the companies of South and North Virginia. This society was distinguished by the name of the Grand Council of Plymouth for planting and governing New England; and their patent was the only civil basis of all the subsequent patents and plantations which divided this country. The expectations of the king respecting his new company were, however, disappointed; and after many schemes and arrangements, all the attempts towards colonization proved unsuccessful.

While this was transpiring in England, the New Plymouth colonists were advancing under favourable circumstances. After commencing their town, they took the earliest opportunity to ascertain the state of the surrounding country; and they found, to their surprise, that it had been absolutely depopulated, throughout a considerable extent, by the small pox, a short time before their arrival. This event opened to them a place of settlement, not only without any jealousy, but even with the good wishes of their aboriginal neighbours. The people who had been destroyed were Wampanoags. Massasoit, the chief sachem of his tribe, was continually threatened, after this destruction of his people, by their formidable neighbours, the Narrhagansetts. Having gained some knowledge of the character of the English from one of his own people, named Squanto, or Tisquantum, (one of twenty-four Indians kidnapped, carried off, and sold to the Spaniards of Malaga, by Thomas Hunt, as slaves, but afterwards conveyed to London, and thence again to America,) Massasoit believed, that the colonists might be made useful allies in the present state of his affairs. Accordingly he soon came to Plymouth, and entered into a treaty, offensive and defensive, with the colonists, which he maintained without any serious interruption to his death. He appears to have been a fair, honest, benevolent man. All these circumstances were favourable to the English, but they deemed it prudent to use the means of farther security. They accordingly surrounded the town with fortifications, and erected three gates, which were guarded every day, and locked every night. In the succeeding summer they built a strong and handsome fort, on which cannon were mounted, and a watch kept; it was also used as a place of public worship.

During this year, Thomas Weston, a merchant of good reputation in London, having procured for himself a patent for a tract of land in Massachusetts Bay, arrived with two ships and fifty or sixty men, at his own charge, to settle a plantation at a place since called Weymouth, midway between Plymouth and Boston. But the colonists were of a dissolute character, and therefore totally unqualified for such an enterprise. The Indians whom they abused formed a plot for their destruction, but it was prevented from issuing fatally by the interference of the Plymouth settlers. The colony, however, was ruined the next year. Several other attempts of a similar nature were made soon after, but failed.

Of these fruitless efforts, we can only notice very briefly that of Robert Gorges, son of Sir Ferdinando, sent by the Plymouth council as general governor of New England, who arrived at Massachusetts Bay with several passengers and families, and purposed to begin a plantation at Wessagusset; but he returned home, with scarcely saluting the country within his government. Gorges brought with him William Morrell, an episcopal minister, who had a commission from the ecclesiastical courts in England to exercise a kind of superintendence over the churches which were, or might be, established in New England; but he found no opportunity to execute his commission. This was the first essay for the establishment of a general government in New England; but, like every succeeding attempt, it was totally unsuccessful.

Among the attempts at forming settlements at this time was one of a character as peculiar as it was undesirable. Captain Wollaston began a plantation, which he named after himself. One Morton, of Furnival's inn, was of this company. He was not left in command, but contrived to make himself chief, changed the name of Mount Wollaston to Merry Mount, set all the servants free, erected a may-pole, and lived a life of dissipation, until all the stock intended for trade was consumed.* He was charged with furnishing the Indians with guns and ammuni-

* "Morton took the counsel of the wicked husbandmen about the vineyard in the parable; for making the company merry one night, he persuaded them to turn out Filcher, and keep possession for themselves, promising himself to be a partner with them, and telling them, that otherwise they were like all to be sold for slaves, as were the rest of their fellows, if ever Rasdale returned. This counsel was easy to be taken, as suiting well with the genius of young men, to eat, drink, and be merry, while the good things last-tion, and teaching them the use of them. At length, he made himself so obnoxious to the planters in all parts, that, at their general desire, the people of New Plymouth seized him by an armed force, and confined him, until they had an opportunity of sending him to England.

During the year 1628, the Plymouth colonists obtained a patent for Kennebeck; and up this river, in a place convenient for trade, erected a house, and furnished it with corn and other commodities; and while the trade of their infant colony was thus commencing toward the East, it became also gradually extended toward the west. After this commencement of trade, the Dutch often sent goods to the same place, and a traffic was continued several years. The offers of commercial intercourse made by the Dutch, who were settled upon the Hudson, were willingly accepted; and the arrangements then entered into laid the foundation of an advantageous trade, which was carried on for many years between the English and Dutch plantations, much to their mutual benefit.*

The time was now at hand, when the causes which had induced the voluntary exile of the Leyden congregation should produce an effect far more extensive. Applications to the Plymouth company from puritan congregations were now becoming frequent; and, in the year 1628, the council of Plymouth sold to Sir Henry Roswell and others, their heirs and associates, that part of New England which lies between two boundaries, one three miles north of the Merrimac, and the other three miles south of Charles river, from the Atlantic to the South sea. The same year Mr. Endicot, one of the patentees, came to New England, and planted himself, with a small colony, in Naumkeag, now Salem. The following year they were joined by about two hundred others, making three hundred in the whole, one hundred of whom, however, removed the same year, and settled themselves, with the consent of Mr. Endicot, governor of the colony, at Mishawum, now Charlestown. The second Salem company brought with them a considerable number of cattle, horses, sheep, and goats; which, after a little period, became so numerous as to supply all the wants of the inhabitants. Powers of government were granted to these colonists by Charles I., which constituted them a corporation, by the name of the Governor and Company of Massachusetts Bay, in New England, with power to elect annually a governor, deputy governor, and eighteen assistants; four great and general courts were to be held every year, to consist of the governor, or, in his absence, the deputy governor, the assistants, or at least six of them, and the freemen of the company. These courts were authorized to appoint such officers as they should think proper, and also to make such laws and ordinances for the good and welfare of the company, and for the government of the colony, as to them should seem meet, provided such laws and ordinances should not be contrary or repugnant to the laws of England. The readiness with which this application was acceded to, and the principles on which this charter was constituted, are not easily accounted for, except that Charles and his ecclesiastical counsellors were desirous, at this time, to disencumber the church, in which they meditated extensive innovations, of a body of men, from whom the most unbending opposition to their measures might be expected.

The arbitrary proceedings of the British court, in affairs both of church and state, continued without any abatement, and induced many gentlemen of wealth and distinction to join the Plymouth company, and remove to New England. In 1629, many persons of this character, and among them the distinguished names of Isaac Johnson, John Winthrop, Thomas Dudley, and Sir Richard Saltonstall, proposed to the company to remove, with their families, on condition that the charter and government should be transferred to New England. To this the company assented, and in the course of the next year, John Winthrop, who had been chosen governor, with about one thousand five hundred persons, embarked. The fleet consisted of ten sail, one of which was of three hundred and fifty tons, and, from Lady Arabella Johnson, who sailed in her, was called the Arabella. Among the passengers were a number of eminent nonconformist ministers. The most highly esteemed was Mr. Wilson, the son of a dignitary of the church, who, by his connexions and talents, might have aspired to its highest honours, but chose to renounce all, in order to suffer with those whom he accounted the people of God. But the circumstance which threw a greater lustre on the colony than any other, was the arrival of Mr. John Cotton, the most esteemed of all the puritan

ed, which was not long, by that course which was taken with them, more being flung away in some merry meetings, than, with frugality, would have maintained the whole company divers months. In fine, they in proved what goods they had, by trading with the Indians awhile, and spent it as merrily about a may-pole; and, as if they had found a mine, or spring of plenty, called the place ministers in England. Becoming an object of the persecuting fury of Laud, he left Boston in disguise, and spent some time in London, seeking a proper opportunity to emigrate. There went out with him Mr. Hooker and Mr. Stone, who were esteemed to make a glorious triumvirate, and were received in New England with the utmost exultation. Mr. Cotton was appointed to preach at Boston, now the principal town in Massachusetts Bay, and was mainly employed in drawing up the ecclesiastical constitution of the colony.

Merry Mount. 'Thus stolen waters are sweet, and bread eaten in secret is pleasant,' till it be found, that 'the dead are there, and her guests in the depths of hell.'—Hubbard's Hist. New England, p. 103, 104.

On the arrival of the principal ships of the fleet at Charlestown, the governor and several of the patentees, having viewed the bottom of the Bay of Massachusetts, and pitched down on the north side of Charles river, took lodgings in the great house built there the preceding year, and the rest of the company erected cottages, booths, and tents, about the town hill. Their place of assembling for divine service was under a tree. When the fleet had safely arrived, a day of thanksgiving was kept in all the plantations. Early attention was paid to the great object of the enterprise. On the 30th of July, a day of solemn prayer and fasting was kept at Charlestown, when Governor Winthrop, Deputy Governor Dudley, and Mr. Wilson, first entered into church covenant; and at this time was laid the foundation of the church of Charlestown, and of the first church in Boston. On the 27th of August, the congregation kept a fast, and chose Mr. Wilson their teacher. "We used imposition of hands," says Governor Winthrop, "but with this protestation by all, that it was only a sign of election and confirmation, not of any intent that Mr. Wilson should renounce the ministry he received in England."

On the 23d of August, the first court of assistants, since the arrival of the colonists, was holden at Charlestown. The first question proposed was, How the ministers should be maintained? The court ordered, that houses be built, and salaries raised for them, at the common charge. At the second court of assistants held at Charlestown, it was ordered, that no person should plant in any place within the limits of the patent, without leave from the governor and assistants, or the major part of them; that a warrant should presently be sent to Agawam, to command those who were planted there to come immediately away; and that Trimountain be called Boston; Matapan, Dorchester; and the town on Charles river, Watertown. The governor, with most of the assistants, about this time removed their families to Boston; having it in contemplation to look for a convenient place for the erection of a fortified town.

The first general court of the Massachusetts colony was also held this year at Boston; when many of the first planters attended, and were made free of the colony. It was now enacted, that the freemen should in future elect assistants, who were empowered to choose out of their own number the governor and deputy governor, who, with the assistants, were to have the power of making laws, and choosing officers for their execution. This measure was fully assented to by the general vote of the people; but when the general court met, early the next year, it rescinded this regulation, and ordained, that the governor, deputy governor, and assistants, should be chosen by the freemen alone.

The colony was now gaining strength from its numbers and organization; but it had also its trials to contend with, not the least of which was the sickness arising from the severity of the climate, or, more truly, from the means of counteracting the injurious tendencies of the climate not being yet properly understood. Among those who fell an early sacrifice, none were lamented more than Lady Arabella Johnson and her husband, who had left the abodes of abundance and of social comfort for the American wilderness, purely from religious principle.* As soon as the severity of the winter was abated sufficiently to admit of assemblies being convened, the colonists proceeded to enact laws for their internal regulation. It has been before observed, that those who so resolutely ventured to cross the ocean, and to brave the hardships attendant on clearing the American forests, sought rather to establish churches, than to found a kingdom; it will naturally be sup-

* Cotton Mather, in his Magnalia, bestows this just, though somewhat quaint tribute to their character. "Of those who soon dy'd after their first arrival, not the least considerable was the Lady Arabella, who left an earthly paradise in the family of an earldom, to encounter the sorrows of a wilderness, for the entertainments of a pure worship in the house of God; and then immediately left that wilderness for the heavenly paradise, whereto the compassionate Jesus, of whom she was a follower, called her. We have read concerning a noble woman of Bohemia, who forsook her friends, her plate, her house, and all; and because the gates of the city were guarded, crept through the common sewer, that she might enjoy the institutions of our Lord at another place where they might be had. The spirit which acted that noble woman, we may suppose, carried this blessed lady thus to and thro' the hardships of an American desert. But as for her virtuous husband, Isaac Johnson, Esq.,

—He try'd

To live without her, lik'd it not, and dy'd.

His mourning for the death of his honourable consort was too bitter to be extended a year; about a month after her death, his ensued, unto the extreme loss of the whole plantation. But at the end of this perfect and upright man, there was not only peace, but joy; and his joy particularly expressed itself, that God had kept his eyes open so long as to see one church of the Lord Jesus Christ gathered in these ends of the earth, before his own going away to heaven."—Cotton Mather's Magnalia, p. 21 22.

posed, therefore, that their legislation partook largely of an ecclesiastical character. Indeed the history of this colony (though we shall endeavour to make it as prominently a civil history as the case will admit) presents more matter for the ecclesiastical than the civil historian. At the very first court of election, a law was passed, enacting that none should hereafter be admitted freemen, or be entitled to any share in the government, or be capable of being chosen magistrates, or even as serving as jurymen, but such as had been or should hereafter be received into the church as members.* "This was a most extraordinary order or law," says Hutchinson, "and yet it continued in force until the dissolution of the government, it being repealed in appearance only after the restoration of King Charles II. Had they been deprived of their civil privileges in England by an act of parliament, unless they would join in communion with the churches there, it might very well have been the first in the roll of grievances. But such were the requisites to qualify for church-membership here, that the grievance was abundantly greater."

This is a very interesting, though reprehensible, feature in the history of the New England states. It has been justly observed, by a living author, that the puritans, whom the English dissenters claim as their ancestors, had none of, what he is pleased to term, the latitudinarian ideas which the moderns possess. It does not appear that they disapproved of the principles of persecution; but rather of the extent to which it was carried, and of themselves being its objects. They adhered firmly to the doctrine that the sword of the magistrate should be employed to prevent the promulgation of sentiments differing from their own, never, apparently, having perceived that the principle would also justify the Romish church, and would call upon heathen magistrates to repel all christian instructors by a similar method: thus, what they regarded as pious in themselves, they felt to be iniquitous in others. Surely the dreadful results to which this erroneous principle so speedily led even these excellent men, to their irretrievable disgrace, must stagger, if not convince, the most ardent advocate for the intermixture of the civil power with the spiritual. In censuring, we must however bear in mind, that the light of experience had not shone on them with the lustre it sheds on the present generation, although it must be admitted, that the truth on this point was clearly stated to them by some of the objects of their persecution, especially by Roger Williams,† whose history we shall have more particularly to record.

It has already been observed, that the small-pox

* "None may now be a freeman of that company, unless he be a church member among them; none have voice in elections of governor, deputy, and assistants; none are to be magistrates, officers, or jurymen, grand or petit, but freemen. The ministers give their votes in all elections of magistrates. Now the most of the persons at New England are not admitted of their church, and therefore are not freemen; and when they come to be tried there, be it for life or limb, name or estate, or whatsoever, they must be tried and judged too by those of the church who are, in a sort, their adversaries. How equal that hath been, or may be, some by experience do know, others may judge."—Lechford. "This law at once divested every person who did not hold the prevailing opinions, not only on the great points of doctrine, but with respect to the discipline of the church and the ceremonies of worship, of all the privileges of a citizen. An uncontrolled power of approving or rejecting the claims of those who applied for admission into communion with the church, being vested in the ministers and leading men of each congregation, the most valuable civil rights were made to depend on their decision with respect to qualifications purely ecclesiastical. Even at a later period, when the colonists were compelled, by the remonstrances of Charles II., to make some alteration of this law, they altered it only in appearance, and enacted that every candidate for the privilege of a freeman, should produce a certificate from some minister of the established church, that they were persons of orthodox principles, and of honest life and conversation—a certificate which they who did not belong to the established church necessarily solicited with great disadvantage. The consequence of such laws was to elevate the clergy to a very high degree of influence and authority; and, happily for the colony, she was long blessed with a succession of ministers whose admirable virtues were calculated to counteract the mischief of this inordinate influence, and even to convert it into an instrument of good. Various persons, indeed, resided in peace within the colony, though excluded from political franchises; and one episcopal minister is particularly noted for having said, when he signified his refusal to join any of the colonial congregations, that, as he had left England because he did not like the lord bishops, so they might rest assured he had not come to America to live under the lord brethren."—Grahame, vol. i. p. 263, 264.

† Dr. Dwight makes the following apology for the founders of New England. "Every government in the Christian world claimed, at that time, the right to control the religious conduct of its subjects. This claim, it is true, finds no warrant in the scriptures; but its legitimacy had never been questioned, and therefore never investigated. All that was then contended for was, that it should be exercised with justice and moderation. Our ancestors brought with them to America the very same opinions concerning this subject which were entertained by their fellow-citizens, and by all other men of all Christian countries. As they came to New England, and underwent all the hardships incident to colonizing it, for the sake of enjoying their religion unmolested, they naturally were very reluctant that others, who had borne no share of their burthens, should wantonly intrude upon this favourite object, and disturb the peace of themselves and their families. With these views, they began to exercise the claim which I have mentioned, and, like the people of all other countries, carried the exercise to lengths which nothing can justify. But it ought ever to be remembered, that no other civilized nation can take up the first stone to cast against them. An Englishman certainly must, if he look into the ecclesiastical annals of his own country, be for ever silent on the subject. It ought also to be remembered, that they scrupulously abstained from disturbing all others, and asked nothing of others, but to be unmolested at home."—Dwight, vol. i. p. 134. "It is sufficient to remark," says a writer in the North American Review, "that they never professed themselves the advocates of toleration. Toleration was not a virtue of the age in which they lived; and they ought not to be reproached with the want of it, since they cannot be charged with the opposite error, beyond every other Christian sect of that day. Their grand object was to worship God according to the dictates of conscience, and for this object had devastated the neighbourhood of the English settlements to a very considerable extent. As several of the vacant Indian stations were well chosen, such was the eagerness of the English to take possession of them, that their settlements became more numerous and more widely dispersed than suited the condition of an infant colony. This led to an innovation which totally altered the nature and constitution of the government. When a general court was to be held in 1634, the freemen, instead of attending it in person, as the charter prescribed, elected representatives in their different districts, authorizing them to appear in their name, with full power to deliberate and decide concerning every point that fell under the cognizance of the general court. Before the court proceeded to the choice of magistrates, they asserted their right to a greater share in the government than they had hitherto been allowed, and passed several resolutions, defining the powers of the general court, and ordaining trial by jury. After the election of magistrates, they further determined, that there should be four general courts every year; that the whole body of freemen should be present at the court of election only; and that the freemen of every town might choose deputies to act in their names at the other general courts, which deputies should have the full power of all the freemen. The legislative body thus became settled; and, with but inconsiderable alterations, remained in this form during the continuance of the charter. The colony must henceforward be considered, not as a corporation whose powers were defined, and its mode of procedure regulated by its charter, but as a society, which, having acquired or assumed political liberty, had, by its own voluntary deed, adopted a constitution or government framed on the model of that in England.

The baneful influence of the erroneous principles of the union of the civil and ecclesiastical power now became apparent, in the persecution of the most liberally minded man in the colony, Roger Williams. It is true, that he enthusiastically supported some tenets which were deemed heterodox, and occasioned considerable excitement by inveighing against the use of the cross in the national flag. In consequence of the spread of his opinion, some of the troops would not act till the relic of popery, as they considered it, was cut out of the banner, while others would not serve under any flag from which it was erased. At length a compromise was entered into, by which it was agreed that the obnoxious emblem should be omitted from the banners of the militia, while it was retained in those of the forts. This, however, was only one of the errors charged against Williams; it is said that he maintained that no female should go abroad unless veiled; that unregenerate men ought neither to pray nor to take oaths; that, indeed, oaths had better be altogether omitted; that the churches of New England should not acknowledge or communicate with the hierarchy from which they had separated; that infants should not be subjects of baptism; that the magistrate should confine his authority wholly to temporal affairs; and that James or Charles of England had no right at all to grant away the lands of the Indians without their consent.* For the zealous they sought an asylum in the wilderness of this continent, where they should be removed from the sight of antichristian errors of every description. Nothing was farther from their thoughts, than to build up a republic, in which sectarians and fanatics of every denomination under heaven might mingle their multifarious rites, and confound their modes of Christian worship with their own."—North American Review, vol. ix. p. 375. "In the first moment that they began to taste of Christian liberty themselves, they forgot that other men had an equal title to enjoy it. With an inconsistency, of which there are such flagrant instances among Christians of every denomination, that it cannot be imputed as a reproach peculiar to any sect, the very men who had themselves fled from persecution became persecutors; and had recourse, in order to enforce their own opinions, to the same unhallowed weapons, against the employment of which they had lately remonstrated with so much violence."—Robertson's Hist. America, b. x.

* Lest our readers should be incredulous that many of these positions, which are now considered as indubitable truths, and acted on by most civilized nations, were then regarded as criminal errors, by men who were justly considered the excellent of the earth, we refer them to the following extracts from the authentic histories of Hubbard and Mather.

"Mr. Williams proceeded vigorously to vent many dangerous opinions; as amongst many others, these that follow are some: 1. First, that it was the duty of all the female sex to cover themselves with veils when they went abroad, especially when they appeared in the public assemblies. 2. Another notion diffused by him, occasioned more disturbance; for, in his zeal for advancing the purity of reformation, and abolishing all badges of superstition, he inspired some persons of great interest in that place, that the cross in the king's colours ought to be taken away, as a relic of antichristian superstition. 3. Thirdly, also he maintained, that it is not lawful for an unregenerate man to pray, nor to take an oath, and in special not the oath of fidelity to the civil government; nor was it lawful for a godly man to have any communion, either in family prayer, or in an oath, with such as they judged unregenerate, and therefore he himself refused the oath of fidelity, and taught others so to do. 4. And that it was not lawful, so much as to hear the godly ministers of England, when any occasionally went thither; and therefore he admonished any church members that had so done, as for heinous sin. Also he spake dangerous words against the patent, which was the foundation of the government of the Massachusetts colony. 5. He affirmed also, that magistrates had nothing to do with matters of the first table, but only the second, and that there should be a general and unlimited toleration of all religions, and for any man to be punished for any matters of his conscience, was persecution."—Hubbard's General History of New England, p. 204—206.

"I tell my reader that there was a whole country in America like to be set on fire by the rapid motion of a windmill in the head of one particular man. Know, then, that about the year 1630, arrived here, one Mr. Roger Williams, who, being a preacher that had less light than fire in him, hath, by his own sad example, preached unto us the danger of that evil, which the apostle mentions in Rom. x. 2. 'They have a zeal, but not according to knowledge.' He violently urged, that the civil magistrate might not propagation of these sentiments, he was deemed worthy of banishment from the colony of Massachusetts. The order of the court was, that he should be transported to England; but he escaped the limits of their jurisdiction, repaired to the Narraganset country, and became the founder of a new colony.

There is scarcely any writer that has done the sentiments or character of this eminent, though somewhat eccentric man, even tolerable justice; all his historians are his opponents; and they have evidently laboured hard to justify the proceedings of his persecutors, while they could not conceal the benevolent and unexceptionable character of the far greater portion of his life.* His reputation has, however, been placed in its true light by at least one of the American writers. "The first legislator who fully recognised the rights of conscience," says Mr. Verplanck, "was Roger Williams, a name less illustrious than it deserves to be; for, although his eccentricities of conduct and opinion may sometimes provoke a smile, he was a man of genius and of virtue, of admirable firmness, courage, and disinterestedness, and of unbounded benevolence. After some wanderings, he pitched his tent at a place, to which he gave the name of Providence, and there became the founder and legislator of the colony of Rhode Island. There he continued to rule, sometimes as the governor, and always as the guide and father of the settlement, for forty-eight years, employing himself in acts of kindness to his former enemies, affording relief to the distressed, and offering an asylum to the persecuted. The government of his colony was formed on his favourite principle, that in matters of faith and worship, every citizen should walk according to the light of his own conscience, without restraint or interference from the civil magistrate. During a visit which Williams made to England, in 1643, for the purpose of procuring a colonial charter, he published a formal and laboured vindication of this doctrine, under the title of The Bloody Tenet, or a Dialogue between Truth and Peace. In his work, which was written with his usual boldness and decision, he anticipated most of the arguments, which, fifty years after, attracted so much attention, when they were brought forward by Locke. His own conduct in power was in perfect accordance with his speculative opinions; and when, in his old age, the order of his little community was disturbed by an irruption of quaker preachers, he combated them only in pamphlets and public disputations, and contented himself with overwhelming their doctrines with a torrent of learning, invective, syllogisms, and puns. It should also be remembered, to the honour of Roger Williams, that no one of the early colonists, without excepting William Penn him-punish breaches of the first table in the laws of the ten commandments; which assertion, besides the door which it opened unto a thousand profanities, by not being duly limited, it utterly took away from the authority all capacity to prevent the land, which they had purchased on purpose for their own recess from such things; its becoming such a sink of abominations, as would have been the reproach and ruin of Christianity in these parts of the world. The church taking the advice of their fathers in the state, on this occasion Mr. Williams removed unto Plymouth, where he was accepted as a preacher for the two years ensuing. These things were, indeed, very disturbant and offensive; but there were two other things in his quixotism, that made it no longer convenient for the civil authority to remain unconcerned about him; for, first, Whereas the king of England had granted a royal charter unto the governor and company of this colony, which patent was, indeed, the very life of the colony, this hot-headed man publicly and furiously preached against the patent, as an instrument of injustice, and pressed both rulers and people to be humbled for their sin in taking such a patent, and utterly throw it up, on an insignificant pretence of wrong thereby unto the Indians, which were the natives of the country, therein given to the subjects of the English crown. Secondly, An order of the court, upon some just occasion, had been made, that an oath of fidelity should be, though not imposed upon, yet offered unto the freemen, the better to distinguish those whose fidelity might render them capable of employment in the government; which order this man vehemently withstood, on a pernicious pretence, that it was the prerogative of our Lord Christ alone to have his office established with an oath; and that an oath being the worship of God, carnal persons, whereof he supposed there were many in the land, might not be put upon it. These crimes at last procured a sentence of banishment upon him."—Mather. b. vii. chap. ii.

* Grahame has followed Mather, Hubbard, and Hutchinson, too closely; and has by no means perceived the true merit of his character. We are surprised he should have censured so strongly the objectionable traits, (vol. i. p. 268,) while he has passed over, with but a slight notice, those principles which immortalize the name of Roger Williams. Murray is brief, but, in this case, exercises more penetration, and is more impartial. Even the North American Review seems embarrassed by an attempt to commend both parties: "We are not prepared to defend the proceedings against Roger Williams, and especially the ultimate sentence; but many considerations in extenuation, may be offered. The settlement was in its infancy. Some of the opinions which he pertinaciously inculcated, were dangerous to the establishment; and his conduct, in several particulars, may be justly viewed as seditious. In a more advanced state of the colony, his peculiar sentiments might have been inculcated without hazard, and would, probably, have been less seriously regarded. The new settlement had enemies of powerful influence, and its leaders were compelled to observe the most vigilant course in every transaction. Williams was continually gaining adherents by his perseverance and zeal, and some of his tenets were so extravagant, that their adoption would have convulsed and degraded the country. The leading characters, both in church and state, solicitous for the preservation of the system of religious and civil polity which they had sacrificed and suffered so much to erect, were desirous of recommending it to others by a discreet deportment, which might invite sober and considerate men to unite with them, and repel the malignant suggestions of their enemies." The fact is, the puritan emigrants were decidedly wrong in the principle they laid down as the basis of their commonwealth; and the proof of their error is abundant in the absurdity, injustice, cruelty, and murder, to which it seduced the noblest and purest spirits of the age, results which never arose from the influence of truth. All that can be said in their palliation is, that all the world, except the banished Roger Williams and a few others, were in the same error; and that hundreds of learned and professedly enlightened men found it very hard to abandon the error in the nineteenth century, till touched by the magic wand of the greatest captain of the age, and the first lord of the richest treasury in the world.

self, equalled him in justice and benevolence towards the Indians.”*

While the colonies were occupied with internal disputes, the English parliament, inquiring into the grievances of the nation, had turned their attention to the charters of the New England states; and deeming them injurious monopolies, both that of Plymouth and Massachusetts were declared forfeited to the king, and the colonies removed from the jurisdiction of the companies to that of the crown, an arrangement which, for some time, proved rather beneficial than detrimental.

During the year 1635, no less than three thousand persons arrived in New England.† Among them was Henry Vane, a young man of noble family, animated with a devotion to the cause of religion and liberty, which induced him to relinquish all his hopes in England, and settle in an infant colony which as yet afforded little more than a bare subsistence to its inhabitants: he was naturally received in New England with high regard and admiration, and was instantly complimented with the freedom of the colony. Enforcing his claims to respect by the address and ability which he showed in conducting business, he was elected governor in the year subsequent to his arrival, by the universal consent of the colonists, and with the highest expectations of an advantageous administration. These hopes, we shall find in the sequel, were by no means realized. He entered too deeply into polemical theology, to allow him to devote the energies of his mind to the civil and political duties which afforded so abundant a field for their exercise. During his administration, the increase which had taken place in the colony promoted the settlement of Connecticut, and indirectly led to the war with the Pequod Indians, both of which circumstances we shall notice in the history of that state.

A brief period elapsed after the expulsion of Roger Williams, before the repose of the colony was again interrupted by religious dissensions. The puritans had transported, with their other religious practices, that of assembling one evening in the week to converse over the discourses of the preceding sabbath; a proceeding well calculated to keep alive that zeal which arises from the vigorous exercise of private judgment, but not to promote the subserviency requisite to a quiet submission to the uniformity of authorized opinions. These meetings had been originally confined to the brethren; but Mrs. Hutchinson,‡ a lady of respectable station in life, of considerable

† It was at this time that Charles I. prevented Pym, Hampden, and Cromwell, from emigrating to New England. The destitution of foresight with which despots are frequently visited, cannot but be admired as one of the most excellent arrangements of a merciful Providence. Two Charleses now have set their seal to the truth of this proverb, “Quem Deus vult perdere, prius dementat.”

‡ It often happens, that persons live in an age too early to have their merits duly estimated. This was the case of Galileo and others, who have done much for mankind. It often takes whole ages to set history right upon matters of fact and opinion. No person, in our annals, has suffered more obloquy without cause, than Mrs. Hutchinson. She came with her husband from Lincolnshire to Boston, in 1636. Her husband was a man of note, being a representative of Boston, and in good repute. Mrs. Hutchinson was a well educated, shrewd woman; she was a great admirer of Mr. Cotton, then a popular preacher in Boston, with whom, it is probable, she was well acquainted in England, as they came from the same county. She was ambitious and active, and was delighted with metaphysical subtleties and nice distinctions. She had a ready pen, and a fine memory, and from the habit of taking notes in church, she possessed herself of all the points in Mr. Cotton's sermons, which she was fond of communicating to others of less retentive faculties. She held conference meetings at her own house, and commented on the great doctrines, of salvation. She entertained several speculative opinions, that, in the present state of intelligence, would be considered as harmless as a poet's dream, but which, at that time, “threw the whole colony into a flame.” Every household was fevered by religious discussions upon covenants of faith and covenants of works, always the most bitter of all disputes. In all probability, the vanity of Mrs. Hutchinson was raised, to see that she could so easily disturb the religious and metaphysical world about her; and no doubt, but that the persecutions she suffered, made her more obstinate than she otherwise would have been. If they had let her alone, her doctrines would have passed away with a thousand other vagaries; but the clergy would not suffer this to be, notwithstanding they risked something in calling this popular woman to an account. She was considered wiser and more learned in the scriptures than all her opponents. She had powerful friends. Sir Henry Vane, the governor, a popular young man, of large wealth, was her friend, and Cotton and Wheelwright, the ministers, were her warm supporters, and had a profound respect for her talents and virtues; but still the majority of the clergy was against her.

In 1637 a synod was called, the first in our history, which was held in conclave at Cambridge. It was composed of the governor, the deputy governor, the council of assistants, and the teachers and the elders of churches. They sat in conclave for fear of the people, particularly Mrs. Hutchinson's followers. Her friend, Sir Henry Vane, was no longer in the chair of state. In this body she was charged with heresy, and called upon to defend herself before these inquisitors. The charges and specifications were numerous, as is proved by the judgment of the court. Before the tribunal she stood for three weeks, defending herself against a body of inquisitors, who were at once the prosecutors, the witnesses, and the judges. The report of the trial is said to be from the minutes of Governor Winthrop, certainly not from her own brief. The charges from the governor, who presided, were vituperations and vague, consisting of general matters, rather than of special allegations; to all of which she returned the most acute and pregnant answers, evincing a mind of the first order. One after another of her judges questioned and harangued, but she never lost her self-possession. The only circumstance in the whole case that shows the sincerity of her judges, is the report they have made of her trial. Her judges were the first in the land, comprising every one in the colony, who had not fallen under the suspicion of having been her friend. That intolerant old Dudley, the lieutenant governor, was the most inveterate of her enemies. Cotton, who was called as a witness, behaved well, and, grave and holy as he was, was treated with great severity as a witness. On the whole, they proved nothing against her, but that she had expressed her own opinions freely, and supported them manfully, by unanswerable texts of scripture. No defence ever recorded in profane history has ever been equal to this. Socrates before his judges did not meet his ac-native talent, and of affable manners, deemed it desirable that the sisters should also exercise a similar privilege. Unfortunately, it was not long before this lady and her associates discovered that there would be much more propriety in their instructing their ministers than in the reverse process, which had hitherto prevailed. They adopted that most convenient dogma, that good works are no evidence of being a true Christian, or one of the elect; and that the only testimony to a state of justification, was the overpowering assurance of the mind, produced by the immediate influence of the divine Spirit. It is not our place to discuss doctrines, but to record facts; or it would not be difficult to demonstrate, that it is through the incongruous and irrational ideas which have existed among the great mass of those who have been accustomed to deem themselves sound in doctrine, that these vagaries have acquired and maintained so utterly undeserved a prominence in what is termed the religious world. It has ever been a prime manœuvre of the great enemy of man, to connect the most magnificent truths with the most absurd errors; and thus to raise a cloud which encircles itself with the brilliancy of that very orb whose rays it obscures.

The disturbance occasioned by the propagation of these offensive sentiments, was aggravated by the circumstance of the governor, Mr. Vane, being their decided advocate. Vehement discussions and bitter accusations abounding; but the antinomian party, though most zealous, were least numerous; and at the annual election, Mr. Vane was displaced by Mr. Winthrop, by a very decided majority. After various cusers with half the acuteness. Eugene Aram's defence had not the same directness and power nor that of Maria Antoinette more high mindedness. St. Paul's alone, before the Areopagi, can bear any comparison. He was charged of introducing a new God, which, by an Athenian law, was death, to prevent an increase of their catalogue of divinities. He escaped by declaring that he had not enlarged their number, but that he taught them who was the unknown God, whose temple he had seen among them, and whose name was inscribed on its walls.

Instead of raising a monument, as they should have done, to this most acute metaphysician and eloquent defender of herself, they found her guilty of more than eighty heretical opinions; but fortunately for themselves, they did not venture to specify them in her sentence, but ordered her to recant and renounce them, under the penalty of excommunication and banishment. Mrs. Hutchinson was firm; she made a fair explanation, but would not renounce what she conscientiously believed to be right, and was accordingly banished. She went to Rhode Island, but did not long remain there. After the death of her husband, in 1642, she went to the Dutch country beyond New Haven, and was, with most of her large family, massacred by the Indians. This, the superstitious considered as a judgment, "for many evils in her conversation, as well as for corrupt opinions;" and to this day she is called an artful woman, but not one of her accusers dare name one of those evils of conversation, and but two or three of those corrupt opinions. The writer feels ashamed of the land of his birth, in reading the whole course of this fanatical and unjust sentence, but would not measures had been resorted to, in order to bring the dissentients within the pale of orthodoxy, a synod was called, which determined that the sentiments of Mrs. Hutchinson and her followers were grievously erroneous, and, as they still refused submission, the favourite measure of banishment was had recourse to. Another accession was thus made to the "alluvies," as Mather terms it, of Rhode Island; but not finding that land of liberty perfectly to her taste, Mrs. Hutchinson removed to a Dutch plantation, where, not long after, she was basely murdered, with many of her family, by the Indians.*

While these transactions were occurring in America, the enemies of the colonists in England were busily engaged in promoting the destruction of the Massachusetts charter. That of Plymouth had been already surrendered. "The principal reasons assigned for this surrender were, that the people of Massachusetts had improperly extended the limits of their patent, so as to include lands granted to others, and that in civil and ecclesiastical affairs, they had made themselves independent of the council, as well as the crown. These evils, the council said, they were unable to remedy; and therefore deemed it necessary for his majesty to take the whole business into his own hands.† Soon after the surrender of the Plymouth charter, a quo warranto was issued against that of Massachusetts. The writ was served only on those in England, who either then were, or had been members of the company; but no notice was given to the company in New England. Some on whom the writ was served in England appeared, and disclaimed any right under the charter, others have it erased from the records, as it is calculated to humble the pride of the infallible bigot, and serves as a good lesson for modern times, in more than in one instance. That woman must have been of virtuous life, that such a band of inquisitors could not find cause to condemn, except as to opinions. The whole story is a lesson, for it shows, that men, in a body, may do that which but few of them, separately, would dare to support. In that body were to be found the learned Phillips, the apostle Elliot, the honest Welde, with many other excellent men, who voted against the great female metaphysician of her time. Three only of the synod had the courage to dissent from the judgment. It seems, after all, that the sentence was more a matter of policy than of law, as may be drawn from the scantiness of the record on this head; for Winthrop was an acute lawyer, and if he had found any thing which he dared to put on record, in justification of this body, it would have been found there. That they should have erred, is not surprising; but that historians of a later age should have continued to justify them, is astonishing, and shows how little independence or original thinking there is among those who venture to call themselves historians.—American Editor.

* Various other persons, besides the immediate adherents of Mrs. Hutchinson, were dissatisfied with the proceedings of the synod and council of Massachusetts, migrated from the colony, and assisted in the formation of the settlements of Rhode Island, New Hampshire, and Maine; the circumstances of which will be recorded at length in the history of those states.

were defaulted, and the rights and franchises in the charter were seized and taken into the hands of the king, so far as those in England were concerned, and the other patentees were outlawed. No judgment, in form, was ever rendered against the corporation itself. Not satisfied with this proceeding, a special order was sent by the lords of trade and plantations, to Massachusetts, in April, 1638, requiring the governor, or such other person as had the custody of the charter, to transmit the same by the return of the ship which carried the order, with a threat, in case of neglect or refusal, that the king would resume the whole plantation into his own hands. The general court of Massachusetts, before whom this order was laid, resolved not to send the charter, but presented an humble petition to the commissioners. The colonists found on this, as on many other occasions, the advantage of the delay arising from their distance from the mother country; for, while these negotiations were pending, the disputes between Charles and his parliament acquired an importance that left little opportunity for the monarch to trouble himself with colonial affairs; and thus the charter of Massachusetts, and the liberties of New England, were preserved.*

Scarcely had the venerable founders of New England felled the trees of the forest, when they began to provide means to insure the stability of their colony. Learning and religion they wisely judged to be the firmest pillars of the commonwealth. The legislature of Massachusetts, having previously founded a public school or college, had, the last year, directed its establishment at Newtown, and appointed a committee to carry the order into effect. The liberality of an individual now essentially contributed to the completion of this wise and benevolent design.

* A copy of Charles's "commission for regulating the plantations;" of the "letter of the lords of the council for the patent of the plantation to be sent to them;" and of the "humble petition of the Massachusetts in the general court there assembled;" are all to be found in Hubbard's History, chap. xxxvi.

John Harvard, a worthy minister, dying this year at Charleston, left a legacy of nearly 800*l.* to the public school at Newtown. In honour of their benefactor, the collegiate school was, by an order of court, named Harvard College; and Newtown, in compliment to the institution, and in memory of the place where many of the first settlers of New England received their education, was called Cambridge.† At this time also, Rowley, in Massachusetts, was founded by about sixty industrious families from Yorkshire, under the guidance of Ezekiel Rogers, an eminent minister. These settlers, many of whom had been clothiers in England, built a fulling mill; employed their children in spinning cotton wool; and were the first who attempted to make cloth in North America. A still more important branch of business was introduced this year, that of printing, the first press ever used in North America being established at Cambridge.‡

The colony of Massachusetts, as well as its rural neighbours, continued rapidly to increase. In the year 1639, a settlement was begun on the north side of Merrimack, called Salisbury; and another at Winicowet, called Hampton.

New England was henceforth to be left almost exclusively to her own resources. The state of affairs in England was now reversed; and the persecuting power of Charles was wrested from his grasp. The principal motive to emigration, therefore, no longer existed; indeed, several of the most considerable colonists, and many of the ministers in New England, returned to their native country;§ but the great majority of the settlers had experienced so much happiness in the societies which had been formed in the colony, that they felt themselves united to New England by stronger feelings than those of attachment to their native soil, and resolved to remain in the region which their virtue had converted from a wilderness into a garden.

There does not appear to be any authentic statement of the population of the New England colonies at this period. It would seem to have been under twenty thousand.* In the twenty years which had elapsed since the settlement of Plymouth, nearly three hundred vessels had transported more than twenty-one thousand persons across the Atlantic, at the immense cost of nearly 200,000*l.* an amazing sum in that age, which nothing but the determined and persevering zeal which animated the puritans could have induced them to expend, in the laborious work of converting a vast wilderness into the abode of civilized man.†

The following year, the general court of Massachusetts established one hundred laws, called The Body of Liberties.‡ Having already been submitted to the court, and sent into every town for consideration, they were now amended, and were to remain in force for the term of three years; after that period, to be again revised, and established in perpetuity. As it is in the laws of an infant people that we trace their principles, and discover their policy, a sketch of the most remarkable laws in the first New England code is introduced. It was enacted, that there never should be any bond-slavery, villanage, or captivity, among the inhabitants of the province, except in lawful captives taken in just wars, or such as should willingly sell themselves, or be sold to them; and such should have the liberties and Christian usage which the law of God, established in Israel concerning such persons, morally requires: That if any strangers, or people of other nations, professing the Christian religion, should fly to them from tyranny or oppression of their persecutors, or from famine, wars, or the like necessary and compulsory cause, they should receive entertainment and succour: That there should be no monopolies, but of such new inventions as were profitable to the country, and those for a short time only: That all deeds of conveyance, whether absolute or conditional, should be recorded, that neither creditors might be defrauded, nor courts troubled with vexatious suits and endless contentions about sales and mortgages: That no injunction should be laid on any church, church officer, or member, in point of doctrine, worship, or discipline, whether for substance or circumstance, besides the institution of the Lord; and that, in the defect of a law, in any case, the decision should be by the word of God.

The dispersed situation of the New England colonists rendered union among them necessary, not only for their mutual defence against the savages, but also for protection and security against the claims and encroachments of the Dutch. This union, or confederation, was formed in 1643, by the name of The United Colonies of New England. It had been proposed by the colonies of Connecticut and New Haven, as early as 1638, but was not finally completed until five years after. This confederacy, which continued about forty years, constituted an interesting portion of the political history of New England. It consisted of the colonies of Massachusetts, New Plymouth, Connecticut, and New Haven. By the articles of confederation, as they were called, these colonies entered into a firm and perpetual league of friendship and amity, for offence and defence, mutual advice and succour, upon all just occasions, both for preserving and propagating the truth and liberties of the gospel, and for their own mutual safety and welfare. Each colony was to retain its own peculiar jurisdiction and government; and no other plantation or colony was to be received as a confederate, nor any two of the confederates to be united into one jurisdiction, without the consent of the rest. The affairs of the united colonies were to be managed by a legislature, to consist of two persons, styled commissioners, chosen from each colony. The commissioners were to meet annually in the colonies, in succession, and when met, to choose a president, and the determination of any six to be binding on all.§ This confederacy, which was declared to be perpe-

* Grahame says, "about twenty-one thousand persons," (vol. i. p. 302,) but this is evidently the gross number of those who emigrated during the twenty years; and the probability is, that the actual population at this period was considerably short of that number.

† "They, who then professed to be able to give the best account, say, that in two hundred and ninety-eight ships, which were the whole number from the beginning of the colony, there arrived twenty-one thousand two hundred passengers, men, women, and children, perhaps about four thousand families. A modest computation then made of the whole charge of transportation of the persons, their goods, the stock of cattle, provisions until they could support themselves, necessaries for building, artillery, arms, and ammunition, amounts to 192,000*l.* sterling. A dear purchase, if they had paid nothing before to the council of Plymouth, and nothing afterwards to the sachems of the country. Well might they complain, when the titles to their lands were called in question by Sir Edmund Andros; their labour in clearing and improving them was of more value than the lands after they were improved, and this other expense might be out of the question."—Hutchinson, vol. i. p. 93.

tual, continued without any essential alteration, until the New England colonies were deprived of their charter by the arbitrary proceedings of James II. This union evidently served as the basis of the great confederacy afterwards formed between the thirteen states of America. An examination of the two systems will prove a similarity not only in names, but in general principles.*

The contest between the king and the parliament at length resulted in open war; and the New England colonies, actuated by the same feeling as the puritans in England, embraced with ardour the cause of the latter. The parliament, however, did not lose sight of its right to govern the colonies; and in 1643, they passed an ordinance, no less remarkable for the extent of power exerted, than for the extraordinary regulations it established. By it, the Earl of Warwick was appointed governor-in-chief and lord high-admiral of the colonies, with a council of five peers and twelve commoners to assist him. It empowered him, in conjunction with his associates, to examine the state of their affairs; to send for papers and persons; to remove governors and officers, appointing others in their place; and to assign over to these such part of the powers that were then granted as he should think proper. Such was the authority which the parliament exerted over its transatlantic dominions. The colonists implicitly admitted its rectitude, by applying to the commissioners for protection and patents. The right of parliament, indeed, was not doubted in those days; it was the irregular exertion of prerogative, and not the authority into combination with any of the confederates, and all things of a like nature, which are the proper concomitants and consequences of such a confederation for amity, offence and defence, not intermeddling with the government of any of the jurisdictions, which, by the third article, is preserved entirely to themselves. The expenses of all just wars to be borne by each colony, in proportion to its number of male inhabitants, of whatever quality or condition, between the ages of sixteen and sixty. In case any colony should be suddenly invaded, on motion and request of three magistrates of such colony, the other confederates were immediately to send aid to the colony invaded, in men, Massachusetts one hundred, and the other colonies forty-five each, or for a less number, in the same proportion. The commissioners, however, were very properly directed, afterwards, to take into consideration the cause of such war or invasion, and if it should appear that the fault was in the colony invaded, such colony was not only to make satisfaction to the invaders, but to bear all the expenses of the war. The commissioners were also authorized to frame and establish agreements and orders in general cases of a civil nature, wherein all the plantations were interested, for preserving peace among themselves, and preventing, as much as may be, all occasions of war, or difference with others, as about the free and speedy passage of justice, in every jurisdiction, to all the confederates equally as to their own, receiving those that remove from one plantation to another, without due certificates. It was also very wisely provided in the articles, that runaway servants, and fugitives from justice, should be returned to the colonies where they belonged, or from which they had fled. If any of the confederates should violate any of

of the legislature, that was dreaded as unconstitutional, or feared as oppressive.

The increasing prosperity of the colony naturally tended to heighten the value of its political franchises; and the increasing opulence of the dissentients, already alluded to, seemed to aggravate the hardship of their disfranchisement. Some of them having assumed privileges from which they were excluded by law, they were punished by Mr. Winthrop, the deputy governor. They complained to the general court of this treatment by a petition, which contained a forcible remonstrance against the injustice of depriving them of their rights as freemen, and of their privileges as Christians, because they could not join as members with the congregational churches, or because, when they solicited admission into them, they were arbitrarily rejected by the ministers. "They prayed," says Hutchinson,* "that civil liberty and freedom might be forthwith granted to all truly English, and that all members of the church of England or Scotland, not scandalous, might be admitted to the privileges of the churches of New England; or, if these civil and religious liberties were refused, that they might be freed from the heavy taxes imposed upon them, and from the impresses made of them, or their children, or servants, into the war; and if they failed of redress there, they should be under a necessity of making application to England to the honourable houses of parliament, who they hoped would take their sad condition into consideration." The party in favour of the dissenters had sufficient interest to obtain a the articles, or in any way injure any one of the other colonies such breach of agreement, or injury, was to be considered and ordered by the commissioners of the other colonies."—Pitkin's Political History, vol. i. p. 51.

* "The principles upon which this famous association was formed were altogether those of independency, and it cannot easily be supported upon any other. The colonies of Connecticut and New Haven had at that time enjoyed no charter, and derived their title to their soil from mere occupancy, and their powers of government from voluntary agreement. New Plymouth had acquired a right to their lands from a grant of a company in England, which conferred, however, no jurisdiction. And no other authority, with regard to the making of peace, or war, or leagues, did the charter of Massachusetts convey, than that of defending itself, by force of arms, against all invaders. But, if no patent legalized the confederacy, neither was it confirmed by the approbation of the governing powers in England. Their consent was never applied for, and was never given. The various colonies, of which that celebrated league was composed, being perfectly independent of one another, and having no other connexion than as subjects of the same crown, and as territories of the same state, might, with equal propriety and consistency, have entered into a similar compact with alien colonies, or a foreign nation. They did make treaties with the neighbouring plantations of the French and Dutch; and in this light was their conduct seen in England, and at a subsequent period did not fail to attract the attention of Charles II."—Chalmer's Political Annals, b. i. chap. viii. p. 178.

vote to require Mr. Winthrop to answer in public to the complaints against him. On the day appointed for his trial he descended from the tribunal, and placing himself at the bar, in presence of a numerous assemblage of the inhabitants, he proceeded to vindicate his conduct to his judges and fellow-citizens. Having proved that his proceedings were warranted by law, and that it had no other end than to maintain the existing institutions, he was not only honourably acquitted by the sentence of the court, and the voice of the public, but recommended so powerfully to the esteem of his fellow-citizens by this and all the other indications of his character, that he was chosen governor of the province every year after, as long as he lived.* His accusers were visited with public displeasure; their petition was dismissed, and a charge was drawn up against them; but it was intimated, that if they would acknowledge their offence they should be forgiven; they, however, refused, and were fined in various sums, two or three of the magistrates dissenting. The petitioners, animated by opposition, rather than overborne by oppression, resolved to lay their condition before the supreme power; and, with this design, two deputies were sent to England. The famous Cotton had asserted, in one of his sermons, "that, if any shall carry writings or complaints against the people of God in that country to England, it would be as Jonas in the ship;" and a storm unfortunately arising during the voyage, the mariners, often prone to superstition, recollected this prediction, and insisted that all obnoxious papers should be thrown overboard; thus the deputies were constrained to consign their credentials to the waves. The parliament, probably influenced by the intrigues of the agents, or too much engaged in their own important affairs, took no cognizance of this extraordinary transaction; and the petitioners never received any redress.†

* We cannot refrain from presenting our readers with an extract of his admirable and powerful address:—"The questions," said Mr. Winthrop, "that have troubled the country, have been about the authority of the magistracy and the liberty of the people. It is you who have called us unto this office; but being thus called, we have our authority from God. I entreat you to consider, that when you choose magistrates, you take them from among yourselves, men subject unto like passions with yourselves. If you see our infirmities, reflect on your own, and you will not be so severe censurers of ours. The covenant between us and you is the oath you have exacted of us, which is to this purpose, 'That we shall govern you and judge your causes according to God's laws and the particular statutes of the land, according to our best skill.' As for our skill, you must run the hazard of it; and if there be an error only therein, and not in the will, it becomes you to bear it. Nor would I have you to mistake in the point of your own liberty. There is a liberty of corrupt nature, which is affected both by men and beasts, to do what they list. This liberty is inconsistent with authority; impatient of all restraint, 'tis the grand enemy of truth and peace, and all the ordinances of God are bent against it. But

How refreshing is it to turn from the mutual recriminations of religious controversy, and the hateful sight of ecclesiastical persecution, to the contemplation of that expansive benevolence which is the true genius of Christianity! History is essentially biographical to a considerable extent; but there are occasions when her pencil is called to trace, with peculiar vividness, the moral dignity and beauty of her heroes; and what name shall arouse her boldest efforts, if that of Elliot does not call them forth? When the wreaths of literary, scientific, and even the most glittering, though least enviable of all, of military fame, whose leaves have never been tinged with the unction of eternity, shall fade amidst the brilliancy of holier and more resplendent honours, whose crown will shine more brightly than that of the Indians' father and friend? His labours form the redeeming trait of an age, that might justly be termed one of the most vigorous religious selfishness. Why were not the gigantic energies more than wasted in the pugnacious defence of men-made forms of Christianity, devoted to spread its essence among the heathen, by whom they were surrounded, or to whom they could have obtained access? Hardships for the sake of religion the puritan colonists endured, indeed, abundantly; but that it was for their own enjoyment rather than the benefit of others, is evident, from their treating those who differed from their opinions as though they robbed them of their property. But Elliot was of a nobler mould; he banished not others for his fancied good, but himself, for the welfare of the ignorant and oppressed.

Elliot was one of the ministers of Roxbury. Strongly penetrated with a sense of the duty of redeeming to the dominion of religion and civilization the wastes of human character that lay in ignorance and idolatry around him, he had for some time been labouring to overcome the primary obstacle to its per-there is a civil, a moral, a federal liberty, which is the proper end and object of authority: it is a liberty for that only which is just and good. For this liberty you are to stand with the hazard of your very lives; and whatsoever crosses it is not authority, but a distemper thereof. This liberty is maintained in a way of subjection to authority; and the authority set over you will, in all administrations for your good, be quietly submitted unto by all but such as have a disposition to shake off the yoke, and lose their true liberty by their murmuring at the honour and power of authority." We cordially agree with Mr. Grahame, when he says, "The circumstances in which this address was delivered, remind us of scenes in Greek and Roman history; while the wisdom, worth, and dignity that it breathes, resemble the magnanimous vindication of the judge of Israel;" and we must add, that the whole history of the rise and progress of these states is more calculated to instruct and elevate the mind, than the scenes of ancient history; and that it is a great discredit to our schools, colleges, and universities, that the study of modern history in general, and this portion of it particularly, does not form an essential part of a liberal education.

formance; at length he attained such acquaintance with the Indian language as enabled him to construct a system of grammar.* His kindness of manner soon gained him a favourable hearing from many of the natives; and both parties being sensible of the expediency of altering the civil and domestic habits that counteracted the impressions which he attempted to produce, he obtained from the general court an allotment of land in the neighbourhood of the settlement of Concord, in Massachusetts. A considerable body of Indians resorted to the land allotted them by the colonial government, and exchanged their wild and barbarous habits for the modes of civilized living and industry. Mr. Elliot was continually among them, instructing, animating, and directing them.

In endeavouring to extend their missionary influence among the surrounding tribes, Mr. Elliot and his associates encountered a variety of issues corresponding to the varieties of human character. Many, indeed, expressed the utmost abhorrence and contempt of Christianity; but, in spite of every discouragement, the missionaries persisted, and at length their labours were rewarded with astonishing success.†

That our readers may have authentic testimony on which to form a correct idea of its extent—the more as it affords a striking contradiction to the still lurking half-prevailing antinomianism, that the Eternal, whose very nature is benevolence, withholds his sanction and blessing from the labours of his faithful servants out of pure sovereignty—we insert the following document:—

* Dr. Cotton Mather has, almost humorously, described the difficulty of acquiring the Indian language, and giving it a graphic form: "Behold new difficulties to be surmounted by our indefatigable Elliot! He hires a native to teach him this exotic language, and, with a laborious care and skill, reduces it into a grammar, which afterwards he published. There is a letter or two of our alphabet which the Indians never had in theirs; but if their alphabet be short, I am sure the words composed of it are long enough to tire the patience of any scholar in the world; they are sesquipedalia verba, of which their lingo is composed; one would think they had been growing ever since Babel, unto the dimensions to which they are now extended. For instance, if my reader will count how many letters there are in this one word, Nummatchekodtantamooongannnonash, when he has done, for his reward I'll tell him, it signifies no more in English, than 'our lusts;' and if I were to translate 'our loves,' it must be nothing shorter than Noovoman-tammooonkanunnonash. Or, to give my reader a longer word than either of these, Kummogkodonatlooltummoetiteaongannnonash, is, in English, 'our question;' but I pray, Sir, count the letters! Nor do we find in all this language the least affinity to, or derivation from, any European speech that we are acquainted with."—We think the folly of good men as useful to posterity as their virtues; and we claim sacred story as our authority; and therefore we continue the extract:—"I know not what thoughts it will produce in my reader when I inform him, that once finding that the dæmons in a possessed young woman understood the Latin and Greek and Hebrew languages, my curiosity led me to make trial of this Indian

"A LETTER CONCERNING THE SUCCESS OF THE GOSPEL AMONGST THE INDIANS IN NEW ENGLAND.

"Written by MR. INCREASE MATHER, Minister of the Word of God, at Boston, and Rector of the College at Cambridge, in New England, to DR. JOHN LEUSDEN, Hebrew Professor in the University of Utrecht.

"TRANSLATED OUT OF LATIN INTO ENGLISH.

"WORTHY AND MUCH HONOURED SIR,

"YOUR letters were very grateful to me, by which I understand that you and others in your famous university of Utrecht desire to be informed concerning the converted Indians in America: take, therefore, a true account of them in a few words:—

"It is above forty years since that truly godly man, Mr. John Elliot, pastor of the church at Rocksborough, (about a mile from Boston, in New England,) being warmed with a holy zeal of converting the Americans, set himself to learn the Indian tongue, that he might more easily and successfully open to them the mysteries of the gospel, upon account of which he has been (and not undeservedly) called the Apostle of the American Indians. This reverend person, not without very great labour, translated the whole bible into the Indian tongue; he translated also several English treatises of practical divinity and catechisms into their language. About twenty-six years ago he gathered a church of converted Indians in a town called Natick; these Indians con-language, and the dæmons did seem as if they did not understand it!"—Mather's Magnalia, b. iii. p. 193.

† "It is a remarkable feature in Elliot's long and arduous career, that the energy by which he was actuated never sustained the slightest abatement, but, on the contrary, evinced a steady and vigorous increase. As his bodily strength decayed, the energy of his being seemed to retreat into his soul, and at length all his faculties (he said) seemed absorbed in holy love. Being asked, shortly before his departure, how he did, he replied, 'I have lost every thing, my understanding leaves me, my memory fails me, my utterance fails me; but I thank God my charity holds out still, I find that rather grows than fails.' He died in the year 1690. While Mr. Elliot and an increasing body of associates were thus employed in the province of Massachusetts, Thomas Mayhew, a man who combined, in a wonderful degree, an affectionate mildness that nothing could disturb with an ardour and activity that nothing could overcome, together with a few coadjutors, not less diligently and successfully, prosecuted the same design in Martha's Vineyard, Nantucket, and Elizabeth Isles, and within the territory comprehended in the Plymouth patent."—Grahame, vol. i. p. 326, 329.

"On the publication of the accounts of the hopeful progress of the Indians in New England in the knowledge of the gospel, the attention of the English nation was excited to the subject. By the solicitation of Edward Winslow, then in England as agent for the United Colonies, an act of parliament was passed, by which the Society for propagating the Gospel in New England was incorporated."—Holmes's American Annals, vol. i. p. 290.

fessed their sins with tears, and professed their faith in Christ, and afterwards they and their children were baptized, and they were solemnly joined together in a church covenant ; the said Mr. Elliot was the first that administered the Lord's supper to them. The pastor of that church now is an Indian, his name is Daniel. Besides this church at Natick, among our inhabitants in the Massachusetts colony, there are four Indian assemblies, where the name of the true God and Jesus Christ is solemnly called upon ; these assemblies have some American preachers : Mr. Elliot formerly used to preach to them once every fortnight, but now he is weakened with labours and old age, being in the eighty-fourth year of his age, and preacheth not to the Indians oftener than once in two months. There is another church, consisting only of converted Indians, about fifty miles from hence, in an Indian town, called Mashippaug. The first pastor of that church was an Englishman, who, being skilful in the American language, preached the gospel to them in their own tongue. This English pastor is dead, and instead of him that church has an Indian preacher. There are, besides that, five assemblies of Indians professing the name of Christ, not far distant from Mashippaug, which have Indian preachers. John Cotton, pastor of the church at Plymouth, (son of my venerable father-in-law, John Cotton, formerly the famous teacher of the church at Boston,) both made very great progress in learning the Indian tongue, and is very skilful in it ; he preaches in their own language to the last five mentioned congregations every week. Moreover, of the inhabitants of Saconet, in Plymouth colony, there is a great congregation of those who, for distinction sake, are called praying Indians, because they pray to God in Christ. Not far from a promontory called Cape Cod, there are six assemblies of heathens who are to be reckoned as Catechumens, amongst whom there are six Indian preachers. Samuel Treat, pastor of a church at Eastham, preacheth to these congregations in their own language. There are likewise among the islanders of Nantucket a church, with a pastor who was lately a heathen, and several meetings of Catechumens, who are instructed by the converted Indians. There is also another island about seven leagues long, called Martha's Vineyard, where are two American churches planted, which are more famous than the rest, over one of which there presides an ancient Indian as pastor, called Hiacooms. John Hiacooms, son of the Indian pastor, also preacheth the gospel to his countrymen. In another church in that place, John Tokinosh, a converted Indian, teaches. In these churches ruling elders of the Indians are joined to the pastors ; the pastors are chosen by the people, and when they had fasted and prayed, Mr. Elliot and Mr. Cotton laid their hands on them, so that they were solemnly ordained. All the congregations of the converted Indians (both the Catechumens and those in church order) every Lord's-day meet together ; the pastor or preacher always begins with prayer, and without a form, because from the heart ; when the ruler of the assembly has ended prayer, the whole congregation of Indians praise God with singing ; some of them are excellent singers ; after the psalm, he that preaches reads a place of scripture (one or more verses as he will) and expounds it, gathers doctrines from it, proves them by scriptures and reasons, and infers uses from them after the manner of the English, of whom they have been taught ; then another prayer to God in the name of Christ concludes the whole service. Thus do they meet together twice every Lord's-day. They observe no holy-days but the Lord's-day, except upon some extraordinary occasion, and then they solemnly set apart whole days, either in giving thanks, or fasting and praying, with great fervour of mind.

"Before the English came into these coasts, these barbarous nations were altogether ignorant of the true God ; hence it is that in their prayers and sermons they use English words and terms ; he that calls upon the most holy name of God, says, Jehovah, or God, or Lord, and also they have learned and borrowed many other theological phrases from us. In short, there are six churches of baptized Indians in New England, and eighteen assemblies of Catechumens professing the name of Christ. Of the Indians there are four-and-twenty who are preachers of the Word of God ; and besides these there are four English ministers, who preach the gospel in the Indian tongue. I am now myself weary with writing, and I fear lest, should I add more, I should also be tedious to you ; yet one thing I must add, which I had almost forgot, that there are many of the Indians' children who have learned by heart the catechism, either of that famous divine, William Perkins, or that put forth by the assembly of divines at Westminster, and in their own mother tongue can answer to all the questions in it. But I must end ; I salute the famous professors in your university, to whom I desire you to communicate this letter, as written to them also. Farewell, worthy Sir ; the Lord preserve your health for the benefit of your country, his church, and of learning. Yours ever,

"INCREASE MATHER.

"BOSTON, IN NEW ENGLAND, July 12, 1687."

To return to the secular affairs of the colony. In the year 1651, the long parliament having fully established its authority in England, determined to have its power expressly acknowledged through all the dependencies of the British empire. An order was therefore transmitted to Massachusetts to send the charter of the colony to London, and to take out a new patent. Alarmed at this requisition, and dreading the power of parliament, the general court resorted to its usual expedient of petitioning, which was, of course, productive of the desired delay; and the colony being in high favour with Cromwell, it is probable his influence was exercised in its behalf, as the parliament do not appear to have followed up their requisition with any further proceedings.

In the following year, the inhabitants of the province of Maine were, by their own request, taken under the protection of Massachusetts. Commissioners, appointed by the general court, repaired to Kittery and Agamenticus, summoned the inhabitants to appear before them, and received their submission. Agamenticus was now named York; the province made a county by the same name; and the towns, from this time, sent deputies to the general court at Boston.* New Hampshire had been added to Massachusetts in the year 1641.

The evil principle of the interference of the civil power again displayed itself. Mr. Grahame has recorded these transactions so impartially, and reasoned upon them so justly, that we shall at once give our readers an interesting portion of history, and an excellent specimen of that valuable work, by quoting the passage. "Of all the instances of persecution that occur in the history of New England," says that author, "the most censurable in its principle, though happily also the least vehement in the severities which it produced, was the treatment inflicted on the anabaptists by the government of Massachusetts. The first appearance of these sectaries in this province was in the year 1651, when, to the great astonishment and concern of the community, seven or eight persons, of whom the leader was one Obadiah Holmes, all at once professed the baptist tenets, and separated from the congregation to which they had belonged, declaring that they could no longer take counsel, or partake divine ordinances, with unbaptized men, as they pronounced all the other inhabitants of the province to be. The erroneoust doctrine which thus unexpectedly sprang up, was at this time regarded with peculiar dread and jealousy, on account of the horrible enormities of sentiment and practice with which some of the professors of it in Germany had associated its repute; and no sooner did Holmes and his friends set up a baptist conventicle for themselves, than complaints of their proceedings, as an intolerable nuisance, came pouring into the general court from all quarters of the colony. The court at first proceeded no farther than to adjudge Holmes and his friends to desist from their unchristian separation; and they were permitted to retire, having first, however, publicly declared that they would follow out the leadings of their consciences, and obey God rather than man. Some time after, they were apprehended on a Sunday, while attending the preaching of one Clark, a baptist, from Rhode Island, who had come to propogate his tenets in Massachusetts. The constables who took them into custody carried them to church, as a more proper place of christian worship, where Clark put on his hat the moment that the minister began to pray. Clark, Holmes, and another, were sentenced to pay small fines, or be flogged; and thirty lashes were actually inflicted on Holmes, who resolutely persisted in choosing a punishment that would enable him to show with what constancy he could suffer for what he believed to be the truth. A law was at the same time passed, subjecting to banishment from the colony every person who should openly condemn or oppose the baptism of infants, who should attempt to seduce others from the use of approbation thereof, or purposely depart from the congregation when that rite was administered, "or deny the ordinance of the magistracy, or their lawful right or authority to make war."† The eagerness with which every collateral charge against the baptists was credited in the colony, and the vehement impatience with which their claim of toleration was rejected, forcibly indicate the illiberality and delusion by which their persecutors were governed; and may suggest to the christian philosopher a train of reflections, no less instructive than interesting, on the self-deceit by which men so commonly infer the honesty of their convictions, and the rectitude of their proceedings, from that resentful perturbation which far more truly indicates a secret consciousness of injustice and inconsistency. There is not a more common nor more pernicious error in the world, than

* Hutchinson, vol. i. p. 177. Chalmers, b. i. p. 480, 499, 501.

† We do not wish to be understood as according with Mr. Grahame, in the application of this epithet, nor in that of the term anabaptist.

‡ "The baptists who were exiled from Massachusetts were allowed to settle in the colony of Plymouth, (Hutchinson, vol. ii. p.

478,) whence it may be strongly inferred, that they did not in reality profess (as they were supposed by the people of Massachusetts to do) principles adverse to the safety of society. The charge probably originated in the extravagance of a few of their own number, and the impatience and injustice of their adversaries."—Grahame, vol. i. p. 345, 346.

that one virtue may be practised at the expense of another. Where sincerity without charity is professed, there is always reason to suspect the professor of a dishonest disregard of the secret surmises of his own spirit. The severities that were employed proved in the end totally ineffectual to restrain the growth of the baptist tenets; though, for the present, the professors of these doctrines appear to have either desisted from holding separate assemblies, or to have retired from Massachusetts.*

These proceedings against the baptists were mildness itself when compared with subsequent coercive measures adopted towards the quakers. There appears, indeed, to have been in the latter case a far greater degree of exciting, though by no means amounting to a justificatory cause. We are far from being inclined to give their persecutors full credit for their representation of the conduct of the quakers;† but after making every abatement for the prejudice of such narrators as Mather and others, there still remains an almost incredible amount of folly on the part of these enthusiasts, as of cruelty in the ruling party. It was in the month of July, 1566, that two females, Mary Fisher and Ann Austin, arrived in New England from Barbadoes; and not long after, nine more individuals, of the same tenets, came from England. They were very speedily brought before the court of assistants, where they gave what were deemed very contemptuous replies to the interrogatories which they were required to answer; and the court did not hesitate to commit them to prison. The court ultimately passed sentence of banishment against them all; and required the captain who brought them from England to find sureties to a heavy amount, that he would carry them out of the colony, detaining them in prison till the vessel was ready to sail.

Up to this period there had been no special law for the punishment of quakers; but they had been proceeded against under the general law respecting heretics. At the next sessions of the general court, an act passed, laying a penalty of one hundred pounds upon the master of any vessel who should bring a known quaker into any part of the colony, and requiring him to give security to carry him back again; enacting also, that the quaker should be immediately sent to the house of correction, receive twenty stripes, and afterwards kept to hard labour until transportation. They also laid a penalty of five pounds for importing, and the like for dispersing quakers' books, and severe penalties for defending, their heretical opinions. The next year an additional law was made, by which all persons were subjected to the penalty of forty shillings for every hour's entertainment given to any known quaker; and any quaker, after the first conviction, if a man, was to lose one ear, and a second time the other; a woman, each time to be severely whipped; and the third time, man or woman, to have their tongues bored through with a red-hot iron; and every quaker who should become such in the colony to be subjected to the like punishments. In May, 1658, a penalty of ten shillings was laid on every person present at a quakers' meeting, and five pounds upon every one speaking at such meeting. Notwithstanding all this severity, the number of quakers, as might well have been expected, increasing rather than diminishing, in October a further law was made for punishing with death all quakers who should return into the jurisdiction after banishment.‡

It would appear that the enactment of severe laws only heightened the enthusiasm of the advocates of quakerism, especially among its female adherents. Every species of abuse and reviling of magisterial authority was practised;§ the divine worship of the colonists was interrupted by their violent conduct; and even the public decency outraged by (an undoubted fact, though almost incredible) the appearance of females entirely destitute of clothing in the streets and in their religious assemblies.¶ It is even said that a quaker, of the name of Faubord, of Grindleton, was detected in the act of sacrificing his son,

* Grahame, vol. i. p. 343—346.

† It is the more difficult to realize the absurd errors and the insane vehemence which were manifested by the quakers of the seventeenth century, since those of the present day are surpassed by none in peaceable and decorous demeanour, in their attachment to civil order, devoted acts of benevolence, and deep interest in the distribution of the sacred volume.

‡ "Great opposition was made to this law, the magistrates were the most zealous, and in general for it; but it was rejected at first by the deputies, afterwards, upon reconsideration, concurred by twelve against eleven, with an amendment, that the trial should be by a special jury. Captain Edward Hutchinson, and Captain Thomas Clark, two of the court, desired leave to enter their dissent against this law."—New England Judged.

§ Mather has collected from the history of the quakers of that day

the following epithets, which were applied, he says, to Dr. Owen, and other worthy men: "Thou fiery fighter and green-headed trumpeter; thou hedgehog and grinning dog; thou bastard, that tumbled out of the mouth of the Babylonish bawd; thou mole; thou tinker; thou lizard; thou bell of no metal, but the tone of a kettle; thou wheelbarrow; thou whirlpool; thou whirligig; O thou firebrand; thou adder and scorpion; thou louse; thou cow-dung; thou moon-calf; thou ragged tatterdemalion; thou Judas; thou livest in philosophy and logic, which are of the devil."—Mather's Magnalia, b. vii. p. 26.

¶ "One of the sect apologizing for this behaviour said, 'If the Lord did stir up any of his daughters to be a sign of the nakedness of others, he believed it to be a great cross to a modes woman's spirit, but the Lord must be obeyed.'"—Hutchinson, p. 204.

as an imitation of the example of Abraham.* Notwithstanding the recently enacted law, rendering every quaker who returned after banishment liable to the punishment of death, there were several who braved the awful penalty. Robinson, Stephenson, and Dyer, were brought to trial, and for their rebellion, sedition, and presumptuous obtruding themselves after banishment upon pain of death, were sentenced to die; the two first were executed the 27th of October.† Dyer, upon the petition of William Dyer, her son, was reprieved, on condition that she departed the jurisdiction in forty-eight hours, and if she returned to suffer the sentence. She was carried to the gallows, and stood with a rope about her neck until the others were executed. She was so infatuated as afterwards to return, and was executed June 1, 1660.

The court evidently appears to have felt some compunction after these deeds of blood. Honourable repentance is but rarely deemed consistent with the dignity of a public body; it was resolved, therefore, to put forth a vindication; and as it is an official document, which places the fact of the execution of persons for their religious tenets, or their propagation of them, at least, by the New England puritans, beyond doubt to the most skeptical, we have given the document at length.‡ These executions, however, notwithstanding their vindication, excited considerable clamour against the government; many persons were offended by the exhibition of severities, against which the very existence of the colony seemed designed to be a perpetual testimony; and many were touched with a compassion for the sufferings of the quakers, that effaced all recollection of the disgust that their principles had heretofore inspired. The people began to flock in crowds to the prisons, and load the unfortunate quakers with demonstrations of kindness and pity. At length the rising sentiments of humanity and justice attained such general and forcible prevalence, as to overpower all opposition. On the trial of Leddra, the last of the sufferers, another quaker named Wenlock Christison, who had been banished upon pain of death, came boldly into court with his hat on, and reproached the magistrates for shedding innocent blood. He was taken into custody, and soon after put upon his trial. When sentence of death was pronounced upon him, he desired his judges to consider what they had gained by their cruel proceedings against the quakers. "For the last man that was put to death," said he, "here are five come in his room; and if you have power to take my life from me, God can raise up the same principle of life in ten of his servants, and send them among you in my room, that you may have torment upon torment." The law now plainly appeared to be unsupported by † "Mr. Winthrop, the governor of Connecticut, laboured to prevent their execution, and Colonel Temple went to the court and told them, 'that if, according to their declaration, they desired their lives absent, rather than their deaths present, he would carry them away, and provide for them at his own charge; and if any of them should return, he would fetch them away again.' This motion was well liked by all the magistrates, except two or three, and they proposed it to the deputies the next day, but those two or three magistrates, with the deputies, prevailed to have execution done."—Hutchinson, p. 200.

‡ "A Declaration of the General Court of Massachusetts, holden at Boston, October 18, 1659, and printed by their Order. EDWARD RAWSON, Secretary.

"Although the justice of our proceedings against William Robinson, Marmaduke Stevenson, and Mary Dyer, supported by the authority of this court, the laws of the country, and the law of God, may rather persuade us to expect encouragement and commendation from all prudent and pious men, than convince us of any necessity to apologize for the same; yet, forasmuch as men of weaker parts, out of pity and commiseration, (a commendable and christian virtue, yet easily abused, and susceptible of sinister and dangerous impressions,) for want of full information, may be less satisfied, and men of perverser principles may take occasion hereby to calumniate us and render us as bloody persecutors—to satisfy the one and stop the mouths of the other, we thought it requisite to declare, That, about three years since, divers persons, professing themselves quakers, (of whose pernicious opinions and practices we had received intelligence from good hands, both from Barbados and England,) arrived at Boston, whose persons were only secured to be sent away by the first opportunity, without censure or punishment, although their professed tenets, turbulent and contemptuous behaviour to authority, would have justified a severer animadversion, yet the prudence of this court was exercised only in making provision to secure the peace and order here established against their attempts, whose design (we were well assured of by our own experience, as well as by the example of their predecessors in Munster) was to undermine and ruin the same. And, accordingly, a law was made and published, prohibiting all masters of ships to bring any quakers into this jurisdiction, and themselves from coming in, on penalty of the house of correction till they could be sent away. Notwithstanding which, by a back door, they found entrance, and the penalty inflicted upon themselves proving insufficient to restrain their impudent and insolent obtrusions, was increased by the loss of the ears of those that offended the second time; which also being too weak a defence against their impetuous fanatic fury, necessitated us to endeavour our security; and upon serious consideration, after the former experiment, by their incessant assaults, a law was made, that such persons should be banished on pain of death, according to the example of England in their provision against jesuits, which sentence being regularly pronounced at the last court of assistants against the parties above named, and they either returning or continuing presumptuously in this jurisdiction, after the time limited, were apprehended, and owning themselves to be the persons banished, were sentenced by the court to death, according to the law aforesaid, which hath been executed upon two of them. Mary Dyer, upon the petition of her son, and the mercy and clemency of this court, had liberty to depart within two days, which she hath accepted of. The consideration of our gradual proceedings will vindicate us from the clamorous accusations of severity; our own just and necessary defence calling upon us (other means failing) to offer the point which these persons have violently and wilfully rushed upon, and thereby become felones de se, which might have been prevented, and the sovereign law, salus populi, been preserved. Our former proceedings, as well as the sparing of Mary Dyer upon an inconsiderable intercession, will manifestly evince we desire their lives, absent, rather than their death, present."—Hubbard, p. 572, 573.

public consent, and the magistrates hastened to interpose between the sentence and its execution. Christison, and all the other quakers who were in custody, were forthwith released, and sent beyond the precincts of the colony; and in the first year after the restoration of Charles II., even this degree of persecution was suspended, by a letter from the king to Mr. Endicot, and the other governors of the New England settlements.

We have already strongly expressed our opinion on the persecuting principles manifested by this colony; we shall now only repeat our deep regret, that those who professed to abhor the principles of a Laud or a Bonner, should have so nearly copied their criminal example. It must be admitted, however, as Dr. Dwight observes, that there is no nation which can cast the first stone at New England. All sects have been persecutors in turn; if, indeed, we may not except, to their honour, the quakers and the baptists.*

In the year 1660, Generals Whalley and Goffe, two of the judges who tried king Charles I., arrived at Boston. Having left London before the king was proclaimed, they did not conceal their persons or characters. They immediately visited Governor Endicot, who gave them a courteous reception; but, choosing a situation less public than Boston, they went, on the day of their arrival, to Cambridge. By the act of indemnity, which was brought over in November, it appeared that Whalley and Goffe were excepted from those to whom pardon was offered; and they soon after went to New Haven, where they remained in concealment.

The following year, the king appointed the great officers of state a committee, touching the settlement of New England. Complaints being made to the king against Massachusetts, he commanded the governor and council to send persons to England to answer these various accusations. The governor, on receiving intelligence of the transactions that were taking place in England to the prejudice of the colony, judged it inexpedient longer to delay the solemnity of proclaiming Charles II. Calling the court together, a form of proclamation was agreed to, and Charles was acknowledged to be their sovereign lord and king, and proclaimed to be lawful king of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, and all other territories thereto belonging. On receiving intelligence of farther complaints against the colony of Massachusetts, the court appointed Simon Bradstreet, one of the magistrates, and John Norton, one of the ministers of Boston, as agents for the colony, and sent an address by them to the king, which met with a gracious reception. The colony received a letter from Charles II., confirming and offering to renew its charter, tendering pardon to all his subjects, for all offences, excepting such as stood attainted, but requiring the following conditions:—That all laws made in the late troubles, derogatory to the royal authority and government, should be repealed; that the rules of the charter for administering the oath of allegiance be observed; that the administration of justice be in the king's name; and charging the government, that freedom and liberty of conscience, in the use of the Book of Common Prayer, be allowed; and that all persons of good and honest lives and conversations be admitted to the sacrament of the Lord's supper according to it, with an exception to any indulgence to quakers. The letter also enjoined, that there should be impartiality in the election of the governor and of magistrates, without any regard to any faction, with respect to their opinion or profession; that all freeholders of competent estates, not vicious in their lives, and orthodox in religion, though of different persuasions concerning church government, should be admitted to vote.

The colonists had, from their first settlement, entertained such an opinion of the nature and extent of their allegiance and obligations to the crown of England, as did not tend to insure a prompt compliance with all these conditions. Believing they were subject to the king, and dependent on his authority, only according to their charter, which some of the requisitions might be thought to infringe, their compliance was slow and occasional, as prudence would admit, or necessity impel them. The answer of the general court to his majesty's letter is characteristic of the colony. After a respectful introduction, they say, "For the repealing of all laws here established since the late changes, contrary and derogatory to his majesty's authority and government, we, having considered thereof, are not conscious to any of that tendency; concerning the oath of allegiance, we are ready to attend it as formerly, according to the charter; concerning liberty to use the Common Prayer Book, none as yet among us have appeared to desire it; touching administration of the sacraments, this matter hath been under consideration of a synod, orderly called, the result whereof our last general court commended to the several congregations, and we hope will have a tendency to general satisfaction."†

* It has been said that these sects were never in power; Rhode Island and Pennsylvania, however, contradict this assertion.

The New England colonies had certainly evinced a republican tendency; it was not to be expected, therefore, that they should be favoured in the commercial arrangements with the mother country; indeed, the interests of the latter were generally made an object of preference by the British legislature. In 1663 it was enacted, that no European commodity should be imported into the colonies, unless shipped directly from England, and in British vessels. By this regulation, in connexion with others that had been previously made, all the trade of the colonies was secured to Great Britain. They submitted reluctantly to these restrictions, and often made them the subject of complaint; but the English government pertinaciously declined to repeal them.

During the year 1664, the king despatched four commissioners to visit the several colonies of New England, to examine into their condition, to hear and decide complaints, and to make him a report of their proceedings and observations. This measure appeared dictated by no friendly feeling, and was considered by most of the colonists as a violation of their charters. The first session of the commissioners was at Plymouth, where but little business was transacted; the next in Rhode Island, where they heard complaints from the Indians, and all who were discontented, and made divers determinations respecting titles to land, which were but little regarded. In Massachusetts, the general court complied with such of their requisitions as they thought proper; but, professing sincere loyalty to his majesty, declined acknowledging their authority, and protested against the exercise of it within their limits. In consequence of this assertion of their rights, an angry correspondence took place between them, at the close of which the commissioners informed the general court, that they would lose no more of their labours upon them, but would represent their conduct to his majesty. From Boston, the commissioners proceeded to New Hampshire, where they exercised several acts of government, and offered to release the inhabitants from the jurisdiction of Massachusetts. This offer was almost unanimously rejected. In Maine, they excited more disturbance. They encouraged the people to declare themselves independent, and found many disposed to listen to their suggestions; but Massachusetts, by a prompt and vigorous exertion of power, constrained the disaffected to submit to her authority.

At the termination of the first half century from the arrival of the emigrants at Plymouth, the New England colonies were calculated to contain one hundred and twenty towns, and as many thousand inhabitants, of whom sixteen thousand were capable of bearing arms. The habits of industry and economy, which had been formed in less happy times, continued to prevail, and gave a competency to those who had nothing, and wealth to those who had a competency. The wilderness receded before these hardy and persevering labourers, and its savage inhabitants found their game dispersed, and their favourite haunts invaded. This was the natural consequence of the sales of land, which they were at all times ready to make to the whites. But this result the Indians did not foresee; and when they felt it in all its force, the strongest passions were awakened which could animate the savage breast. A leader only was wanting to concentrate and direct their exertions, and Philip, of Pokanoket, sachem of a tribe residing within the boundaries of Plymouth and Rhode Island, assumed that station. His father was the friend, but he had ever been the enemy of the whites; and he exerted all the arts of intrigue, of which he was master, to induce the Indians, in all parts of New England, to unite their efforts for their destruction. He succeeded in forming a confederacy, able to send into action more than three thousand warriors.

The English were apprised of the plots of the Indians, and made preparations to meet their hostilities. They hoped, however, that the threatened storm would pass by, as others had, and that peace would be preserved. But the insolence of Philip, and the number of his adherents, increased daily; and, in June, 1675, some of them entered the town of Swanzy, in Plymouth, where, after slaughtering the cattle, and plundering the houses, they fired upon the inhabitants, killing and wounding several. The troops of the colony marched immediately to Swanzy, and were soon joined by a detachment from Massachusetts. The Indians fled, and marked the course of their flight by burning the buildings, and fixing on poles by the way side, the hands, scalps, and heads of the whites, whom they had killed. The troops pursued, but unable to overtake them, returned to Swanzy. The whole country was alarmed, and the number of troops augmented. By this array of force, Philip was induced to quit his residence at Mount Hope, and take post near a swamp at Pocasset. At that place the English attacked him, but were repulsed. Sixteen were killed, and the Indians by this success were made bolder.

Most of the settlements were surrounded by thick forests, and as the Indians lived intermixed with the whites, the former were acquainted, of course, with the dwellings of the latter, and all the avenues to them; could watch their motions, and fall upon them in their defenceless and unguarded moments. Many were shot dead as they opened their doors in the morning; many while at work in their fields, and others while travelling to visit their neighbours, or to places of worship; their lives were in continual jeopardy; and no one could tell but that, in the next moment, he should receive his death shot from his barn, the thicket, or the way side. Whenever the enemy assembled in force, detachments were sent against them; if weaker than these, they would retreat; if stronger, assault and harass, or destroy them. Defenceless villages were suddenly attacked, the houses burned, and the men, women and children killed or carried into captivity. Their ruin was the work of a moment; and when accomplished, its authors vanished. The colonists found their numbers sensibly diminished, and their strength impaired; and they began to apprehend even total extinction. Nothing but a vigorous effort could save them. The commissioners of the three United Colonies met on the 9th of September, and it was concluded, that the war was just and necessary; that it ought to be jointly prosecuted by all the United Colonies; and that there should be immediately raised 1000 soldiers out of the colonies, in such proportions as the articles of confederation established: Massachusetts, 527; Plymouth, 158; Connecticut, 315. At an adjourned meeting, the commissioners declared the Narragansets to be deeply accessory in the present bloody outrages of the Indians that were at open war, and determined that 1000 more soldiers be raised, for the Narraganset expedition, to obtain satisfaction of those Indians, or to treat them as enemies. On the 8th of December, the Massachusetts forces marched from Boston, and were soon joined by those of Plymouth. The troops from Connecticut joined them on the 18th, at Petaquamscot. At break of day the next morning they commenced their march, through a deep snow, toward the enemy, who were about fifteen miles distant in a swamp, at the edge of which they arrived at one in the afternoon. The Indians, apprized of an armament intended against them, had fortified themselves as strongly as possible within the swamp. The English, without waiting to draw up in order of battle, marched forward in quest of the enemy's camp. The Indian fortress stood on a rising ground in the midst of the swamp, and was composed of palisades, which were encompassed by a hedge, nearly a rod thick. It had but one practicable entrance, which was over a log, or tree, four or five feet from the ground; and that aperture was guarded by a block-house. Falling providentially on this very part of the fort, the English captains entered it, at the head of their companies. The two first, with many of their men, were shot dead at the entrance: four other captains were also killed. When the troops had effected an entrance, they attacked the Indians, who fought desperately, and compelled the English to retire out of the fort; but after a hard fought battle of three hours, they became masters of the place, and set fire to the wigwams, to the number of five or six hundred, and in the conflagration many Indian women and children perished. The surviving Indians fled into a cedar swamp, at a small distance; and the English retired to their quarters. Of the English, there were killed and wounded about two hundred and thirty; of the Indians, one thousand are supposed to have perished.

From this blow, the confederated Indians never recovered; but they still remained sufficiently strong to harass the settlements by continual inroads. In retaliation, the English sent several detachments into their territories, nearly all of which were successful. Captain Church, of Plymouth, and Captain Dennison, of Connecticut, were conspicuous for their bravery and success. In the midst of these reverses, Philip remained firm and unshaken. His warriors were cut off; his chief men, his wife and family, were killed, or taken prisoners; and at these successive misfortunes, he is represented to have wept with a bitterness which proves him not to have been destitute of the noblest affections; but he disdained to listen to any offers of peace. He even shot one of his men, who proposed submission. At length, after being hunted from swamp to swamp, he was himself shot, by the brother of the Indian he had killed. The death of Philip, in retrospect, makes different impressions from those which were made at the time of the event. It was then considered as the extinction of a virulent and implacable enemy; it is now viewed as the fall of a great warrior, a penetrating statesman, and a mighty prince: it then excited universal joy and congratulation, as a prelude to the close of a merciless war; it now awakens sober reflections on the instability of empire, and the peculiar destiny of the aboriginal race.* This event was certainly the signal of complete

* "The assurance of the equity of our ancestors," says the compiler of the American Annals, "in giving the natives an equivalent for their lands, is highly consoling. The upright and respected Governor

Winslow, in a letter dated at Marshfield, May 1, 1676, observes, 'I think I can clearly say, that before these present troubles broke out, the English did not possess one foot of land in this colony, but victory. The Indians in all the neighbouring country now generally submitted to the English, or fled, and incorporated themselves with distant and strange nations. Never was peace more welcome. In this short, but tremendous war, about six hundred of the inhabitants of New England, composing its principal strength, were either killed in battle, or murdered by the enemy; twelve or thirteen towns were entirely destroyed; and about six hundred buildings, chiefly dwelling houses, were burnt. In addition to these calamities, the colonies contracted a very heavy debt; while, by the loss of their substance through the ravages of the enemy, their resources were greatly diminished. But, in their deepest distress, they forbore to apply to the mother country for assistance; and this omission excited surprise and jealousy. "You act," said a privy councillor, "as though you were independent of our master's crown; and though poor, yet you are proud."

The New England colonies, in their impoverished state, were destined to a new scene of trouble. Complaints were brought against them the preceding year, by the merchants and manufacturers of England, for their disregard to the acts of navigation.* The governors of these colonies were therefore commanded to enforce a strict obedience to the commercial regulations. Commissions were transmitted, empowering proper persons to administer an oath, framed to secure a strict observance of those laws.†

These laws being enacted by a parliament in which the colonies were not represented, they were regarded as violations of their rights, and continued to be evaded with impunity. Edward Randolph was therefore sent over, commissioned as inspector of the customs in New England. He was also the bearer of a letter from the king, requiring that agents should be sent to the court of London, fully empowered to act for the colonies. It was well understood to be the intention of the king to procure from the agents a surrender of the charters, or to annul them by a suit in his courts, that he might himself place officers over the colonies, who would be subservient to his what was fairly obtained by honest purchase of the Indian proprietors. We first made a law, that none should purchase or receive of gift any land of the Indians, without the knowledge and allowance of our court. And lest they should be straitened, we ordered that Mount Hope, Pocasset, and several other necks of the best land in the colony, because most suitable and convenient for them, should never be bought out of their hands." See Hubbard's Narrative, (where this important letter is inserted entire,) and Hazard, Coll. ii. p. 531—534.

* "The complainants stated, that the inhabitants of New England not only traded to most parts of Europe, but encouraged foreigners to go and traffic with them; that they supplied the other plantations with those foreign productions which ought only to be views. The inhabitants of Massachusetts felt that to be deprived of their charter, which secured to them the right of self-government, would be the greatest of calamities; and their agents were instructed in no emergency to surrender it. This being known to the king, a prosecution was instituted against the corporation, and, in 1684, a subservient court of chancery decreed that the charter should be forfeited; and their liberties were seized into the king's hands. Thus fell the old charter of this ancient colony under which the colonists, during fifty-five years, had enjoyed liberty and prosperity; not without encountering frequent aggressions to preserve the one, and incessant difficulties to attain the other. But, though the charter was gone, the spirit which it had cherished, and the habits which it had formed, were retained. Who would then have deemed it credible, that, within a century, its independence would be acknowledged by the parent state?

The impediments to the royal will being thus removed, James established a temporary government over the colony, first appointing Joseph Dudley governor, but he was soon superseded by Sir Edmund Andros. This latter appointment caused the most gloomy forebodings. Sir Edmund had been governor of New York, and it was known that his conduct there had been arbitrary and tyrannical. Having secured a majority in the council, he assumed control over the press, appointing Randolph licenser. He established new and oppressive regulations concerning taxes, public worship, marriages, and the settlement of estates. His subordinate officers, as well as himself, extorted enormous fees for their services. He declared, that the charter being cancelled, the old titles to land were of no validity, and compelled the inhabitants, in order to avoid suits before judges dependent on his will, to take out new patents, for which large sums were demanded.

Happily, this despotic rule was not of long duration. In the beginning of 1689, a rumour reached Boston, that William, prince of Orange, had invaded England, with the intention of dethroning the king. Animated by the hope of deliverance, the people sent to England; that, having thus made New England the great staple of the colonies, the navigation of the kingdom was greatly prejudiced, the national revenues were impaired, the people were extremely impoverished; that such abuses, at the same time that they will entirely destroy the trade of England, will leave no sort of dependence from that country to this."—Holmes's American Annals, vol. i. p. 384, 385.

† "To add weight to these measures, it was determined, that no Mediterranean passes should be granted to New England, to protect its vessels against the Turks, till it is seen what dependence it will acknowledge on his majesty, or whether his custom-house officers are received as in other colonies."—Holmes's American Annals, vol. i. p. 385. Chalmers, b. i. p. 400—402.

rushed spontaneously to arms, took possession of the fort, seized Andros, Randolph, and other obnoxious persons, and placed them in confinement. A council of safety, consisting of their former magistrates, was then organized, to administer the government until authentic intelligence should be received from England. It was not many weeks before the tidings that William and Mary were firmly seated on the throne arrived. This news was most joyfully received. The people were now relieved from anxiety as to the consequences of their late conduct, which must be allowed to have been more signalized by enthusiastic zeal, than by a calculating prudence. The proclamation of the accession of William and Mary was celebrated at Boston with greater ceremony than any previous event; the governor and council, civil and military officers, the merchants and principal gentlemen of the town and country, mounted on horseback, formed a grand procession; a splendid entertainment was provided in the town-hall; and the soldiers were supplied with wine, in which to pledge their fidelity to their new sovereign.

The people of Massachusetts now applied to the British government for the restoration of their old, or the grant of a new charter. A definitive answer was deferred, but the council was authorized to administer the government according to the provisions of the old charter, until further directions should be given; and Andros, Randolph, and others, were ordered home for trial.

In this unsettled state of the country, the French in Canada and Nova Scotia instigated the northern and eastern Indians to commence hostilities against the English settlements. Dover and Salmon Falls, in New Hampshire, Casco, in Maine, and Schenectady, in New York, were attacked by different parties of French and Indians, and the most shocking barbarities perpetrated on the inhabitants. The Indians having taken the fort at Pemaquid, and the French privateers from Acadie still infesting the coast of New England, the general court of Massachusetts determined to make an attempt on Port Royal. A fleet, with seven or eight hundred men, under the command of Sir William Phipps, sailed on that expedition in the latter end of April. The fort at Port Royal, not being in a state to sustain a siege, surrendered, with little or no resistance; and Sir William took possession of the whole sea coast, from Port Royal to the New England settlements.

Regarding Canada as the principal source of their miseries, New England and New York formed the bold project of reducing it to subjection. By great exertion they raised an army, which, under the command of General Winthrop, was sent against Montreal, and equipped a fleet, which, commanded by Sir William Phipps, was destined to attack Quebec. The fleet, retarded by unavoidable accidents, did not arrive before Quebec until the fifth of October. Phipps, the next morning, sent a summons on shore, but received an insolent answer from Count Frontenac. The next day he attempted to land his troops, but was prevented by the violence of the wind. On the 8th, all the effective men, amounting to between twelve and thirteen hundred, landed at the Isle of Orleans, four miles below the town, and were fired on from the woods by French and Indians. Having remained on shore three days, they received information from a deserter of the strength of the place, and precipitately embarked. A tempest soon after dispersed the fleet, which made the best of its way back to Boston. A successful result had been so confidently expected, that adequate provision was not made at home for the payment of the troops. In this extremity, the government of Massachusetts issued bills of credit, or paper money; and these were the first that were ever issued in the American colonies; but though it afforded relief at the moment, it produced in its consequences extensive and complicated mischief.

When the colonists resumed their charter in 1689, they earnestly solicited its re-establishment, with the addition of some necessary powers; but the king could not be prevailed on to consent to that measure, and a new charter was obtained. Sir William Phipps arrived at Boston in May, with this charter, and a commission, constituting him governor. The province comprehended in the new charter, contained the whole of the old Massachusetts colony, to which were added the colony of Plymouth, the province of Maine, the province of Nova Scotia, and all the country between the province of Maine and Nova Scotia, as far northward as the river St. Lawrence, also Elizabeth islands, and the Islands of Nantucket and Martha's Vineyard. Under the old charter, all the magistrates and officers of state were chosen annually by the general assembly; by the new charter, the appointment of the governor, lieutenant governor, secretary, and all the officers of the admiralty, was vested in the crown. Under the old charter, the governor had little more share in the administration than any one of the assistants; he had the power of calling the general court, but he could not adjourn, prorogue, or dissolve it. Under the new charter, there was to be an annual meeting of the general court on the last Wednesday in May; but the governor might discretionally call an assembly at any other time, and adjourn, prorogue, and dissolve it at pleasure, while no act of government was to be valid without his consent. He had also the sole appointment of all military officers, and of all officers belonging to the courts of justice; and no money could issue out of the treasury but by his warrant, with the advice and consent of the council. The new charter contained nothing respecting an ecclesiastical constitution; but, with the exception of papists, liberty of conscience, which was not mentioned in the first charter, was now expressly granted to all.

The new government went into operation without any opposition from the inhabitants; and almost the first act of Sir William Phipps and his council, was the institution of a court to try the unfortunate victims of popular delusion, accused of witchcraft, at Salem. "A belief in the direct and sensible agency of supernatural beings has universally prevailed in ages of ignorance and superstition. It formed the life of the pagan mythology; and it has not been

* Murray, Vol. i. p. 294.

† From the mountains of Scotland, or from an indigenous growth of superstition, witchcraft had, in England, gained such an alarming height, as it was called, that a statute was passed against the crime in the thirty-third year of the reign of Henry VIII., making it felony, without the benefit of clergy. Many miserable wretches suffered death under this law, but the evil was not diminished by severity. In the reign of Elizabeth, a reverend prelate, Bishop Jewell, loudly descanted before her upon the prevalence of the crime, and attempted, by his harangue, to awaken the fears of the queen; but she thought she knew as much as any old woman in her realms. This sermon was preached in 1558. In 1584, Reginald Scot, a bold writer, in the strong spirit of common sense, in his treatise on the "Discoverie of Witchcraft," made a complete detection of the wretched fallacy. This work, say the historians, had a good effect for a while, but King James, in 1597, wrote his work on "Demonologie," and the royal dupe to superstition had the most readers, and the good effects of Scot's work were, in a great measure, lost. Persecutions still went on, and the old and ignorant perished by the infatuation in great numbers. Our ancestors, though a quiet and a religious people, brought with them all the prejudices of their kindred, as well as their own. Amongst these prejudices was that of a full belief in witchcraft, and as soon as they began to make laws of a permanent nature for offences, this crime was considered as capital, and enumerated the next after treason and murder in the records of the Old Colony, dated at New Plymouth, November 15, 1636. The language of the law, in defining the crime, is, "Solemne compaction, or conversing with the divell, by way of witchcraft, conjuration, or the like." But on a careful examination of all the Old Colony records, not a single indictment was found until the month of March, 1676, when Mary Ingham, wife of Thomas Ingham, of the town of Scituate, was indicted for bewitching Mehitable Woodworth, daughter of Walter Woodworth, of the same place. The woman was not convicted, and no other case occurred until the union under the charter of William and Mary. In other parts of the present Commonwealth there were several trials, and some convictions. In Charlestown, in 1648, Margaret Jones was tried for a witch and executed. She was the first executed in New England.

In 1651, Mary Parsons, of Springfield, was tried for witchcraft and murder. She was acquitted of the former, but found guilty of the latter crime. The next May, her husband, Hugh Parsons, was tried for witchcraft, and acquitted; but in three years afterwards, 1655, Mrs. Hibbons, wife of an assistant to the Governor, was tried, convicted, and executed as a witch. Her death was wholly effaced among the less enlightened professors of christianity, especially amid those superstitious forms which defaced it during the dark ages. Even the first reformers, who displayed such vigour and independence of mind, and brought to light so many important truths, could not wholly shake off the delusions of the age. Luther's enemies are able to produce from his writings some comments of this nature, which appear almost incredible. The New Englanders brought with them this belief, still in a very prevailing state; and all the circumstances of their situation tended to stamp on their minds solemn and supernatural impressions.* Mather, after Hale, defines a witch to be "a person who, having the free use of reason, doth knowingly and willingly seek and obtain of the devil, or of any other besides the true God, an ability to do or know strange things, or things which he cannot by his own human abilities arrive unto. This person is a witch."

The first trials for witchcraft in New England* occur-deeply felt, as most persons considered her a woman of fine intellect and good character. This execution checked the infatuation for several years in the Commonwealth. Connecticut was the next in which it was found. It broke out there in 1662-71-73-83, and made no small disturbance; some were executed and some escaped. In 1679, it again appeared in Massachusetts, at Newbury; but nothing serious followed. In 1687, and the next year, the cry of witchcraft was again heard in Boston. The four children of John Goodwin were declared to be afflicted by an old Irish woman, who was tried and executed. This last case was four years before the delusion reached Salem, and it is impossible for us to tell why that good town should bear the whole obloquy of the New England witchcraft, when she only followed the example of Boston, after it had been before her for thirty years.

In most histories of delusions, the lower classes become frantic, and overwhelm the still small voice of the wise; but it was not so here. It began in respectable families, but the good sense of the commonalty would have soon put it down, if divines, magistrates, and statesmen, had not aided the delusion by arguments from scripture, from the opinion of English judges, and from the learned nonsense of the doctors of universities. Phipps, Stoughton, Mather, Hawthorn, and Norris, pursued witches as though they had been possessed by some evil spirits at war with the former; and after all their efforts, jurymen often stood out and took the responsibility of an acquittal upon their own consciences, and when forced by authority to convict some poor wretch, repented of it, and threw the blame on the judges. One of the judges of that day had good sense enough to see the folly and wickedness of the course pursued, and after a struggle to stem the current, but in vain, retreated from the scene of iniquity. This man was Judge Saltonstall, of Haverhill. He deserves a monument more durable than brass,—it will hereafter be erected.

The friends of common sense and humanity, at this time, found a powerful advocate in Mr. Robert Calef, a merchant of Boston. He, like Reginald Scot, breasted the current of popular opinion, and incurred the resentment of the Mathers. His book a perusal of which is now so refreshing, was burnt in the yard of Harvard College, by the hands of the president of that institution. Calef published his work in England, in 1700, and it has lately been republished in Salem.

It is a subject of philosophical inquiry, at the present time, to ascertain the course of this delusion; perhaps it will never be fully settled. "Our fathers," says a writer of eminence, "looked upon nature with more reverence and horror before the world was enlightened by learning and philosophy; and loved to astonish themselves red in the year 1645, when four persons charged with this crime were put to death in Massachusetts. For more than twenty years after, we hear but little of any similar prosecutions. But, in the year 1688, a woman was executed for witchcraft at Boston, after an investigation conducted with a degree of solemnity that made a deep impression on the minds of the people. The suspicions of the people thus powerfully awakened in this direction, the charges of witchcraft began gradually to multiply, till, at length, there commenced at Salem that dreadful tragedy which rendered New England for many months a scene of bloodshed, terror, and madness, and at one time seemed to threaten the subversion of civil society. In February, 1692, a daughter and a niece of Mr. Paris, the minister of Salem, were afflicted with disorders affecting their bodies in a manner somewhat singular. The physicians, unable to explain the nature of the disease, or to effect a cure, pronounced them bewitched; and the children, hearing of this, declared that an Indian woman who lived in the house was the cause of their torments. Mr. Paris concurred with the physicians. Several private fasts were kept at his house, and the gloom was increased by a solemn fast throughout the colony. The Indian woman confessed herself guilty. The children were visited, noticed, and pitied. This encouraged them to persevere, and other children, either from sympathy, or the desire of similar attentions, exhibited similar contortions. From this moment the evil spread daily wider and wider. Several females charged Mr. Burroughs, a clergyman, with using against them the arts of necromancy, and an indictment against him was speedily drawn up. Being brought to trial, he argued, "that there neither are nor ever were witches, that, having made a compact with the devil, can send a devil to torment other people at a distance." This was a flight far beyond the place or age; his defence was declared altogether frivolous, and sentence of death was at once pronounced. The evil, however, instead of being checked, spread more and more. The accused were multiplied in proportion to the accusers. Children denounced their parents, and parents their children. A word from those who were supposed to be afflicted, occasioned the arrest of the devoted victim; and so firmly convinced were the magistrates that the prince of darkness was in the midst of them, using human instruments to accomplish his purposes, that the slightest testimony was deemed sufficient to justify a commitment for trial. The court specially instituted for this purpose held a session in June, and afterwards several others by adjournment. Many were tried, and received sentence of death, and twenty persons were executed, one of whom was pressed to death because he would not plead! By a most unaccountable departure from the first principles of jurisprudence, all that confessed the crime, if imputed to them, were reprieved; and only those who maintained their innocence had capital punishment inflicted on them. What was still more horrible, the confessed criminals were admitted witnesses against the lives of their fellow-sufferers. By this absurd arrangement, those who were possessed of that high integrity, which will endure death rather than utter deliberate falsehood, fell under the hand of the executioner, while the ignoble and dishonest preserved their lives.* Even amidst those who had been overcome with the powerful temptation arising from the desire to escape the dreadful doom of those who persisted in their innocence, there were some, who, on mature reflection, did not hesitate to retract their

with the apprehensions of witchcraft, prodigies, charms, and enchantments. There was not a village in England that had not a ghost in it; the church yards were all haunted; every large common had a circle of witches belonging to it; and there was scarcely a shepherd to be met with that had not seen a spirit." This was not confined to England, but was in full credit in all the northern countries.

"The gloomy state of New England probably facilitated the delusion, for superstition flourishes in times of danger and dismay." Some portion of the people were mourning over the loss of the old charter; and others were grieving at the great expenses the colonies had incurred in their abortive attempt on the Canadas. Moral causes often produce physical evils. But after all, the folly of receiving what they called "spiritual evidence," can never be atoned for. Men had indeed lost their reason. It was an evil that in time produced abundance of good. Superstition has never reared its head there successfully since.—American Editor.

* "The statement afterwards given in by Deliverance Dane, Abigail Baker, and four other females, affords an affecting description of the impulses which induced them to adopt this criminal course. 'Joseph Ballard of Andover's wife being sick,' say they, 'he either from himself, or the advice of others, fetched two of the persons called the afflicted persons from Salem village to Andover, which was the cause of that dreadful calamity which befel us at Andover. We were blindfolded, and our hands were laid on the afflicted persons, they being in their fits, and falling into these fits at our coming into their presence, and then they said that we were guilty of afflicting them, whereupon we were all seized as prisoners by a warrant from the justice of peace, and forthwith carried to Salem; and by reason of that sudden surprisal, we knowing ourselves altogether innocent of that crime, we were all exceedingly astonished, and amazed, and consternated, and affrighted out of our reason; and our dearest relations seeing us in that dreadful condition, and knowing our great danger, they, out of tender love and pity, persuaded us to confess what we did confess; and, indeed, that confession was no other than what was suggested to us by some gentlemen, they telling us that we were witches, and they knew it, and we knew it, and they knew that we knew it, which made us think that we were so, and our understanding, and our reason, and our faculties being almost gone, we were not capable of judging of our condition; as also the hard measures they used with us rendered us incapable of making any defence, but we said any thing and every thing they desired, and most of what we said was, in fact, but a consenting to what they said.'"—Neale, vol. ii. p. 160—162

forced confessions, though death looked them full in the face. Samuel Wardmel was the first who ventured to act so noble a part; and he was immediately put on his trial, condemned, and executed! Others were not prevented, however, from following this most meritorious example; and this conduct shook the faith of many, and threw discredit on the numerous confessions which had continually occurred.*

The "defenders of the faith" in witchcraft, when summoned by their opponents to produce a confession free from just grounds of suspicion, felt themselves in a very difficult predicament, as all the confessions must lie under the imputation of being given to insure the important purpose of saving their necks from the halter; and how does posterity blush for them, when they tender, as their best defence, such miserable trash as the following confession of W. B.: "God having called me to confess my sin and apostacy in that fall, in giving the devil advantage over me, appearing in the shape of a black man, in the evening, to set my name to his book, as I have owned to my shame, he told me that I should not want, so doing. At Salem village there being, a little off the meeting-house, about a hundred fine blades, some with rapiers by their sides, which was called, and might be for aught I know, by B. and Bu, and the trumpet sounded, and bread and wine, which they called the sacrament; but I had none, being carried over all on a stick, and never was present at any other meeting. I being at cart last Saturday all the day of hay and English corn, the devil brought my shape to Salem, and did afflict M. S. and R. F. by clitching my hand; and on sabbath-day my shape afflicted A. M., &c. The design was to destroy Salem village, and to begin at the minister's house, and to destroy the churches of God, and to set up Satan's kingdom, and then all will be well. And now I hope God hath made me in some measure sensible of my sin and apostacy, begging pardon of God, and of the honourable magistrates, and all God's people; hoping, and promising, by the help of God, to set to my heart and hand to do what lieth in me to destroy such wicked worship; humbly begging the prayers of God's people for me, I may walk humbly under all this great affliction, and that I may procure to myself the sure mercies of David."†

* One poor girl, of the name of Mary Jacobs, deserves to be immortalized, more than half the names that shine so splendidly on the page of history. She gives the following account, in a letter to her mother: "I having, through the threats of the magistrates, and my own vile and wretched heart, confessed several things contrary to my own conscience and knowledge, though to the wounding of my own soul, the Lord pardon me for it; but, oh! the terrors of a wounded conscience who can bear! But, blessed be the Lord,

The nature of the evidence by which these charges of demoniacal possession were sustained, was quite consistent with the confession we have just quoted. A specimen from Mather will sufficiently attest the truth of this observation. "It is well known," says that historian, "that these wicked spectres did proceed so far as to steal several quantities of money from divers people, part of which individual money was dropt sometimes out of the air, before sufficient spectators, into the hands of the afflicted, while the spectres were urging them to subscribe their covenant with death. Moreover, poisons to the standers-by, wholly invisibly, were sometimes forced upon the afflicted; which, when they have, with much reluctancy, swallowed, they have swoln presently, so that the common medicines for poisons have been found necessary to relieve them. Yea, sometimes the spectres in the struggles have so dropt the poisons, that the standers-by have smelt them, and viewed them, and beheld the pillows of the miserable stained with them. Yet more, the miserable have complained bitterly of burning rags run into their forcibly distended mouths; and though nobody could see any such cloths, or indeed, any fires in the chambers, yet, presently, the scalds were seen plainly by every body on the mouths of the complainers, and not only the smell, but the smoke of the burning, sensibly filled the chambers. Once more, the miserable exclaimed extremely of branding irons heating at the fire on the hearth to mark them; now, though the standers-by could see no irons, yet they could see distinctly the print of them in the ashes, and smell them too as they were carried by the not-seen furies unto the poor creatures for whom they were intended; and those poor creatures were thereupon so stigmatized with them, that they will bear the marks of them to their dying day. Nor are these the tenth part of the prodigies that fell out among the inhabitants of New England.—Flashy people may burlesque these things, but when hundreds of the most sober people in a country, where they have as much mother-wit certainly as the rest of mankind, know them to be true, nothing but the absurd and froward spirit of Sadducism can question them. I have not yet mentioned so much as one thing that will not be justified, if it be required, by

he would not let me go on in my sins, but in mercy, I hope, to my soul, would not suffer me to keep it in any longer; but I was forced to confess the truth of all before the magistrates, who would not believe me, and God knows how soon I shall be put to death, Dear father, let me beg your prayers to the Lord in my behalf, and send us a joyful and happy meeting in heaven."—Neale, vol. ii. p. 146, 147.

To such an extent of idiocy did this folly proceed, that irrational animals did not escape suspicion, and a dog was actually hanged as being an accomplice with his master! After this, we shall be excused, perhaps, taking our stand amongst the "flashy people" who "burlesque these things;" or rather amongst those who grieve that so much ignorance and folly could possibly exist, combined with such excellent mental and moral qualities, as those with which we find it associated, both in the parent country and the colonies, during the seventeenth century.

Emboldened by their success, and carried away by the enthusiasm of deception, the accusers took higher aim, and levelled their shafts of malice against many of the most respectable as well as virtuous inhabitants, including ministers, and even the governor himself. The community were thrown into consternation. Each felt alarm for himself, his family, and his friends. The shock roused them to reflection. They considered more closely the character of the accusers; the nature of the alleged crime; the testimony, often contradictory, and never explicit; and more than all these, the high standing of some who were implicated;* and they began to doubt whether they had not been too credulous and precipitate. Of fifty-six bills which were presented at the next sessions, the grand jury threw out thirty, rejecting, in some instances, even the confession of the accused. Of the remaining twenty-six the petty jury condemned only three; but the governor had now determined to make a general sweep of the whole proceedings. He pardoned all those under sentence, threw open the prison doors, and turned a deaf ear to all the outcries and groans of the afflicted; and, in order to prevent the dissensions that might arise from retributory proceedings against the accusers and their witnesses, he proclaimed a general pardon to all persons for any concern they might have had in the prosecutions for witchcraft. The believers in witchcraft anticipated the most gloomy consequences from the free scope thus given to the operations of the powers of darkness. Great then was their surprise to find that from this moment all the troubles of the afflicted ceased, and were never more heard of. Many of the witnesses now came forward and published the most solemn recantations of the testimony they had formerly given, both against themselves and others; apologizing for their perjury by a protestation, of which all were constrained to admit the force, that no other means of saving their lives had been left to them. Many of the jurymen subscribed and published a declaration, lamenting and condemning the delusion to which they had yielded, and acknowledging that they had brought the reproach of innocent blood on their native land. The house of assembly appointed a general fast, and prayer, "that God would pardon all the errors of his servants and people in a late tragedy raised among us by Satan and his instruments." Mr. Paris, the clergyman who had instituted the first prosecutions, and promoted all the rest, sensible, at length, how dreadfully erroneous his conduct had been, hastened to make a public profession of repentance, and solemnly begged forgiveness of God and man. But the people declaring that they would never more attend the ministry of one who had been the instrument of misery and ruin to so many of their countrymen, he was obliged to resign his charge, and depart from Salem.

This scene of delusion and cruelty, which has justly excited the astonishment and reprehension of all civilized nations,† indicates most powerfully the truth, that the doctrines of Christianity were not designed by their Divine Promulgator to supersede the possession of general knowledge; but that there is no department of knowledge, the acquisition of which does not tend to exhibit the beauties of Christianity more fully, and give to its purifying efficacy a more expansive surface on which to operate. This is especially the case with mental and moral philosophy. Had these excellent men been acquainted with the structure of the human mind, they would have at once devised far other methods to counteract the delusions of afflicted childhood and half civilized Indians, than the halter and the executioner; and never would have disgraced the name of Christianity, which they pre-eminently bear, with a degree of superstition and folly equal to that of the darkest ages of popery or of heathenism. Let some of those who now stand foremost in the ranks of Christian profession ask themselves faithfully, whether, in their

* The reasons given by the historian, were not the only operating causes in staying this wide spreading evil; several actions for slander were brought by persons accused, against their fanatical slanderers; and the damages in these cases were laid to an amount so far above their means, that it was impossible for them to procure bail; of course, the defendants were imprisoned, and this frightened the whole tribe of those who had, with impunity, falsely accused whom they pleased, and thus were they completely silenced. This species of action has often been prosecuted since, with great benefit to society.—Am. Ed.

† It is but justice to the inhabitants of New England to observe, that though the present age may censure the past for its superstition, neither England nor any other nation is entitled to cast the first stone at them. More persons were put to death in England in a single county in a few months, than suffered in all the colonies during the whole period of their existence.

deficiency of general knowledge, and their rigid attachment to party, they do not imitate the reprehensible features of the puritan character, while they leave far behind their devoted zeal, manifested in the heroic sacrifices they made for the all-important truths to which they were so ardently attached.

It is matter of satisfaction to the historian, that his attention is not again to be diverted, in the annals of this state, from his peculiar province, to record events which, had the intention of religion been rightly apprehended, would not have intermixed with civil affairs in fact, and therefore, not in history.—The legislature, at its first session under the new charter, passed a law which indicates the same independent spirit that afterwards resisted the usurpations of the British parliament. It provided that no tax should be imposed upon any of his majesty's subjects, or their estates, in the province, but by the act and consent of the governor, council, and representatives of the people, in general court assembled. It is almost needless to add, that this law was disallowed by the king.

The war with the French and Indians, which began in 1690, was not yet terminated. For several years were the frontier settlements harassed by the savages, and the English were employed in expeditions against them. This continuance of the war on the part of the Indians, instigated and aided by the French, induced repeated applications for a force from the British government, to act in conjunction with land forces to be raised in New England and New York, for the reduction of Canada; and it was at length determined, that an expedition should be undertaken for that purpose. A fleet was to be employed in the winter in the reduction of Martinico; and, after the performance of that service, was to sail to Boston, take on board a body of land forces under Sir William Phipps, and proceed to Quebec. By attempting too much, the whole of this extensive project entirely failed. The attacks of the natives on the English continued with little intermission till the peace of 1697. They were carried on with Indian cunning, treachery, and cruelty. "To these causes of suffering were superadded the power of all such motives as the ingenuity of the French could invent, their wealth furnish, or their bigotry adopt. Here all the implements of war and the means of sustenance were supplied; the expedition was planned; the price was bidden for scalps; the aid of European officers and soldiers was conjoined; the devastation and slaughter were sanctioned by the ministers of religion; and the blood-hounds, while their fangs were yet dropping blood, were caressed and cherished by men regarded by them as superior beings. The intervals between formal attacks were usually seasons of desultory mischief, plunder, and butchery; and always of suspense and dread. The solitary family was carried into captivity; the lonely house burnt to the ground; and the traveller way-laid and shot in the forest. It ought, however, to be observed, to the immortal honour of these people, distinguished as they are by so many traits of brutal ferocity, that history records no instance in which the purity of a female captive was violated by them, or even threatened."*

The peace of Ryswick, which had been signed on the 20th of September, was proclaimed at Boston on the 10th of December, and the English colonies had a brief repose. By the seventh article it was agreed, that mutual restitution should be made of all the countries, forts, and colonists, taken by each party during the war.

In the year 1702, Joseph Dudley arrived at Massachusetts, with a commission from Queen Anne, who had succeeded William and Mary on the British throne, to be captain-general and governor-in-chief over that province. In his first speech to the council and assembly, he informed the house of representatives, that he was commanded by her majesty to observe to them, "that there is no other province or government belonging to the crown of England, except this, where there is not provided a fit and convenient house for the reception of the governor, and a settled stated salary for the governor, lieutenant-governor, secretary, judges, and all other officers; which, therefore, is recommended to you. And since this province is so particularly favoured by the crown, in more instances than one, their more ready obedience is justly expected in this and all other occasions." The house, in their answer the next day, observed, "As for those points which, in obedience to her majesty's command, your excellency has laid before this house, we shall proceed with all convenient speed to the consideration of them." Having resolved that the sum of 500*l.* be at this time presented out of the public treasury to the governor, the house, in their answer to some parts of his speech, observed, "As to settling a salary for the governor, it is altogether new to us; nor can we think it agreeable to our present constitution, but we shall be ready to do according to our ability, what may be proper on our part for the support of the government." Shortly after, the governor directed that the speaker and representatives should be sent for up to the council chamber; and, after expressing his regret and disappointment at their procedure, and observing that there was a necessity of his seeing the other province and the frontiers, dismissed them. Thus commenced the dispute between the governor and the general assembly of Massachusetts, upon the claims of the one, and the rights of the other, which lasted more than seventy years. It was a Gordian knot, which could not be untied, but which was severed at the revolution.

In a few years war again broke out in Europe, and hostilities speedily recommenced in America. The first blow fell upon Deerfield. In February, 1704, it was surprised in the night, about forty persons were killed, and more than one hundred were made prisoners, among whom were Mr. Williams, the minister, and his family. The killed were scalped, and the prisoners commanded to prepare for a long march to Canada. On the second day, Mrs. Williams was so exhausted with fatigue that she could go no farther. Her husband solicited permission to remain with her; but the retreating savages, according to their custom in such cases, killed her, and compelled him to proceed. Before the termination of their journey, twenty more became unable to walk, and were in like manner sacrificed. Those who survived the journey to Canada were treated by the French with humanity; and after a captivity of many years, most of them were redeemed, and returned to their friends.

New York having agreed with the French and the Western Indians to remain neutral, the enemy were enabled to pour their whole force upon Massachusetts and New Hampshire, the inhabitants of which, for ten years, endured miseries peculiar to an Indian war, of which the description we have given falls below the truth. The enemy were at all times prowling about the frontier settlements, watching in concealment for an opportunity to strike a sudden blow, and to fly with safety. The women and children retired into the garrisons; the men left their fields uncultivated, or laboured with arms at their sides, and with sentinels at every point whence an attack could be apprehended. Yet, notwithstanding these precautions, the Indians were often successful, killing sometimes an individual, sometimes a whole family, sometimes a band of labourers, ten or twelve in number; and so swift were they in their movements, that but few fell into the hands of the whites. It was computed, that the sum of one thousand pounds was expended for every Indian killed or made captive.

In 1707, Massachusetts, New Hampshire and Rhode Island, despatched an armament against Port Royal, in Nova Scotia, then in possession of the French, which returned, however, without effecting its object; but in 1710, the troops of New England, assisted by a British fleet, succeeded in reducing the place; and in compliment to Queen Anne, changed its name to Annapolis.

Encouraged by the success of this enterprise, General Nicholson visited England to concert an expedition against Canada. His proposition was adopted, and in June, 1711, Admiral Walker, with a fleet of fifteen ships of war, and forty transports, bringing an army of veteran troops, arrived at Boston. Taking on board two additional regiments, he sailed from that port about the last of July. At the same time General Nicholson repaired to Albany, to take the command of the troops that were to proceed by land. When the fleet had advanced ten leagues up the river St. Lawrence, the weather became tempestuous and foggy. A difference of opinion arose concerning the course to be pursued; the English pilots recommending one course, and the colonial another. The admiral, like most English officers, preferred the advice of his own pilots to the colonial. Pursuing the course they recommended during the night, nine transports were driven upon the rocks and dashed to pieces. From every quarter cries of distress arose, conveying, through the darkness, to those who were yet afloat, intelligence of the fate of their comrades, and of their own danger. The shrieks of the drowning pleaded powerfully for assistance, but none could be afforded until the morning dawned, when six or seven hundred, found floating on the scattered wrecks, were rescued from death, more than a thousand having sunk to rise no more. Weakened by this terrible disaster, the admiral determined to return to England, where he arrived in the month of October. The New England troops returned to their homes, and Nicholson, having learned the fate of the fleet, led back his troops to Albany. In the year 1713, France and England made peace at Utrecht, and the Indian wars terminated at the same time.

Colonel Shute, who had served under the celebrated duke of Marlborough, was appointed to succeed Governor Dudley, in the year 1716. On his arrival in the province, he found the people divided into two parties, one in favour of a public bank, which had just been established, the other of the incorporation of a private bank. Having attached himself to the interests of the former, the latter became hostile; and, led by a Mr. Cooke, virulently opposed all his measures. At the election of speaker to the general court, in 1720, this party were successful. The choice was communicated to the governor, who interposed his negative. The house persisting in their choice, and denying his right to interfere, the governor dissolved the assembly, and ordered a new election. The charter not giving to the governor a vote on the choice of a speaker, the people resolved to support their representatives, and nearly all of them were again elected. When met, to avoid a second dissolution, they chose a Mr. Lindall speaker; but in a remonstrance to the governor, reasserted their right to choose their presiding officer. The session was short, and displayed no abatement in the angry feelings of the house. Instead of 600*l.*, the usual grant to the governor for half a year's salary, they appropriated but 500, and, in evident displeasure, deferred that act until near the close of the session. At their next meeting, the same feelings prevailed, and the same diminished sum was voted. The governor then informed them, that he had been instructed by the king to recommend to the assembly to establish for him a permanent and honourable salary. The house, aware of the importance of retaining the power of granting such sums as the governor might merit by his conduct, replied, that the subject was new, and expressed a wish that the court might rise; with which request the governor complied.

This disagreement continued, the breach still widening, through several subsequent sessions. The representatives, confident of the support of the people, refused to establish a permanent salary for the governor, and often withheld the pittance they gave, until he had sanctioned the measures they had adopted. His residence in the province being thus rendered unpleasant, he suddenly and privately quitted it, in December, 1722. Upon his arrival in England, he exhibited charges against the house, of having made various encroachments upon the king's prerogative, which the agents of the province were instructed to answer and repel.

Shute remained in England until 1728, when he resigned his office, and William Burnet, then governor of New York, was appointed his successor. In his first speech, the new governor informed the house that he had received positive instructions from the king to insist on a permanent salary. The representatives, generous of their money, but tenacious of their rights, appropriated 300*l.* for the expenses of his journey, and 1400*l.* towards his support, not specifying for what time. The first sum he accepted, but absolutely declined receiving any compensation for his services, except in the mode of a fixed salary. The delegates were equally decided; and having transacted all their necessary business, requested the governor, by message, to adjourn them. He replied, that he could not comply with their request, as, if he did, he should put it out of their power to pay immediate regard to the king's instructions. The court still persisted in its refusal to comply with the reiterated and earnest requests of his majesty's representative. On this account the governor adjourned the assembly, to meet at Salem, intimating that they were too much under the influence of the inhabitants of Boston. The governor seemed determined to continue the assembly in session until the members complied with the royal mandate. In this situation, the house of representatives presented a memorial to the king, setting forth the reasons of their conduct in relation to the salary. They informed his majesty, that "it is, and has been very well known in this, as well as other nations and ages, that governors, at a distance from the prince, or seat of government, have great opportunities, and sometimes too prevailing inclinations, to oppress the people; and it is almost impossible for the prince, who is the most careful father of his subjects, to have such matters set in a true light." This address was referred to the board of trade, before whom there was a hearing in behalf of the crown, as well as on the part of the house. The board condemned the conduct of the latter, in refusing to comply with the royal instructions; and in the conclusion of the report to the king and council, discovered an extreme jealousy of the growing power and wealth of that province, and of the supposed determination of its inhabitants to become independent of the crown. "The inhabitants," say the board, "far from making suitable returns to his majesty, for the extraordinary privileges they enjoy, are daily endeavouring to wrest the small remains of power out of the hands of the crown, and to become independent of the mother kingdom. The nature of the soil and products are much the same with those of Great Britain, the inhabitants upwards of ninety-four thousand, and their militia, consisting of sixteen regiments of foot and fifteen troops of horse, in the year 1718, fifteen thousand men; and by a medium, taken from the naval officers' accounts for three years, from the 24th of June, 1714, to the 24th of June 1717, for the ports of Boston and Salem only, it appears that the trade of this country employs continually no less than three thousand four hundred and ninety-three sailors, and four hundred and ninety-two ships, making twenty-five thousand four hundred and six tons. Hence your excellencies will be apprised of what importance it is to his majesty's service, that so powerful a colony should be restrained within due bounds of obedience to the crown; which, we conceive, cannot effectually be done without the interposition of the British legislature, wherein, in our humble opinion, no time should be lost.”*

The controversy was suspended for a time by the death of the governor, which was supposed to have been hastened by his unsuccessful contest with the house of representatives. His successor was Mr. Belcher, then agent in England. As he belonged to the popular party, his appointment gave rise to the expectation, that the instruction to obtain a permanent salary was withdrawn. But not only was it left unrescinded, but enforced by a threat of punishment. The assembly were told, that, in case of further refusal, his majesty would find himself under a necessity of laying the undutiful behaviour of the province before the legislature of Great Britain, not only in this single instance, but in many others of the same nature and tendency; “whereby it manifestly appears,” his majesty observes, “that this assembly, for some years last past, have attempted, by unwarrantable practices, to weaken, if not cast off, the obedience they owe to the crown, and the dependence which all colonies ought to have on their mother country.” But neither the popularity of the new governor, nor the threats of the king, could induce a change of conduct on the part of the people of Massachusetts. Attempts were made to effect a compromise, but in vain. The assembly made a temporary grant of 1000*l.*, but the governor was instructed to assent to no other than a fixed and permanent salary. Satisfied that the house would never yield on this subject, the governor solicited a relaxation of his instructions, and the crown finally permitted him to assent to temporary grants. Thus, after a constant struggle of more than thirty years, the crown was at last compelled to yield to the bold and persevering opposition of the people of that province. This controversy was not renewed in Massachusetts until 1773, when an attempt on the part of the crown, to provide salaries for the governors and judges of that province, independent of the assembly, was resisted with the same firmness; and, as will hereafter appear, was one of the causes which induced the people of that province to declare themselves independent of the parent country.† For the present, however, these turbulent times were succeeded by a calm; during which the enemies of Governor Belcher, by incessant misrepresentation, deprived him of the favour of the ministry in England; and, in 1740, he was replaced by Mr. William Shirley.

In 1744, war again broke out between England and France, and the colonies were involved in its calamities. To guard against the incursions of the French and Indians, five hundred men were impressed, three hundred of whom were destined for the eastern frontier, and two hundred for the western. The ordinary garrisons were re-enforced, and gunpowder was sent to the several townships to be sold to the inhabitants at the prime cost. In the spring of this year opportunely arrived in Boston the king's gift to Castle William of twenty pieces of heavy artillery, and two mortars; and about the same time the legislature of Massachusetts voted a range of forts to be built between Connecticut river and New York boundary line.

Commerce in general, and especially the fisheries, suffered great injury from privateers fitted out at Louisbourg, a French port on Cape Breton. Its situation gave it such importance, that nearly six millions of dollars had been expended on its fortifications. The place was deemed so strong as to deserve the appellation of the Dunkirk of America. In peace, it was a safe retreat for the ships of France, bound homeward from the East and West Indies. In war, it gave the French the greatest advantage for ruining the fishery of the northern English colonies, and endangered the loss of Nova Scotia. The reduction of this place was, for these reasons, an object of the highest importance to New England; and Mr. Vaughan, of New Hampshire, who had often visited that place as a trader, conceived the project of an expedition against it. He communicated it to Governor Shirley, and being ardent and enthusiastic, convinced him that the enterprise was practicable, and inspired him with his own enthusiasm. Early in January, before he received any answer to the communications he had sent to England on the subject, he requested of the members of the general court, that they would lay themselves under an oath of secrecy, to receive from him a proposal of very great importance. They readily took the oath, and he communicated to them the plan which he had formed of attacking Louisbourg. The proposal was at first rejected; but it was finally carried by a majority of one. Letters were immediately despatched to all the colonies, as far as Pennsylvania, requesting their assistance, and an embargo on their ports. Forces were promptly raised, and William Pepperell, Esq. of Kittery, was appointed commander of the expedition. This officer, with several transports, under the convoy of the Shirley snow, sailed from Nantucket on the 24th of March, and arrived at Canso on the 4th of April. Here the troops, joined by those of New Hampshire and Connecticut, amounting collectively to upwards of four thousand, were detained three weeks, waiting for the ice, which environed the island of Cape Breton, to be dissolved. At length Commodore Warren, agreeably to orders from England, arrived at Canso in the Superbe, of sixty guns, with three other ships of forty guns each; and, after a consultation with the general, proceeded to cruise before Louisbourg. The general soon after sailed with the whole fleet; and on the 30th of April, coming to anchor at Chapeaurouge Bay, landed his troops. Lieutenant Colonel Vaughan conducted the first column through the woods within sight of Louisbourg, and saluted the city with three cheers. At the head of a detachment, chiefly of the New Hampshire troops, he marched in the night to the north-east part of the harbour, where they burned the warehouses containing the naval stores, and staved a large quantity of wine and brandy. The smoke of this fire, driven by the wind into the grand battery, so terrified the French, that they abandoned it; and, spiking the guns, retired to the city. The next morning Vaughan took possession of the deserted battery; but the most difficult labours of the siege remained to be performed. The cannon were to be drawn nearly two miles over a deep morass within gun-shot of the enemy's principal fortifications; and for fourteen nights the troops, with straps over their shoulders, sinking to their knees in mud, were employed in this arduous service.* The approaches were then begun in the mode which seemed most proper to the shrewd understandings of untaught militia. Those officers who were skilled in the art of war talked of zig-zags and epaulements; but the troops made themselves merry with the terms, and proceeded in their own way. By the 20th of May, they had erected five batteries, one of which mounted five forty-two pounders, and did great execution. Meanwhile, the fleet cruising in the harbour had been equally successful; it captured a French ship of sixty-four guns, loaded with stores for the garrison, to whom the loss was as distressing as to the besiegers the capture was fortunate. English ships of war were, besides, continually arriving, and added such strength to the fleet, that a combined attack upon the town was resolved upon.

Discouraged by these adverse events and menacing appearances, Duchambon, the French commander, determined to surrender; and, on the 16th of June, articles of capitulation were signed. After the surrender of the city, the French flag was kept flying on the ramparts; and several rich prizes were thus decoyed. Two East Indiamen, and one South Sea ship, estimated at 600,000*l.* sterling, were taken by the squadron at the mouth of the harbour. This expedition was one of the most remarkable events in the history of North America. It was not less hazardous in the attempt, than successful in the execution. "It displayed the enterprising spirit of New England; and though it enabled Britain to purchase a peace, yet it excited her envy and jealousy against the colonies, by whose exertions it was acquired."† The intelligence of this event spread rapidly through the colonies, and diffused universal joy. Well might the citizens of New England be somewhat elated; without even a suggestion from the mother country, they had projected, and with but comparatively little assistance achieved, an enterprise of vast importance to her and to them. Their commerce and fisheries were now secure, and their maritime cities relieved from all fear of attack from a quarter recently so great a source of dread and discomfort.

Fired with resentment at their loss, the French made extraordinary exertions to retrieve it, and to inflict chastisement on New England. The next summer they despatched to the American coast a powerful fleet, carrying a large number of soldiers. The news of its approach spread terror throughout New England; but an uncommon succession of disasters de-

* This error has been kept alive by one historian after another, to the astonishment of every one who has ever viewed the ground. It was impossible then, as now, to drag cannon over this morass in the ordinary way. A boy of the weight of seventy pounds was sent on to the morass. He could only proceed a few feet. A pole was driven down thirty feet in the mud. That the cannon was then conveyed across the morass, there could be no doubt; how, was the question. While deliberating on this subject, I heard that a gentleman was living, then past ninety years of age, in Newburyport, in the commonwealth of Massachusetts, who had been an artificer at the siege of Louisbourg. I paid him a visit, and stated my difficulties on this passage of history. Captain Noyes at once explained the whole matter. "We had (said he) several hundred pairs of snow-shoes in camp, expecting a winter campaign. I had found that I could walk, with a pair of them, over this morass, and stated the fact to General Pepperell. Secretly, I had drags built, twenty feet by sixteen, smooth and flat at the bottom. Putting the cannon on these vehicles, and taking fifty men accustomed to travel with snow-shoes, and fixing a long rope to the drag, we walked the morass without difficulty, and placed the cannon where Colonel Vaughan wished them to be; covering them with sea-weed until all our business was done, without any risk or extraordinary fatigue. All the materials for the battery were transported in the same manner; and where there appeared only a mass of sea-weed at night, a formidable battery rose in the morning. This finished the siege." The veteran spoke of the determined bravery of the troops as surpassing every thing the most experienced officers had witnessed. Pepperell was knighted for the exploit; but Vaughan, Woolcot, Gorham, and Dwight, were the heroes of that campaign; Vaughan commanded the New Hampshire troops; Woolcot the Connecticut; Gorham, Dwight, and others, those of Massachusetts.—American Editor.

prived it of all power to inflict injury. After remaining a short time on the coast, it returned to France, having lost two admirals, both of whom it was supposed put an end to their lives through chagrin; having also, by tempests, been reduced to one half its force, without effecting any of the objects anticipated.

In the month of November, 1747, a great tumult occurred in the town of Boston, arising from the following circumstance: Commodore Knowles, while lying at Nantasket with a number of men of war, losing some of his sailors by desertion, thought it reasonable that Boston should supply him with as many men as he had lost. He therefore sent his boats early in the morning, and surprised not only as many seamen as could be found on board any of the ships, but pressed some ship carpenters' apprentices, and other labouring landmen. This conduct was universally resented as outrageous; and as soon as it was dusk, several thousand people assembled in King's-street, where the general court was sitting. Stones and brickbats were thrown into the council chamber through the windows. A judicious speech of the governor from the balcony, disapproving of the impress, promising his utmost endeavours to obtain the discharge of the persons impressed, but reprehending the irregular proceedings of the people, had no effect. The seizure and restraint of the commanders and other officers who were in town were insisted on, as the only effectual method to procure the release of the inhabitants aboard the ships. The militia of Boston was summoned the next day to the aid of government, but refused to appear. The governor, judging it inexpedient to remain in town another night, withdrew to Castle William; but kept up a communication with the commodore, urging the liberation of the townsmen. Meanwhile, the council and house of representatives passed some vigorous resolutions, and the tumultuous spirit began to subside. The inhabitants, assembled in town meeting, while they expressed their sense of the great insult and injury by the impress, condemned the riotous transactions. The militia of the town the next day promptly made their appearance, and conducted the governor with great pomp to his house; and the commodore dismissed most, if not all, of the inhabitants who had been impressed; and the squadron sailed, to the joy and repose of the town.

In October, 1748, a treaty of peace between England and France was signed at Aix la Chapelle. By the articles of this treaty, Cape Breton was given up to the French, in a compromise for restoring the French conquests in the low countries to the empress queen of Hungary and the States General, and for a general restitution of places captured by the other belligerent powers. It was naturally a mortification to the inhabitants of New England, that what they termed, not unjustly, "their own acquisition," should be restored to France; but so long as peace continued, they sustained no disadvantage. In most respects, Massachusetts Bay was never in a more easy and happy situation, than at the close of this war. By the reimbursement of the whole charge incurred by the expedition against Cape Breton, the province was set free from a heavy debt, and was enabled to exchange a depreciated paper medium, which had long been the sole instrument of trade, for the more substantial one of silver and gold, a commercial advantage which almost excited the envy of the other colonies, in which paper was the principal currency. The Indians upon the frontiers were so reduced, that new settlements were made without danger, which not only caused the territory settled to increase in value, but afforded materials for enlarging the commerce of the province.

There was but little subject for controversy in the general assembly. Governor Shirley's administration had been satisfactory to the major part of the people. Indeed, the prosperous state of the province was very much owing to the success of his vigorous measures, of which he wished to give an account in person, and for that purpose, as well as to promote some arrangements for the defence of the colony against the encroachments of the French, had obtained leave to go to England.

Hostilities from the Indians had ceased when peace was concluded with France; but it was thought necessary on this, as on previous occasions, to have the peace formally recognized. Scarcely, however, was this effected in due form, before a circumstance occurred which had nearly occasioned a new war. In the end of November, actuated by feelings of revenge for past injuries, some English inhabitants of a place in the county of York, called Wiscasset, killed an Indian, and dangerously wounded two others. Two persons were apprehended and brought to trial for the murder; but they were, it appears, unjustly acquitted. "Many good people at this time," says Hutchinson, "lamented the disposition, which they thought was discovered, to distinguish between the guilt of killing an Indian, and that of killing an Englishman, as if God had not made of one blood all the nations of men upon the face of the earth."* The Indians made an attempt to avenge themselves by the capture of Fort Richmond, on the Kennebeck, but were not successful; they succeeded, however, in taking prisoners several of the inhabitants who resided near the fort: but after a short time the injury was forgotten.

In the following year, the colonies of Massachusetts and Connecticut were deeply engaged in a controversy respecting their boundary line; but the limits of our work will not permit a detail of the affair, nor would it be interesting to the general reader. During this year also, the question of "paper against gold," which has occupied so much of the attention of the British legislature, and of the community at large, occasioned several tumults in Boston. Our readers will, however, be surprised to learn, that the dissatisfaction was occasioned, not by the introduction of paper, but by the substitution of gold and silver for what has been elegantly termed the "old rag system." "The paper," they said, "was not worth hoarding, but silver and gold would all fall to the share of men of wealth, and would either be exported or hoarded up, and no part of it would go to the labourer, or the lower class of people, who must take their pay in goods, or go without. In a short time, however, experience taught them, that it was as easy for a frugal industrious person to obtain silver, as it had been to obtain paper; and the prejudice in the town of Boston was so much abated, that, when a large number of people from Abington, and other towns near to it, came to Boston, expecting to be joined by the like people there, they were hooted at, and insulted by the boys and servants, and obliged to return home disappointed."*

It has already been observed, that the restoration of peace, and the almost entire extinction of the Indians on the frontiers, added much to the security and to the value of the land; these circumstances also afforded a prospect for a more extended settlement of the colony. A Mr. Waldo, proprietor of a large tract of land in the eastern frontier, induced many emigrants from Germany, and other foreign protestant states, to accept conditional grants of land; but Governor Hutchinson seems to be of opinion, that the expectations, both of the emigrants and of the proprietor, were disappointed.

The administration of Mr. Phipps, who had acted as lieutenant-governor during Mr. Shirley's absence, was but short; and, as was usually the case, the government of lieutenants was little disturbed by any controversy with the general court. Mr. Shirley returned to Boston in August, 1753. During his abode in France, he took a step, which, according to Mr. Hutchinson's idea of it at least, "he had reason to repent of as long as he lived. At the age of three-score he was captivated with the charms of a young girl, his landlord's daughter in Paris, and married her privately. This imprudence lessened him in Lord Halifax's esteem; and, though he had shown himself to be very capable of his trust of commissary in France, as well as very faithful in the discharge of it, yet, as he failed of success, which, more frequently than real merit, entitles to reward, his private fortune was much hurt by his employment. The rumour of his marriage came to New England before his arrival, and some who were not well affected to him, were ready enough to insinuate that his French connexions might induce him to favour the French cause, but his conduct evinced the contrary. He pronounced an accommodation desperate, that the sword must settle the controversy, and that it ought to be done without delay, otherwise the French would make themselves too strong for all the force the English could bring against them."†

The period of the French war of 1756—1763, the confines of which we now approach, will require a separate notice, after the history of the remaining colonies has been brought down to the same date. As it implicated the whole of the British settlements in North America, and promoted those ideas of federative union, which were subsequently attended with such important results, a combined view of the operations of the war will be preferable to allotting a share of its history to each of the colonies.

It may be imagined by some of our readers, that we have been unduly severe on the errors of the noble-minded founders of the greatest republican empire the world has yet witnessed; but we cannot plead guilty to such a charge. These errors, it is true, have been fully exposed; but, great as they are, the characters of which they form but the exceptions can well stand the shock their development excites. The faults of great and good men should, after the highest model of historical writing, be faithfully narrated. Their record is essential to prevent the mind, while it gives due weight to the example and opinions of past ages, from receiving its chief impulse from a source still impregnated with impure infusions; and to open a channel for the mighty tide of reason and of truth, whose waters purify as they carry forward the mass of example. Were the defects of the heroes of New England, however, far greater, and their virtues far less, they would yet throw into the shade of merited oblivion the characters of their defamers, either of the past or of the present age.

CHAPTER IV.

NEW HAMPSHIRE AND MAINE.*

THE history of the colony of Massachusetts is, to a considerable extent, that of all the New England colonies; but still it is requisite to give each of the states a distinct, though a more brief, notice. The first attempts at colonizing that part of North America, now designated as the states of New Hampshire and Maine, are to be traced to the zeal of Sir Ferdinando Gorges, one of the earliest and most persevering of those who undertook to people with civilized inhabitants the transatlantic wilds. Having obtained a grant from the chartered company of Plymouth, already so frequently referred to, in conjunction with some other principal members of the company, among whom was Sir John Popham, lord chief justice of the court of King's Bench, with other persons of influence, he despatched two vessels to explore their newly acquired territory. One of these was seized by the Spaniards; but the safe return and favourable report of the other encouraged the adventurers to prosecute their undertaking. A colony was therefore organized, consisting of George Popham, as president, Raleigh Gilbert, as admiral, and six inferior officers, with about one hundred private individuals; the imagination of the projectors having sketched the outlines of a large and flourishing state. They selected a small island at the mouth of the river Kennebeck for their place of residence, induced by the commodiousness of its situation as a port for fishermen. Arriving towards the close of the year, they were barely enabled to build and fortify a store-house before the cold became intense; and they were afterwards distressed by a rapid succession of unforeseen hardships. Having emigrated in the expectation of enjoying a perpetual spring, their disappointment, when exposed to the premature and unusual severity of a northern winter, may be readily conceived. The loss of their store-house by fire, and the death of their president, had already depressed their courage, when tidings arrived of the death of Sir John Popham, who was the very soul of the expedition. Gilbert also returned to England in the spring, having succeeded to a rich inheritance by the death of his brother, Sir John Gilbert. The resolution of the adventurers seems to have sunk under these accumulated misfortunes, for the settlement was soon afterwards abandoned in despair. The disappointed colonists seemed anxious to hide their disgrace by invectives against the cold and sterile regions which they had forsaken; and they were so far successful, that the company of Plymouth never made another effort of equal magnitude with the expedition to Sagadahoc. Many attempts were made by Sir Ferdinando Gorges, individually, to establish colonies in North Virginia, with a perseverance worthy of better fortune than it obtained; for, after spending a large portion of his life and estate in these attempts, and involving himself in several vexatious suits, the whole issue of his exertions was the establishment of an inconsiderable settlement in Maine.

It was in the year 1623, that Sir Ferdinando Gorges, John Mason,† and others, having obtained of the Plymouth or New England company grants of several tracts of land, lying north of Massachusetts, sent from England, a few persons to begin a settlement. Part landed, and for a short time remained at Little Harbour, on the west side of Piscataqua river, and near its mouth, where they erected the first house, calling it Mason Hall; the remainder, proceeding higher up the river, settled at Cocheco, afterwards called Dover. Fishing and trade being the principal objects of these emigrants, their settlements increased slowly.

In 1635, a fresh distribution of territory was made by the Plymouth Company, when they obtained a grant of land, lying along the coast from Naumkeag river, near the northern boundary of Massachusetts, to the river Piscataqua, extending sixty miles into the country from their sources; and the region, thus conveyed, was for the first time called New Hampshire. As no more ancient patents stood in the way of the present, and as length of occupancy formed no bar, Mason acquired that kind of right to the soil which the law of England considered as valid; but it gave him none of the powers of government. He sent agents to dispose of his lands, and to take general care of his interests; but he soon after died, leaving it to others to enjoy his rights, and to exercise his powers. At the same period, the company made a grant of a still larger territory, extending from the northern limits of New Hampshire, north-eastward, to the river Kennebeck, and from them sixty miles into the country, to Sir Ferdinando Gorges, in absoriver Merrimack; and up each of those rivers to the farthest head of them, then to cross over from the head of the one to the head of the other, with all the islands lying within three miles of the coast. This district was called Mariana."—Belknap's New Hampshire, vol. i. c. 1.

* Although the Maine was not constituted a state till subsequently to the declaration of independence, its early history is so connected with that of New Hampshire, that it is deemed desirable to unite them in this chapter.

† "John Mason procured from the council of Plymouth a grant of all the land from the river of Naumkeag round Cape Ann to the lute property, with such powers of jurisdiction as the grantors possessed. The same year he despatched William Gorges, his nephew, to govern that territory, then called Somersetshire, who ruled, for some years, a few traders and fishers with a good sense equal to the importance of the trust. But, whether Gorges distrusted his own powers, or was actuated by the prudent caution which experience inspires, he obtained from the favour of his prince a patent of confirmation, in April, 1639. His limits were now extended to one hundred miles from the rivers south-westward into the desert. This immense region was denominated Maine; and he was invested with all the royal rights of a count-palatine, with a reference to the powers formerly exercised by the bishop of Durham. Animated by these attentions, and invested with these powers, he established a civil government within his province in the subsequent year. This constitution was, however, merely executive, without any of the powers of legislation; nor was an assembly in which the people were represented, either mentioned or alluded to. He did not even offer liberal terms on which men might purchase and enjoy his lands, though this had been at all times proposed as the best means to promote settlement and augment population. The province consequently languished for years in hopeless feebleness.

The persecuting policy of the Massachusetts colony peopled this country, when money and persuasion had been tried in vain. It has already been stated, that among those who were expelled from the jurisdiction of Massachusetts, at the time of the dissensions occasioned by opposition to the spread of antinomian sentiments at Boston, was the Rev. John Wheelwright. Previously to the date of Mason's patent, he had purchased the land of the Indians, and laid the foundation of Exeter. In the year 1630, thirty-five persons residing in that town combined and established civil government; and within a year or two afterwards, the inhabitants of Dover and Portsmouth followed their example, each town remaining distinct and independent.

These towns did not long remain in this dissociated state. There appears, indeed, to have been some difference of opinion, but the majority were for an incorporation with the colony of Massachusetts; and, accordingly, the general court, in October, 1641, passed an ordinance, declaring that the people inhabiting on the river Piscataqua shall henceforth be reputed under its power, as are already the other inhabitants; that they shall have the same order for the administration of justice; that they shall be exempted from all public charges, except such as shall arise among themselves, or shall be for their own benefit; that they shall be allowed the same liberties of fishing, of planting, and of felling timber, as formerly; and that they shall be allowed to send two deputies to the court at Boston. Thus New Hampshire, at the end of six years only, ceased to be a separate province. The general court, having in this manner conferred on its neighbours the greatest of blessings, general protection, and a regular administration of justice, turned its next cares to their future welfare. It sent them several ministers, Moody, Cotton, Reyner, and others, by whose care and diligence, as we are assured, the people were very much civilized and reformed; but Wheelwright and his followers, who had formerly sought an asylum in the desert from the persecutions of their enemies, fled across the Piscataqua into the province of Maine, because, in the present change, they feared future injuries. This union proved perplexing to the proprietary, and ultimately embarrassing to the councils of the parent state. It was in vain for Mason, who now acted as agent for his kinsmen, to protest against the daily encroachments on their lands; and it was to no purpose he petitioned the general court. It had been stipulated as the groundwork on which was established the subjection of New Hampshire, that the views of their opponents should be countenanced, and the assumed rights of the proprietors consequently depressed. Being now freed from the weighty cares of government; being protected from the attacks of their Indian enemies, and from their internal dissensions, the people of New Hampshire, during the space of forty years, enjoyed the advantages and blessings of a regular administration, and engaged successfully in all the pursuits that naturally tend to promote the prosperity, wealth, and greatness of nations. In the year 1652, the inhabitants of Gorges' territories of the Maine also were induced to submit themselves to the government of Massachusetts.

Having contended with the general court upwards of fourteen years to no purpose, Gorges and Mason made a tender of their claims to Charles II., who favourably received proposals which promised future advantages to his family, for he had entertained the design of forming New Hampshire and Maine into an establishment for the duke of Monmouth, the most beloved of all his sons. The general court, relying on its own construction of its patent, though it explained by its agents its conduct and pretensions, declined long either to give up possession, or to appoint deputies to defend its proceedings. The monarch was wearied with continued solicitation; and the committee of plantations at length determined to propose to the Massachusetts government, either to receive commissioners authorized to decide amicably the claims of all, or to send agents to answer before the king in council: adding, what was probably decisive, "that, should it still prove refractory, notwithstanding the equity of this overture, every means would be used to interrupt the trade of the colony, which, by the acts of trade, may be given it." After sixteen years, in which the whole energy of government had been exerted, the general court sent agents to England, who were empowered to consent to the final settlement of claims which had at last become serious. When the disputants appeared before Rainsford and North, the two chief justices to whom this controversy was referred, the agents at once disclaimed pretensions which had been so long defended with the greatest ability as sacred, because their counsel informed them that they could not possibly be defended before such judges.* The limits of Massachusetts were restrained to the literal expression of its charter, and its jurisdiction within the boundaries of the soil; and the province of Maine was adjudged to Gorges, with such right of government as had been granted by the patent under which he claimed.

Long had Charles II. been in treaty with the proprietors of New Hampshire and Maine; but his poverty, which was well known in New England, the wars that happened in the mean time, the intrigues of his adversaries, and the high expectations of the owners, all prevented the completion of a business which might have proved so advantageous both to prince and people. For years had the friends of Massachusetts warned her of the danger of suffering such claims to exist; and ultimately, the agents prudently purchased what had been so long disputed. The general court applied now, with an ability equal to the prudence with which it had made the acquisition, to derive some advantage from what had cost so much money and vexation. As proprietary, it appointed the deputy governor president of Maine, it named officers, it established various judicatories, and justice was administered in the mode prescribed by the patent of Gorges. No assembly, of which the representatives of the people composed a constituent part, was allowed, because none had been mentioned in the original grant; a measure by no means satisfactory to the inhabitants, who were thereby deprived of their rights as citizens.

When the decision respecting Maine was confirmed by Charles II., the province of New Hampshire was left without a regular government. It was determined, therefore, that New Hampshire should be constituted a separate province, to be ruled by a president and council to be appointed by the king, and a house of representatives to be chosen by the people. The first assembly, consisting of eleven members, met in 1680, at Portsmouth. At this session, a code of laws was adopted, of which the first, in a style worthy of freemen, declared "that no act, imposition, law, or ordinance, should be imposed upon the inhabitants of the province, but such as should be made by the assembly, and approved by the president and council."

Mason, who had been appointed a member of the council, arrived during the year in the colony. He assumed the title of lord proprietor, claimed the soil as his property, and threatened to prosecute all who would not take from him leases of the land they occupied. His pretensions were resisted by most of the inhabitants, who claimed the fee-simple of the soil by what they deemed a more righteous, if not a more legal title. The peace of the colony was long disturbed by these conflicting claims. At the head of those who contended with Mason, stood Major Waldron, of Dover. Against him and many others suits were instituted. No defence being made, judgments were obtained; but so general was the hostility to Mason, that he never dared attempt to enforce them. After Sir Edward Andros was deposed, the inhabitants of New Hampshire desired to be re-incorporated with Massachusetts; their request being opposed by Samuel Allen, who had purchased Mason's title, it was refused, and Allen himself made governor of the colony. Under his administration, the disputes occasioned by adverse claims to land continued to rage with increased violence. Other suits were instituted, and judgments obtained; but the sheriff was forcibly resisted by a powerful combination, whenever he attempted to put the plaintiff in possession.

From Indian hostilities, this colony suffered more severely than her neighbours. The surprise of Dover, in 1689, was effected with the most shocking barbarity; though the natives having been ill-treated by one of the principal inhabitants may account for, if not palliate, their ferocious revenge. Having determined upon their plan of attack, the Indians employed their usual art to lull the suspicions of the inhabitants. So civil and respectful was their behaviour, that they occasionally obtained permission to sleep in the fortified houses in the town. On the evening of the fatal night, they assembled in the neighbourhood, and sent their women to apply for lodgings at the houses devoted to destruction. When all was quiet, the doors were opened, and the signal given.

The Indians rushed into Waldron's house, and hastened to his apartment. Awakened by the noise, he seized his sword, and drove them back, but when returning for his other arms was stunned with a hatchet, and fell. They then dragged him into his hall, seated him in an elbow chair upon a long table, and insultingly asked him, "Who shall judge Indians now?" After feasting upon provisions, which they compelled the rest of the family to procure, each one with his knife cut gashes across his breast, saying, "I cross out my account." When weakened with the loss of blood, he was about to fall from the table, his own sword was held under him, which put an end to his tortures. At other houses, similar acts of cruelty were perpetrated; in the whole, twenty-three persons were killed, and twenty-nine carried prisoners to Canada, who were mostly sold to the French. Many houses were burned, and much property was plundered; but so expeditious were the Indians, that they had fled beyond reach before the neighbouring people could be collected. The war thus commenced, was not easily terminated. The French, by giving premiums for scalps, and by purchasing the English prisoners, animated the Indians to exert all their activity and address, and the frontier inhabitants endured the most aggravated sufferings. The peace of Ryswick, in 1697, closed the distressing scene till 1703, when another war began, which continued ten years.

During the year 1719, above one hundred families, mostly presbyterians, emigrated from the north of Ireland, and settled in the town of Londonderry.* They introduced the foot spinning wheel, the manufacture of linen, and the culture of potatoes. They were industrious, hardy, and useful citizens.

A few years only transpired before the inhabitants again suffered the afflictions of an Indian war. Following the example of the French, the government offered premiums for scalps, which induced several volunteer companies to undertake expeditions against the enemy. One of these, commanded by Captain Lovewell, was greatly distinguished. In May, 1725, with thirty-four men, he fought a famous Indian chief, named Paugus, at the head of about eighty savages, near the shores of a pond in Pequackett. Lovewell's men were determined either to conquer or die, although outnumbered by the Indians more than twice. They fought till Lovewell and Paugus were killed, and all Lovewell's men but nine were either killed or dangerously wounded. The savages having lost, as was supposed, sixty of their number out of eighty, and being convinced of the fierce and determined resolution of their foes, at length retreated, and left them masters of the ground. The scene of this desperate and bloody action, which took place in the town that is now called Fryeburgh, is often visited with interest to this day, and the names both of those who fell, and those who survived, are yet repeated with exultation.†

After the lapse of a considerable period from the transfer from Mason to Allen, it was discovered that the conveyance was so defective as to be void. In 1746, John Tufton Mason, a descendant of the original grantee, claiming the lands possessed by his ancestors, conveyed them, for fifteen hundred pounds, to twelve persons, subsequently called the Masonian

* "The settlement was at first called Nutfield; but it was incorporated, in 1722, by the name of Londonderry. Mr. James Macgregore was their first minister. He continued with them until his death; and his memory is still precious among them. He was a wise, affectionate, and faithful guide to them, both in civil and religious concerns."—Belknap's New Hampshire, vol. ii. p. 36—39.

† "John Lovewell, a captain in the militia of Massachusetts, the hero of Pigwackett, was the son of Zaccheus L., who was an ensign in the army of O. Cromwell, and who settled at Dunstable, and died there, aged 120, being the oldest person who ever died in New Hampshire. Zaccheus had three sons, Zaccheus, a colonel in the French war of 1759; Jonathan, a preacher, representative, and judge; and the subject of this article. In the Indian wars a large bounty being offered for scalps, Capt. Lovewell, at the head of a volunteer company of thirty men, marched to the north of Winipiseogee lake, and killed an Indian, and took a boy prisoner, Dec. 19, 1724. Having obtained his reward at Boston, he augmented his company to seventy, and marched to the same place. There dismissing thirty men for the want of provisions, he proceeded with forty men to a pond in Wakefield, now called Lovewell's pond, where he discovered ten Indians asleep by a fire; they were on their march from Canada to the frontiers. He killed them all, Feb. 20, 1725, and with savage triumph entered Dover with their scalps hooped and elevated on poles, for each of which one hundred pounds was paid out of the public treasury at Boston. He marched a third time with forty-six men. Leaving a few men at a fort, which he built at Ossapy pond, he proceeded with thirty-four men to the north end of a pond in Pigwackett, now Fryeburg, in Maine, and there a severe action was fought with a party of forty-two Indians, commanded by Paugus and Wahwa, May 8, 1725. At the first fire, Lovewell and eight of his men were killed; the remainder retreated a short distance to a favourable position, and defended themselves. With the pond in their rear, the mouth of an unfordable brook on their right, a rocky point on their left, and having also the shelter of some large pine trees, they fought bravely from ten o'clock till evening, when the Indians,—who had lost their leader, Paugus, killed by Mr. Chamberlain,—retired, and fled from Pigwackett. Ensign Robbins and two others were mortally wounded; these were necessarily left behind to die. Eleven, wounded but able to march, and nine, unhurt, at the rising of the moon, quitted the fatal spot. Jonathan Frye, the chaplain, Lieut. Farwell, and another man, died in the woods, in consequence of their wounds. The others, with the widows and children of the slain, received a grant of Lovewell's town, or Suncook, now Pembroke, N. H., in 1728, in recompense of their sufferings. The bodies of twelve were afterwards found by Col. Tyng, and buried. Capt. Lovewell had two sons; John died in Dunstable, and Colonel Nehemiah in Corinth, Vermont. His daughter married Captain Joseph Baker, of Pembroke. The last of his company, Thomas Ainsworth, died at Brookfield, January, 1794, aged 85."—Allen's Biography.

proprietors; who, to silence opposition, relinquished all title to the lands already occupied, and also granted townships on the most liberal terms. Reserving certain portions of the land for themselves, for ministers, and for schools, they required merely that the grantees should, within a limited time, erect mills and meeting-houses, clear and construct roads, and settle ministers. In the course of time, nearly all the Masonian lands, being about one fourth of the whole, were in this manner granted; and contentions ceased to disturb the repose, or impede the prosperity of the colony.

CHAPTER V.

CONNECTICUT.

It appears incontrovertibly established, that the Dutch effected the first settlements on the river Connecticut; and it seems impossible to account, on any just principles, for their being regarded as intruders by the English settlers. They had made the first discovery of Hudson's river, and had established themselves upon its banks. They had obtained a patent from their government, who had as good a right to grant lands discovered by their subjects, as any other state. This patent included the lands on Connecticut river, which was discovered by them before it was known by the English to exist, and before the grant of the New England patent. After trading with the Indians for several years, they purchased of them a tract of land, and built upon it a fort and trading house, before the country had been taken possession of by the English; and the people from the Plymouth and Massachusetts colonies, when they attempted to drive them from it, came without a shadow of title from the Plymouth company, under whom they professed to claim.*

The Connecticut colony consisted of people who first emigrated from England to Massachusetts, and, in the years 1630 and 1632, settled and formed themselves into churches at Dorchester, Watertown, and Cambridge, where they resided several years. But either because the number of emigrants to Massachusetts did not allow them all such a choice as they wished of good lands, or because some jealousies had arisen between their pastors and leaders; and the leading men of the colony, they took the resolution of seating themselves again in the wilderness; and in the years 1635 and 1636 they removed their families to Windsor, Weathersfield, and Hartford, on the Connecticut river.

Having made some preparation in the course of the summer for their winter's accommodation, to the number of about sixty, men, women, and children, set out on foot, about the middle of October, from Boston to Connecticut, through the pathless wilderness, accompanied by their cattle, swine, and other property. After a long and tedious journey through a continued forest, and over rivers and mountains, they reached their place of destination very late in the season. "The winter set in this year much sooner than usual, and the weather was stormy and severe. By the 15th of November, Connecticut river was frozen over, and the snow was so deep, and the season so tempestuous, that a considerable number of the cattle, which had been driven on from Massachusetts, could not be brought across the river. The people had so little time to prepare their huts and houses, and to erect sheds and shelters for their cattle, that the sufferings of man and beast were extreme. Indeed, the hardships and distresses of the first planters of Connecticut scarcely admit of a description. To carry much provision or furniture through a pathless wilderness was impracticable. Their principal provisions and household furniture were therefore put on board several small vessels, which, by reason of delays and the tempestuousness of the season, were either cast away, or did not arrive. Several vessels were wrecked on the coasts of New England by the violence of the storms. Two shallops, laden with

* Governor Bradford gives the following account of this transaction, which confirms the Dutch claim of previous purchase and possession. "But the Dutch begin now to repent," viz. of their invitation to the English—"and hearing of our purpose and preparation, endeavour to prevent us, get in a little before us, make a slight fort, and plant two pieces of ordnance, threatening to stop our passage. But we having a great new bark and a frame of a house, with boards, nails, &c., ready, that we might have defence against the Indians, who are much offended that we bring home and restore the right sachems of the place called Watawanute, so as we are to encounter a double danger in this attempt, both the Dutch and Indians. When we come up the river, the Dutch demand what we intend, and whither we would go? We answer, Up the river to trade. Now our order was to go and seat above them. They bid us strike and stay, or they would shoot us; and stood by their ordnance ready fitted. We answer, We have a commission from the governor of Plymouth to go up the river to such a place; and if they shoot us, we must obey our order and proceed; we would not molest them, but go on. So we pass along, and the Dutch threaten us hard, yet they shoot not. Coming to our place, about a mile above the Dutch, we quickly clap up our house, land our provisions, leave the company appointed, send the bark home, and afterwards palisade our house about, and fortify better. The Dutch send word home to the Monhatos what was done; and, in process of time, they send a band of about seventy men, in warlike manner, with colours displayed, to assault us; but seeing us strengthened, and it would cost blood, they come to a parley, and return in peace. And this was our entrance there. We did the Dutch no wrong, for we took not a foot of any land they bought, but went to the place above them, and bought that tract of land which belonged to the Indians we carried with us, and our friends, with whom the Dutch had nothing to do."—North American Review, vol. viii. p. 84, 85.

goods from Boston to Connecticut, in October, were cast away on Brown's Island, near the Gurnet's nose; and the men, with every thing on board, were lost. A vessel, with six of the Connecticut people on board, which sailed from the river for Boston, early in November, was, about the middle of the month, cast away in Manamet Bay. The men got on shore, and after wandering ten days in deep snow and a severe season, without meeting with any human being, arrived, nearly spent with cold and fatigue, at New Plymouth. By the last of November, or beginning of December, provision generally failed in the settlements on the river, and famine and death looked the inhabitants sternly in the face. Some of them, driven by hunger, attempted their way, in this severe season, through the wilderness, from Connecticut to Massachusetts. Of thirteen in one company who made this attempt, one, in passing the river, fell through the ice, and was drowned. The other twelve were ten days on their journey, and would all have perished, had it not been for the assistance of the Indians. Indeed, such was the distress in general, that, by the 3d and 4th of December, a considerable part of the new settlers were obliged to abandon their habitations. Sixty persons, men, women, and children, were necessitated, in the extremity of winter, to go down to the mouth of the river to meet their provisions, as the only expedient to preserve their lives. Not meeting with the vessels which they expected, they all went on board the Rebecca, a vessel of about sixty tons. This, two days before, was frozen in twenty miles up the river; but, by the falling of a small rain, and the influence of the tide, the ice became so broken, and was so far removed, that she made a shift to get out. She ran, however, upon the bar, and the people were forced to unlade her to get her off. She was reladen, and in five days reached Boston. Had it not been for these providential circumstances, the people must have perished with famine. The people who kept their stations on the river, suffered in an extreme degree. After all the help they were able to obtain by hunting, and from the Indians, they were obliged to subsist on acorns, malt, and grains.*

In the following spring, those who had made their escape from Connecticut returned, and they were joined by the rest of those who had determined to make a part of the new colony. About the beginning of June, Mr. Hooker, Mr. Stone, and about a hundred men, women, and children, took their departure from Cambridge, and travelled more than a hundred miles through a hideous and trackless wilderness to Hartford. They had no guide but their compass, and made their way over mountains, through swamps, thickets, and rivers, which were not passable but with great difficulty. They had no cover but the heavens, nor any lodgings but those which simple nature afforded them. They drove with them one hundred and sixty head of cattle, and by the way subsisted on the milk of their cows. Mrs. Hooker was borne through the wilderness upon a litter. The people generally carried their packs, arms, and some utensils. They were nearly a fortnight on their journey. This adventure was the more remarkable, as many of this company were persons of rank, who had lived in England in honour, affluence, and delicacy, and were entire strangers to fatigue and danger.†

From the commencement of the Connecticut colony, the natives discovered a hostile disposition. Their principal enemy was the Pequods, the most numerous and warlike nation within the limits of the state, and perhaps in New England. They inhabited the country which environs the towns of New London, Groton, and Stonington. Sassacus, the great prince of the Pequods, had under him six and twenty sachems, and could bring into the field seven hundred or a thousand warriors, who had been long accustomed to victory. The royal residence was at a large fort situated on a beautiful eminence in the town of Groton, which commands an extensive prospect of the sea and of the surrounding country. There was also another fortress, called Mystic fort, situated in the town of Stonington. After suffering repeated injuries, and the murder of about thirty of their people, principally by the Pequods, the general court, which had been convened for the purpose, resolved on active hostilities, and immediately raised an army of ninety men, half the effective force of the colony. These were to be joined by two hundred men from Massachusetts, and forty from Plymouth. The court which declared war was holden on the 1st of May; the men were raised and embarked on the river, under the command of Captain Mason, on the 10th; and, after being wind-bound several days, sailed from the mouth of the river for Narraganset bay on the 19th. They were accompanied by sixty Moheagan and River Indians, under Uncas, a Moheagan sachem. On reaching Narraganset bay, they landed to the number of seventy-seven English men, marched into the country of the Narragansets, and communicated their design to Miantonomoh, the sachem of the country, who offered to join them. Information was here received that Captain Patrick had reached Providence, with a company of Massachusetts troops, but it was resolved not to wait for this reinforcement. On the next day, they marched twenty miles through the west part of Rhode Island, and reached Niantick, which bordered on the Pe-

* "In the morning, a considerable number of Miantonimoh's men came out and joined the English. This encouraged many of the Nianticks also to join them. They soon formed a circle, and made protestations how gallantly they would fight, and what numbers they would kill. When the army marched the next morning, the captain had with him nearly five hundred Indians. He marched twelve miles, to the ford in Pawcatuck river. The day was very hot, and the men, through the great heat, and a scarcity of provision, began to faint. The army, therefore, made a considerable halt, and refreshed themselves. Here the Narraganset Indians began to manifest their dread of the Pequods, and to inquire of Captain Mason, with great anxiety, what were his real intentions. He assured them, that it was his design to attack the Pequods in their forts. At this they appeared to be panic struck, and filled with amazement. Many of them drew off, and returned to Narraganset. The army marched on about three miles, and came to Indian cornfields; and the captain, imagining that he drew near the enemy, made a halt; he called his guides and council, and demanded of the Indians how far it was to the forts. They represented that it was twelve miles to Sassacus's fort, and that both forts were in a manner impregnable. Wequash, a Pequot captain, or petty sachem, who had revolted from Sassacus to the Narragansets, was the principal guide, and he proved faithful. He gave such information respecting the distance of the forts from each other, and the distance which they were then at from the chief sachems, as determined him and his officers to alter the resolution which they had before adopted, of attacking them both at once, and to make a united attack upon that at Mystic. He found his men so fatigued in marching through a pathless wilderness with their provisions, arms, and ammunition, and so affected with the heat, that this resolution appeared to be absolutely necessary. One of Captain Underhill's men became lame at the same time, and began to fail. The army, therefore, proceeded directly to Mystic, and continuing their march, came to a small swamp between two hills, just at the disappearing of the day-light. The officers supposing that they were now near the fort, pitched their little camp between or near two large rocks, in Groton, since called Porter's rocks. The men were faint and weary, and though the rocks were their pillows, their rest was sweet. The guards and sentinels were considerably advanced in front of the army, and heard the enemy singing at the fort, who continued their rejoicings even until midnight. They had seen the vessels pass the harbour some days before, and had concluded that the English were afraid, and had no courage to attack them. They were therefore rejoicing, singing, dancing, insulting them, and wearying themselves, on this account. The night was serene, and, towards morning, the moon shone clear. The important crisis was now come, when the very existence of Connecticut, under Providence, was to be determined by the sword in a single action, and to be decided by the good conduct of less than eighty brave men. The Indians who remained were now sorely dismayed, and though at first they had led the van, and boasted of great feats, yet were now all fallen back in the rear. About two hours before day, the men were roused with all expedition, and, briefly commending themselves and their cause to God, advanced immediately towards the fort. After a march of about two miles, they came to the foot of a large hill, where a fine country opened before them. The captain, supposing that the fort could not be far distant, sent for the Indians in the rear to come up. Uncas and Wequash at length appeared. He demanded of them where the fort was. They answered, on the top of the hill. He demanded of them where were the other Indians. They answered, that they were much afraid. The captain sent to them not to fly, but to surround the fort at any distance they pleased, and see quods' country.* The army wheeled directly to Mystic fort, which was immediately attacked; the contest, though tremendously severe, terminated in favour of the English, and in the destruction of the Indians. Although this victory was complete, the situation of the army was extremely dangerous and distressing. Several were killed, and one fourth of whether Englishmen would fight. The day was nearly dawning, and no time was now to be lost. The men pressed on in two divisions, Captain Mason to the north-eastern, and Captain Underhill to the western entrance. As the object which they had been so long seeking came into view, and while they reflected they were to fight not only for themselves, but their parents, wives, children, and the whole colony, the martial spirit kindled in their bosoms, and they were wonderfully animated and assisted. As Captain Mason advanced within a rod or two of the fort, a dog barked, and an Indian roared out, 'Owanux! Owanux!' That is, Englishmen! Englishmen! The troops pressed on, and, as the Indians were rallying, poured in upon them, through the palisades, a general discharge of their muskets, and then wheeling off to the principal entrance, entered the fort sword in hand. Notwithstanding the suddenness of the attack, and the blaze and thunder of the arms, the enemy made a manly and desperate resistance. Captain Mason and his party drove the Indians in the main street towards the west part of the fort, where some bold men, who had forced their way, met them, and made such slaughter among them, that the street was soon clear of the enemy. They secreted themselves in and behind their wigwams, and taking advantage of every covert, maintained an obstinate defence. The captain and his men entered the wigwams, where they were beset with many Indians, who took every advantage to shoot them, and lay hands upon them, so that it was with great difficulty that they could defend themselves with their swords. After a severe conflict, in which many of the Indians were slain, some of the English killed, and others sorely wounded, the victory still hung in suspense. The captain, finding himself much exhausted, and out of breath, as well as his men, by the extraordinary exertions which they had made in this critical state of action, had recourse to a successful expedient. He cries out to his men, 'We must burn them.' He immediately, entering a wigwam, took fire and put it into the mats with which the wigwams were covered. The fire instantly kindling, spread with such violence, that all the Indian houses were soon wrapped in one general flame. As the fire increased, the English retired without the fort, and compassed it on every side. Uncas and his Indians, with such of the Narragansets as yet remained, took courage, from the example of the English, and formed another circle in the rear of them. The enemy were now seized with astonishment; and, forced by the flames from their lurking places into open light, became a fair mark for the English soldiers. Some climbed the palisades, and were instantly brought down by the fire of the English muskets. Others, desperately sallying forth from their burning cells, were shot, or cut in pieces with the sword. Such terror fell upon them, that they would run back from the English into the very flames. Great numbers perished in the conflagration. The greatness and violence of the fire, the reflection of the light, the flashing and roar of the arms, the shrieks and yellings of the men, women, and children, in the fort, and the shoutings of the Indians without, just at the dawning of the morning, exhibited a grand and awful scene. In little more than an hour, this whole work of destruction was finished. Seventy wigwams were burnt, and five or six hundred Indians perished, either by the sword, or in the flames. A hundred and fifty warriors had been sent on the evening before, who, that very morning, were to have gone forth against the English. Of these, and all who belonged to the fort, seven only escaped, and seven were made prisoners. It had been previously concluded not to burn the fort, but to destroy the enemy, and take the plunder; but the captain afterwards found it the only expedient to obtain the victory, and save his men. Thus parents and children, the sannup and squaw, the old man and the babe, perished in promiscuous ruin."—Trumbull's History of Connecticut, vol. i. p. 83—86 their number were wounded; the remainder were exhausted with fatigue, and destitute of provisions; they were in the midst of an enemy's country, many miles from their vessels, and their ammunition was nearly exhausted; they were but a few miles distant from the principal fortress of their foe, where there was a fresh army, which they knew would be exasperated in the highest degree on learning the fate of their brethren. In the midst of their perplexity, while they were consulting on the course to be pursued, their vessels appeared in sight, steering with a fair wind directly into the harbour. The army was received on board with great mutual joy and congratulation.

The troops employed on this successful expedition reached their homes before the expiration of a month from the day that the war was resolved upon. The Pequods, on the departure of Captain Mason, burnt their wigwams, destroyed their principal fort, and scattered themselves throughout the country. Sassacus, with a party of his chief warriors, abandoned his country, and moved by slow marches towards the Hudson river. They were followed by a party of Massachusetts and Connecticut troops; and, in a great swamp in Fairfield, near the western part of Connecticut, they were overtaken, and a battle ensued. Sassacus, and about twenty of his most hardy men, escaped, and fled to the Mohawk country; but there he found no safety; he was surprised by the Mohawks, and killed, with all his party, except Mononotto,* who, after being wounded, made his escape. The Pequods who remained were divided between the Moheagans and Narragansets, and the nation became extinct.† The vigour and boldness with which this war was prosecuted on both sides, give it the air of romance. Its decisive termination, which was so fatal to one party, was productive of the most happy consequences to the other. It struck the Indians throughout New England with such a salutary terror, that they were contented, in general, to remain at peace for nearly forty years.

The summer of the year 1637 witnessed the arrival of Mr. John Davenport, a celebrated London minister, accompanied by several eminent merchants, and other persons of respectability. The unmolested enjoyment of civil and religious liberty was the object of their emigration. Not finding in Massachusetts sufficient room for themselves, and the numerous friends whom they expected to follow them, and being informed of a large bay to the south-west of Connecticut river, commodious for trade, they applied to their friends in Connecticut to purchase for them, of the native proprietors, all the lands lying between the rivers Connecticut and Hudson; and this purchase they in part effected. In the autumn, some of the company made a journey to Connecticut to explore the lands and harbours on the coast, and pitched upon Quinnipiack for the place of their settlement. Here they erected a hut, in which a few men remained through the winter. The way being thus prepared, the rest of their company sailed from Boston for Quinnipiack in the following March; and, in about a fortnight, arrived at the desired port. On the 18th of April, they kept their first sabbath under a large spreading oak, where Mr. Davenport preached to them. They speedily entered into what they termed a plantation covenant. Determined to make an extensive settlement, these enterprising colonists paid early attention to the making of such purchases and treaties, as would give it stability. In November, they entered into an agreement with Momauguin, sachem of that part of the country, and his counselors, for the lands of Quinnipiack. Momauguin, in consideration of being protected by the English from the hostile Indians, yielded up his right and title to all the land of Quinnipiack, of which he was the sole sachem, to John Davenport, and others, their heirs and assigns, for ever; and they, in return, covenanted that they would protect him and his Indians; that they should always have a sufficient quantity of land to plant on the east side of the harbour.‡ In December, they made another purchase of a large tract, lying principally north of the other, extending eight miles east of the river Quinnipiack, and five miles west of it towards Hudson's river. Near the bay of Quinnipiack they laid out their town in

* "Among the Pequot captives were the wife and children of Mononotto. She was particularly noticed by the English for her great modesty, humanity, and good sense. She made it as her only request, that she might not be injured, either as to her offspring, or personal honour. As a requital of her kindness to the captivated maids, her life and the lives of her children, were not only spared, but they were particularly recommended to the care of Governor Winthrop. He gave charge for their protection and kind treatment."—Trumbull's History of Connecticut, vol. i. p. 92.

† "The prisoners who were taken in this war were treated by the English with great cruelty. Many of them were put to death. Several sachems were beheaded at Menunkatuch, and the spot has, from the cruel deed, been called Sachem's Head to this day.

The women and children were divided among the troops, and it is stated that 'the people of Massachusetts sent a number of the women and boys to the West Indies, and sold them for slaves.' How opposed is this treatment to the benevolent spirit that breathes in the letter of the amiable Robinson to the people of Plymouth, on learning that some of the natives had been killed, when he says, 'O, how happy a thing had it been that you had converted some before you had killed any!'—North American Review, vol. viii. p. 93.

‡ "By the way of free and grateful retribution, they gave him, his council, and company, twelve coats of English cloth, twelve alchymy spoons, twelve hatchets, twelve hoes, two dozen of knives, twelve porringers, and four cases of French knives and scissors."—Holmes's American Annals, vol. i. p. 245.

squares, on the plan of a spacious city, and called it New Haven. This town was the foundation of a flourishing colony of the same name, of which it became also the capital.*

It appears that these emigrants at first acknowledged the authority of Massachusetts; and that the general court of that colony was very reluctant to admit a separate jurisdiction.† But it being evident that the new colonists were wholly without the limits of the Massachusetts patent, they convened an assembly at Hartford, and formed a constitution of government, which was of the most popular kind, the leading objects of which were to maintain the liberty and purity of the gospel, the discipline of the churches, and the administration of the government according to the laws.‡ The people of New Haven, also, the same year, formed a constitution similar to that of the neighbouring colony, except that it was a little more strict in not admitting any but church members to the privileges of freemen. These continued to be the constitutions of the two colonies, until they were united under the new charter in 1661.

The union of the several colonies of New England has already been described, both as to its causes, its nature, and its effects on the colony of Massachusetts. It may, however, be observed, in addition to what has already been stated, that, on the completion of the confederacy, several Indian sachems came in, and submitted to the English government, among whom were Miantonomoh, the Narraganset, and Uncas, the Moheagan chief. The union rendered the colonies formidable to the Dutch as well as the Indians, and respectable in the view of the French; it also maintained general harmony among themselves, and secured the peace and rights of the country.

The Connecticut and New Haven people had been engaged in the most vexatious and irritating quarrels with the Dutch, from the first settlement of their colonies, the effect of which had been to excite them to a state of the most bitter hostility. In the mean time, the English parliament declared war against the United Provinces, and several obstinate naval battles were fought in the British channel; thus opening the way for hostilities between the infant colonies of the two countries on this continent, if they were so disposed. On the 19th of May, 1653, a special meeting of the commissioners of the United Colonies was holden at Boston, in consequence of a rumour, that a plot had been formed between the Dutch at New Netherlands, and the Indians in all quarters of the country, to cut off, by a general massacre, the whole English population of New England.

† "The annals of colonization, ancient or modern, can scarcely show the commencement of a settlement so extremely faulty as that of Connecticut. The territory, of which they thus took possession, was not only already occupied by the Dutch, but had been granted sixteen years before to the Plymouth company. The whole coast of New England was, not long after, divided into twelve different parts; and, in the presence of James I., allotted to so many distinct members of that body. And in April, 1635, that portion of it was assuredly granted to James, marquis of Hamilton, as his share, which stretches from the river Connecticut, eastward, to the Narraganset bay; and, from its source, one hundred miles into the continent. That part of it which extends from Connecticut to Hudson's river was probably conveyed to the earl of Stirling as his proportion; and since the patent was now surrendered, as we have seen, into the royal hands, the powers of government, which had been formerly given in trust to that famous corporation, again reverted to the crown. The emigrants before-mentioned can be considered in no other light, therefore, than as mere intruders on the rights of others. The jurisdiction supposed to be invested in English nobles was undoubtedly groundless; and it is unnecessary to mention those governmental acts of Massachusetts which proceeded from acknowledged usurpation."—Chalmers, b. i. chap. xii. p. 288, 289.

of those towns, well knowing, that, where a people are gathered together, the Word of God requireth, that, to maintain the peace and union of such a people, there should be an orderly and decent government established, according to God, to order and dispose of the affairs of the people at all seasons, as occasion should require, do therefore associate and conjoin themselves to be as one public state or commonwealth. The constitution provided, that there should be annually two general courts or assemblies, one on the second Thursday of April, and the other, on the second Thursday of September; that at the first, called the court of election, there should be annually chosen a governor and six magistrates, who, being sworn according to an oath recorded for that purpose, should have power to administer justice according to the laws here established, and, in defect of a law, according to the rule of the word of God; and that as many other officers and magistrates might be chosen, as should be found requisite; that all should have the right of election who were admitted freemen, had taken the oath of fidelity, and lived within this jurisdiction, having been admitted inhabitants by the town where they live; and that no person might be chosen governor more than once in two years. The towns of Hartford, Windsor, and Wethersfield were severally authorized to send four of their freemen, as their deputies, to every general court; and it was provided, that such other towns, as should afterwards be formed and admitted into the body politic, should send as many as the court, upon the principle of apportioning the number of deputies to the number of freemen, should judge meet. In this body was vested the supreme power of the commonwealth, executive, legislative, and judicial. This constitution has been thought to be one of the most free and happy constitutions of civil government ever formed. Its formation, at a period when the light of liberty was extinguished in most parts of the earth, and the rights of men were, in others, so little understood, does great honour to the colonists by whom it was framed. It continued, with little alteration, to our own day; and the liberty, peace, and prosperity, which it secured to the people of Connecticut for nearly two centuries, are seldom, if ever, found in the history of nations."—Holmes's American Annals, vol. i. p. 251.

The rumour of this plot was derived from the Indians, and it was supposed to be corroborated by various circumstances. It was also reported, that the northern and eastern Indians had become insolent in their conduct towards the English; and several Indians on Long Island, and in the neighbourhood of the Manhadoes, averred that they had been solicited, with the promise of liberal presents, to join the Dutch in a conspiracy to cut off the English. About the same time, the Dutch governor wrote to the governors of the New England colonies, proposing to enter into an engagement to remain neutral, unless contrary orders should be given by their superiors, notwithstanding the war subsisting between the two countries, and offering to send an agent to treat on the subject with the commissioners. This proposition was considered as altogether insidious, and tending to corroborate the rumours of hostile designs.

Connecticut and New Haven became alarmed: a meeting of the Commissioners of the United Colonies was called, and evidence of the plot laid before them. A majority was in favour of war; but the colony of Massachusetts, being remote from the danger, was averse to it. As she was much stronger than either of the others, it was, at the suggestion of her deputies, resolved, that agents should first be sent to demand of the Dutch governor an explanation of his conduct. The agents did not obtain what they conceived to be a satisfactory explanation. On their return, another meeting of the commissioners was held at Boston, additional testimony was laid before them, and several ministers of Massachusetts were invited to assist at their deliberations, a practice not unusual at that period. The opinion of these ministers being requested, they concluded, that it would be safest for the colonies to forbear the use of the sword. But all the commissioners, except one, were of opinion, that recent aggressions justified, and self-preservation dictated, an appeal to the sword. They were about to declare war, when the general court of Massachusetts, in what the other colonies conceived to be a direct violation of one of the articles of the confederation, resolved, "that no determination of the commissioners, though all should agree, should bind the colony to engage in hostilities." At this declaration, Connecticut and New Haven felt alarmed and indignant. They considered the other colonies too weak, without the assistance of Massachusetts, to contend with the Dutch and their Indian allies. They argued, entreated, and remonstrated, but without success.* They then represented their danger to Cromwell, and implored his assistance. He, with his usual promptitude, sent a fleet for their protection, and for the conquest of their enemies; but peace in Europe, intelligence of which reached New England soon after the arrival of the fleet, saved the Dutch from subjugation, and relieved the colonies from the dread of massacre.

Soon after the restoration, the Connecticut colony sent Mr. Winthrop, son of Governor Winthrop, of Massachusetts, to England, with an humble petition to the king, in which they solicited a charter under the royal signature. Mr. Winthrop was a gentleman of fine talents and address, and he succeeded in engaging in his interest several gentlemen of influence at court. He was also possessed of a valuable ring, which had been given by Charles I. to his grandfather; this, on his audience with the king, he presented to his majesty, which is supposed to have materially influenced the king in his favour. On the 20th of April, 1662, he obtained a patent under the great seal, granting the most ample privileges, and confirming to the freemen of the Connecticut colony, and such as should be admitted freemen, all the lands which had been formerly granted to the earl of Warwick, and by him transferred to Lord Saye and Sele, and his associates. This charter established over the colony a form of government of the most popular kind, and continued the fundamental law of Connecticut for the space of one hundred and fifty-eight years. "It is remarkable," says a writer in the North American Review, "that, although it was granted at a period of the world when the rights of the people were little understood and little regarded, and by a sovereign who governed England with a more arbitrary sway than any of his successors, the form of government established by this charter was of a more popular description, and placed all power within the more immediate reach of the people, than the constitution for which it has been deliberately exchanged, in these modern days of popular jealousy and republican freedom." The colony of New Haven was included in the new charter of Connecticut; but the inhabitants for several years refused to consent to the union, till the apprehension of the appointment of a general governor, and of their being united with some other colony, with a charter less favourable to liberty, induced them to yield a reluctant assent.

* Those of our readers who may be desirous to understand the merits of this controversy between the colonies, we refer to a very able and impartial extract in the North American Review, vol. iv. p. 90, et seq. We take this early opportunity to express our acknowledge to the editors of that very ably conducted periodical, for the assistance it has rendered us in this, as in other portions of the history; and to express the satisfaction we feel at the extensive circulation it is now acquiring in the British dominions.

The circumstance which chiefly occasioned the apprehensions alluded to, was the grant of Charles II. to his brother, the duke of York and Albany, of a patent of a large territory in America, comprising lands from the west side of the river Connecticut, to the east side of Delaware bay. A fleet was immediately despatched for the reduction of the Dutch in New Netherlands, and commissioners were appointed for taking possession of the newly granted territories, in which were embraced the whole of New Haven, and a large portion of Connecticut. They were not only intrusted with the government of this territory, but were also invested with extraordinary powers for visiting the New England colonies, and hearing all matters of complaint and controversy which might arise in them. The people of New Haven, on hearing of the arbitrary disposition of these commissioners, thought it expedient, as the least of two evils, to shelter themselves under the Connecticut charter, and to unite with that colony in endeavouring to secure the privileges granted by it. Mr. Winthrop and others (a committee appointed for the purpose) succeeded in obtaining from the commissioners the establishment of the eastern line of New York, nearly where it runs at the present day, and thus preserved the colony from being dismembered of the richest and most populous section of its territory.

Connecticut was destined to suffer, with the rest of the colonies, from the violent acts committed in the last years of the reign of the Stuarts. Massachusetts had been deprived of her charter, and Rhode Island had been induced to surrender hers, when, in July, 1685, a writ of quo warranto was issued against the governor and company of Connecticut. The colonial government was strongly advised by Vane to comply with the requisition, and surrender the charter; but it was determined neither to appear to defend the charter nor voluntarily to surrender it. Sir Edmund Andros, whose appointment to the office of governor of the New England colonies has been related in the preceding chapter, made repeated applications for the surrender of the charter, but without success. The singular mode of its escape from his demand in person, is thus recorded by Trumbull: "The assembly met as usual, in October, 1687, and the government continued, according to charter, until the last of the month. About this time, Sir Edmund, with his suite, and more than sixty regular troops, came to Hartford, where the assembly were sitting, demanded the charter, and declared the government under it to be dissolved. The assembly were extremely reluctant and slow with respect to any resolve to surrender the charter, or with respect to any motion to bring it forth. The tradition is, that Governor Treat strongly represented the great expense and hardships of the colonists in planting the country; the blood and treasure which they had expended in defending it, both against the savages and foreigners; to what hardships and dangers he himself had been exposed for that purpose; and that it was like giving up his life, now to surrender the patent and privileges so dearly bought, and so long enjoyed. The important affair was debated and kept in suspense until the evening, when the charter was brought and laid upon the table where the assembly were sitting. By this time, great numbers of people were assembled, and men sufficiently bold to enterprise whatever might be necessary or expedient. The lights were instantly extinguished, and one Captain Wadsworth, of Hartford, in the most silent and secret manner, carried off the charter, and secreted it in a large hollow tree, fronting the house of the Honourable Samuel Wyllys, then one of the magistrates of the colony. The people appeared all peaceable and orderly. The candles were officiously re-lighted, but the patent was gone, and no discovery could be made of it, or of the person who had conveyed it away.* Though Sir Edmund was thus foiled in his attempt to obtain possession of the charter, he did not hesitate to assume the reins of government,† which he administered in a manner as oppressive in this as in the other colonies. When on the arrival of the declaration of the prince of Orange at Boston, Andros was deposed and imprisoned, the people of Connecticut resumed their previous form of government, having been interrupted little more than a year and a half.

In the Indian war, in which Philip acted so conspicuous a part, Connecticut had her share of suffering, though it was not so great as that of some of her sister colonies. Hostilities were commenced by the aborigines, on the Connecticut river, in the summer of 1675; and, on the 1st of September, the inhabitants of Hadley were alarmed by the Indians during the time of public worship, and the people thrown into the utmost confusion; but the enemy were repulsed by the valour and good conduct of an aged, venerable man, who, suddenly appearing in the midst of the affrighted inhabitants, put himself at their land, by order from his majesty, James II., king of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, the 31st of October, 1687, took into his hands the government of the colony of Connecticut, it being, by his majesty, annexed to Massachusetts, and other colonies under his excellency's government. head, led them to the onset, and, after the dispersion of the enemy, instantly disappeared. This deliverer of Hadley, then imagined to be an angel, was General Goffe, (one of the judges of Charles I.,) who was at that time concealed in the town.*

But a short time elapsed, before the colonists were again called on to defend their privileges from what they deemed an unjust encroachment. Colonel Fletcher, governor of New York, had been vested with plenary powers to command the militia of Connecticut, and insisted on the exercise of that command. The legislature of Connecticut, deeming that authority to be expressly given to the colony by charter, would not submit to his requisitions; but, desirous of maintaining a good understanding with Governor Fletcher, endeavoured to make terms with him, until his Majesty's pleasure should be further known. All their negotiations were, however, unsuccessful; and, on the 26th of October, he came to Hartford, while the assembly was sitting, and, in his majesty's name, demanded submission; but the refusal was resolutely persisted in. After the requisition had been repeatedly made, with plausible explanations and serious menaces, Fletcher ordered his commission and instructions to be read in audience of the train bands of Hartford, which had assembled upon his order. Captain Wadsworth, the senior officer, who was exercising his soldiers, instantly called out, "Beat the drums!" which, in a moment, overwhelmed every voice. Fletcher commanded silence. No sooner was a second attempt made to read, than Wadsworth vociferated, "Drum, drum! I say." The drummers instantly beat up again, with the greatest possible spirit. "Silence, silence," exclaimed the governor. At the first moment of a pause, Wadsworth called out earnestly, "Drum, drum, I say;" and, turning to his excellency, said, "If I am interrupted again, I will make the sun shine through you in a moment." Colonel Fletcher declined putting Wadsworth to the test, and abandoning the contest, returned with his suite to New York.—It has been already observed, that the history of the American colonies has been decidedly undervalued and neglected; this must have been the case even with the best educated classes of society, or surely, after such specimens of determined independence of spirit as the history of this colony, and of Massachusetts, exhibits, the measures which ultimately led to an entire separation would never have received the sanction of the British senate.

In the year 1700, Yale college was founded. The project had been the subject of conversation for the space of two years, and at length eleven gentlemen, who had been agreed on as trustees, assembled at Branford, and laid the foundation of the college. In the year following, the trustees obtained from the general assembly an act of incorporation, and a grant of 120*l.* annually. It was originally established at Saybrook; and, in 1702, the first degrees were there conferred. Elihu Yale made several donations to the institution, and from him it derives the name it bears. A succession of able instructors has raised it to a high rank among the literary institutions of the country. The history of this college, as well as a description of its extensive buildings, will appear in the topographical department of this work.

The trustees of Yale College, assembled at Guilford, March 17th, 1703, addressed a circular letter to the ministers, proposing to hold a general synod of all the churches in the colony, to give their joint consent to a confession of faith, after the example of the synod in Boston, 1680. This proposal was universally acceptable; and the ministers and churches of the several counties met in voluntary "consociation," and gave their consent to the Westminster and Savoy confessions of faith, and agreed upon certain rules of union in discipline, which were designed to be preparatory to a general synod. Still there was no visible and acknowledged bond of union among them; and the disadvantages attendant upon a want of system were felt to a considerable extent. Under the influence of these considerations, the legislature passed an act, in May, 1708, requiring the ministers and churches to meet by delegation at Saybrook, at the next commencement to be held there, and form an ecclesiastical constitution, which they were directed to present to the legislature at their session at New Haven, the following October, to be considered of, and confirmed by them. In the same act they directed the ministers, and churches of the colony, to meet (the churches by delegation) in the county towns of their respective counties; there to consider and agree upon those rules for the management of ecclesiastical discipline, which they should judge conformable to the word of God, and to appoint two or more of their number as members of

* "Suddenly, and in the midst of the people, there appeared a man of a very venerable aspect, who took the command, arranged and ordered them in the best military manner, and under his direction they repelled and routed the Indians, and the town was saved. He immediately vanished, and the inhabitants could not account for the phenomenon, but by considering that person as an angel, sent of God for their deliverance."—Stiles, Hist. Judges, p. 109. "From New Haven, Whalley and Goffe went to West Rock, a mountain about three hundred feet high, and about two miles and a half from the town, and were for some time concealed in a cave 'on the very top of the rock, about half or three quarters of a mile from the southern extremity.'"—Stiles, p. 72, 76.

the synod at Saybrook. They also directed the synod to compare the results of these ecclesiastical meetings of the several counties, and out of them to draw a form of ecclesiastical discipline. The expenses of all these meetings were to be defrayed out of the public treasury. The system agreed upon by the synod was presented to the legislature at the time specified; upon which they passed the following act:

* The "Heads of Agreement" afford an authentic statement of the doctrine and discipline of the New England churches; and, as they will most effectually vindicate these societies from misrepresentation, and enable our readers to avoid misconception, we have quoted them at length. The "Platform," and the whole proceedings respecting it, may be found in the fifth book of Mather's Magnalia.

"HEADS OF AGREEMENT ASSENTED TO BY THE UNITED MINISTERS, FORMERLY CALLED PRESBYTERIAN AND CONGREGATIONAL.

"I. Of Churches and Church Members.—1. We acknowledge our Lord Jesus Christ to have one catholic church, or kingdom, comprehending all that are united to him, whether in heaven or earth; and do conceive the whole multitude of visible believers, and their infant seed, (commonly called the catholic visible church,) to belong to Christ's spiritual kingdom in this world; but for the notion of a catholic visible church here, as it signifies its having been collected into any formed society, under a visible human head on earth, whether one person singly, or many collectively, we, with the rest of protestants, unanimously disclaim it. 2. We agree, that particular societies of visible saints, who, under Christ their head, are stably joined together, for ordinary communion with one another in all the ordinances of Christ, are particular churches, and are to be owned by each other as instituted churches of Christ, though differing in apprehensions and practice in some lesser things. 3. That none shall be admitted as members, in order to communion in all the special ordinances of the gospel, but such persons as are knowing and sound in the fundamental doctrines of the christian religion, without scandal in their lives; and to a judgment regulated by the word of God, are persons of visible holiness and honesty, credibly professing cordial subjection to Jesus Christ. 4. A competent number of such visible saints, as before described, do become the capable subjects of stated communion in all the special ordinances of Christ, upon their mutual declared consent and agreement to walk together therein according to gospel rule. In which declaration, different degrees of explicitness shall no ways hinder such churches from owning each other as instituted churches. 5. Though parochial bounds be not of divine right, yet, for common edification, the members of a particular church ought (as much as conveniently may be) to live near one another. 6. That each particular church hath right to use their own officers; and being furnished with such as are duly qualified and ordained according to the gospel rule, hath authority from Christ for exercising government, and of enjoying all the ordinances of worship within itself. 7. In the administration of church power, it belongs to the pastors and other elders of every particular church, if such there be, to rule and govern, and to the brotherhood to consent, according to the rule of the gospel. 8. That all professors, as before described, are bound in duty, as they have opportunity, to join themselves as fixed members of some particular church; their thus joining being part of their professed subjection to the gospel of Christ, and an instituted means of their establishment and edification, whereby they are under the pastoral care, and, in case of scandalous or offensive walking, may be authoritatively admonished or censured for their recovery, and for vindication of the truth and the church professing it. 9. That a visible professor thus joined to a particular church ought to continue steadfast with the said church, and not forsake the ministry and ordinances there dispensed, without an orderly seeking a recommendation unto another church, which ought to be given, when the case of the person apparently requires it.

"At a general court, holden at New Haven, October, 1708:

"The reverend ministers, delegates from the elders and messengers of this government, met at Saybrook, September 9th, 1708, having presented to this assembly a Confession of Faith, and Heads of Agreement,* and regulations in the administration of church discipline, as unanimously agreed and consented to by the elders and churches in this government; this

"II. Of the Ministry.—1. We agree that the ministerial office is instituted by Jesus Christ for the gathering, guiding, edifying, and governing of his church, and to continue to the end of the world. 2. They who are called to this office ought to be endued with competent learning and ministerial gifts, as also with the grace of God, sound in judgment, not novices in the faith and knowledge of the gospel, without scandal, of holy conversation, and such as devote themselves to the work and service thereof. 3. That, ordinarily, none shall be ordained to the work of this ministry, but such as are called and chosen thereunto by a particular church. 4. That in so great and weighty a matter as the calling and choosing a pastor, we judge it ordinarily requisite, that every such church consult and advise with the pastors of neighbouring congregations. 5. That after such advice, the person consulted about being chosen by the brotherhood of that particular church over which he is to be set, and he accepting, be duly ordained and set apart to his office over them; wherein it is ordinarily requisite, that the pastors of neighbouring congregations concur with the preaching elder or elders, if such there be. 6. That, whereas such ordination is only intended for such as never before had been ordained to the ministerial office; if any judge, that in the case also of the removal of one formerly ordained to a new station, or pastoral charge, there ought to be a like solemn recommending him and his labours to the grace and blessing of God; no different sentiments, or practice herein, shall be any occasion of contention or breach of communion among us. 7. It is expedient, that they who enter on the work of preaching the gospel, be not only qualified for communion of saints, but also, that, except in cases extraordinary, they give proof of their gifts and fitness for the said work unto the pastors of churches of known abilities to discern and judge of their qualifications, that they may be sent forth with solemn approbation and prayer, which we judge needful, that no doubt may remain concerning their being called unto the work, and for preventing, as much as in us lieth, ignorant and rash intruders.

"III. Of Censures.—1. As it cannot be avoided, but that in the purest churches on earth, there will sometimes offences and scandals arise, by reason of hypocrisy and prevailing corruption; so Christ hath made it the duty of every church to reform itself by spiritual remedies appointed by him to be applied in all such cases, viz. admonition and excommunication. 2. Admonition being the rebuking of an offending member in order to conviction, is, in case of private offences, to be performed according to the rule in Matt. xviii. 15, 16, 17, and in case of public offences, openly before the church, as the honour of the gospel, and the nature of the scandal, shall require; and if either of the admonitions take place for the recovery of the fallen person, all further proceedings in a way of censure are thereon to cease, and satisfaction to be declared accordingly. 3. When all due means are used, according to the order of the gospel, for the restoring an offending and scandalous brother, and he, notwithstanding, remains impenitent, the censure of excommunication is to be proceeded unto; wherein the pastor, and other elders, (if there be such,) are to lead and go before the church; and the brotherhood to give their consent in a way of obedience unto Christ, and to the elders, as over them in the Lord. 4. It may sometimes come to pass, that a church member, not otherwise scandalous, may sinfully withdraw, and divide himself from the communion of the church to which he belongeth; in which case, when all due means for the reducing him prove ineffectual, he having thereby cut himself off from that church's communion, the church may justly esteem and declare itself discharged of any further inspection over him.

assembly doth declare their great approbation of such a happy agreement; and do ordain, that all the churches within this government, that are or shall be thus united in doctrine, worship, and discipline, be, and for the future shall be, owned and acknowledged, and established by law; provided always, that nothing herein shall be intended or construed to hinder or prevent any society or church that is, or shall be, allowed by the laws of this government, who soberly differ or dissent from the united churches hereby established, from exercising worship and discipline in their own way, according to their consciences."

Dr. Dwight gives the following concise and clear view of what he terms "the two ecclesiastical judicatories established in the state of Connecticut,—a particular church, and a consociation. A particular church, with its pastor at its head, has the power of exercising the discipline of the gospel with respect to all scandals which take place among its members. With respect to this subject, it is declared to be the province of the pastor, together with the ruling elders, wherever they exist, to govern; and that of the brotherhood to consent, and, of course, if they see occasion, to dissent. This constitutes two distinct powers;

"IV. Of Communion of Churches.—1. We agree that particular churches ought not to walk so distinct and separate from each other, as not to have care and tenderness towards one another. But their pastors ought to have frequent meetings together, that, by mutual advice, support, encouragement, and brotherly intercourse, they may strengthen the hearts and hands of each other in the ways of the Lord. 2. That none of our particular churches shall be subordinate to one another, each being endued with equality of power from Jesus Christ; and that none of the said particular churches, their officer or officers, shall exercise any power, or have any superiority, over any other church or their officers. 3. That known members of particular churches, constituted as aforesaid, may have occasional communion with one another in the ordinances of the gospel, viz. the word, prayer, sacraments, singing of psalms, dispensed according to the mind of Christ, unless that church, with which they desire communion, hath any just exception against them. 4. That we ought not to admit any one to be a member of our respective congregations that hath joined himself to another, without endeavours of mutual satisfaction of the congregations concerned. 5. That one church ought not to blame the proceedings of another, until it hath heard what that church charged, its elders or messengers, can say in vindication of themselves from any charge of irregular or injurious proceedings. 6. That we are most willing and ready to give an account of our church proceedings to each other, when desired, for preventing or removing any offences that may arise among us. Likewise, we shall be ready to give the right hand of fellowship, and walk together according to the gospel rules of communion of churches.

"V. Of Deacons and Ruling Elders.—We agree, the office of a deacon is of divine appointment, and that it belongs to their office to receive, lay out, and distribute the church's stock to its proper uses, by the direction of the pastor and brethren, if need be. And, whereas divers are of opinion, that there is also the office of ruling elders, who labour not in word and doctrine; and others think otherwise; we agree that this difference make no breach among us.

"VI. Of occasional Meeting of Ministers, &c.—1. We agree that, in order to concord, and in other weighty and difficult cases, it is needful, and according to the mind of Christ, that the ministers of one of which (the elder or elders) is to originate decisions; and the other has the right of a veto with respect to every decision. This certainly is a judicatory, attended with circumstances of extreme delicacy; for, should the brotherhood refuse their consent, the measures originated must regularly fall. It might not unnaturally be expected, that, in such a division of authority, most measures actually proposed would fail. The very same is, however, the constitution of every representative government, so far as a veto is concerned; each branch of the legislature having, of course, a negative upon the other. Here, also, each branch has additionally the power of originating measures." "The general association of Connecticut is a body merely advisory, yet its recommendations have no small part of the efficacy derived from authority. The business transacted by it consists in a general superintendence of the prudential affairs of the churches;* in receiving applications from the several ministers, individually and associated; and from the several churches, particular or consociated, concerning their respective interests, or the general ecclesiastical interests of the state; and giving their advice, recommending such measures originally as they judge to be beneficial." It is undeniably true, several churches be consulted and advised with about such matters. 2. That such meetings may consist of smaller or greater numbers, as the matter shall require. 3. That particular churches, their respective elders and members, ought to have a reverential regard to their judgment so given, and not dissent therefrom without apparent grounds from the word of God.

"VII. Of our Demeanour towards the Civil Magistrate.—1. We do reckon ourselves obliged continually to pray for God's protection, guidance, and blessing, upon the rulers set over us. 2. That we ought to yield unto them not only subjection in the Lord, but support, according to our station and abilities. 3. That, if at any time it shall be their pleasure to call together any number of us to require an account of our affairs, and the state of our congregations, we shall most readily express all dutiful regard to them herein.

"VIII. Of a Confession of Faith.—As to what appertains to soundness of judgment in matters of faith, we esteem it sufficient that a church acknowledge the Scriptures to be the word of God, the perfect and only rule of faith and practice, and own either the doctrinal part of those commonly called the Articles of the church of England, or the Confession or Catechisms, shorter or larger, compiled by the assembly at Westminster, or the confession agreed on at the Savoy, to be agreeable to the said rule.

"IX. Of our Duty and Deportment towards them that are not in Communion with us.—1. We judge it our duty to bear a christian respect to all Christians, according to their several ranks and stations, that are not of our persuasion or communion. 2. As for such as may be ignorant of the principles of the christian religion, or of vicious conversation, we shall, in our respective places, as they give opportunity, endeavour to explain to them the doctrine of life and salvation, and to our utmost persuade them to be reconciled to God. 3. That such who appear to have the essential requisites to church communion, we shall willingly receive them in the Lord, not troubling them with disputes about lesser matters."—Mather's Magnalia, b. v. p. 59—61.

* The general association is also now the incorporated Missionary Society of the state, both "foreign" and "domestic."

that some evils have ever been attendant on the purely congregational or independent system of church government; but they have arisen rather from the absence of a proper spirit among the members of the churches, than from the form of government itself. The history of the proceedings of the "consociations" of Connecticut, affords but a poor recommendation for their general adoption, as a remedy for the disadvantages of independency; although it must be admitted that the injurious tendencies of such associations was much aggravated by the intimate connexion which existed between the civil and ecclesiastical powers in this colony; and, most assuredly, the acts of the hierarchy of Connecticut fully evince, that the sword of the magistrate should never be entrusted to the hands, or to the influence, of any priesthood, however pure or exemplary. The tyrannical character of their proceedings was decidedly exhibited, in their treatment of many of the most devoted labourers, in that great moral renovation which pervaded almost every part of the colony in 1738, and the following years.

It might be supposed by some of our readers, that a revival of religion is not a subject that should occupy a place in the general history of a state. It is true, that the advance or decay of any particular religious sect belongs to the ecclesiastical, rather than to the civil record; but it is far otherwise with a great moral change affecting all classes of society: such a circumstance is of more importance to the civil interests of society, than even the political institutions which are deemed essential to its prosperity. Originated by whatever circumstances, private virtue is the only basis on which the security of states can ever rest; and with the extraordinary rise of the American republic as the peculiar subject of our consideration, it would be unpardonable not to feel this sentiment in its fullest force. We are the more desirous of giving faithfully the general outline of the proceedings which have been designated revivals, both because they have recently attracted a considerable portion of public attention, and because we conceive they have not been regarded in a perfectly correct point of view, either by their opponents, or by their approvers.

It was in the year 1735, that the first very decided indication of a revival spirit manifested itself at Northampton, Massachusetts, under the ministry of the Rev. Jonathan Edwards, afterwards president of the college in New Jersey. It appears to have commenced among the young people of his congregation. "Presently," says Dr. Edwards, "a great and earnest concern about the things of religion and the eternal world became universal in all parts of the town, and among persons of all degrees and ages. All the conversation in all companies, and upon all occasions, was upon these things only, unless so much as was necessary for people to carry on their ordinary secular business. Other discourse than of the things of religion would scarcely be tolerated in any company. They seemed to follow their worldly business more as a part of their duty, than from any disposition they had to it. The temptation now seemed to lie on this hand, to neglect worldly affairs too much, and to spend too much time in the immediate exercises of religion. But although people did not ordinarily neglect their worldly business, yet there then was the reverse of what commonly is; religion was with all the great concern." This state of feeling spread rapidly during the following seven years through many of the towns of the New England states, and in some of those of New York and New Jersey. "This work," says Dr. Trumbull,* "was very extraordinary on many accounts. It was much beyond what had been the common course of Providence. It was more universal than had before been known. It extended to all sorts and characters of people, sober and vicious, high and low, rich and poor, wise and unwise. To all appearance, it was no less powerful in families and persons of distinction, in the places which it visited, than others. In former works of this nature, young people had generally been wrought upon, while elderly people and children had been little affected, if moved at all. But at this time old men were affected as well as others." "People, in a wonderful manner, flocked together to places of public worship, not only on the Lord's-day, but on lecture days, so that the places of worship could not contain them. They would not only fill the houses, but crowd round the doors and windows without, and press together wherever they could hear the preacher. They would not only thus assemble in their own towns and parishes when the word was preached, but if they had the knowledge of lectures in the neighbouring towns and parishes, they would attend them. Sometimes they would follow the preacher from town to town, and from one place to another, for several days together. In some instances, in places but thinly settled, there would be such a concourse, that no house could hold them. There was, in the minds of people, a general fear of sin, and of the wrath of God denounced against it. There seemed to be a general conviction, that all the ways of man were before the eyes of the Lord. It was the opinion of men of discernment and sound judgment, who had the best opportunities of knowing the feelings and general state of the people at that period, that bags of gold and silver, and other precious things, might, with safety, have been laid in the streets, and that no man would have converted them to his own use. Theft, wantonness, intemperance, profaneness, sabbath-breaking, and other gross sins, appeared to be put away. The intermissions on the Lord's-day, instead of being spent in worldly conversation and vanity, as had been too usual before, were now spent in religious conversation, in reading and singing the praises of God. At lectures there was not only great attention and seriousness in the house of God, but the conversation out of it was generally on the great concerns of the soul."

There is a circumstance which considerably contributed to accelerate the diffusion of a revival spirit, which must not be overlooked—the visits of the celebrated contemporaries, Wesley and Whitefield, to the American continent, just at this period.* The extraordinary exertions of the latter especially excited and emboldened many faithful ministers of Connecticut, whose labours and pecuniary sacrifices now became greater than they had ever before experienced or imagined they could endure. They not only abounded in active exertions among their own and neighbouring congregations, but preached in all parts of the colony, where their brethren would admit them, and in many places in Massachusetts, and the other colonies. They were very popular, and their labours were generally acceptable to their brethren, and useful to the people. They were not noisy preachers, but grave, sentimental, searching, and pungent. Con-

* Mr. Whitefield landed at Philadelphia the beginning of November, 1739. On his arrival, he was invited to preach in all the churches, and people of all denominations flocked in crowds to hear him. After preaching a few days in Philadelphia, he made a visit to New York, and preached eight times in that place with great applause and effect. Thence he returned to Philadelphia, preaching on the way, both going and returning. From thence he went to Georgia by land, preaching on the way as he proceeded. Numbers followed, some twenty, and some even sixty miles. He preached at Chester, Wilmington, Newcastle, and Whitley-creek. At the last of these places, it was computed that his congregation consisted of not less than ten thousand hearers; and the people seemed almost universally impressed. These reports reaching New England, there was a great desire, both in ministers and people, to see and hear him; and Dr. Coleman and Mr. Cooper, of Boston, sent pressing invitations that he would pay them a visit. Mr. Whitefield, touched with a curiosity to see the descendants of the good old puritans, and their seats of learning, and hoping that he might make some further collections for his favourite object, the orphan-house in Georgia, accepted their invitation. He arrived at Rhode Island on September 14th, 1740. Here a number of principal gentlemen soon waited on him. He preached there three days, twice a day, to deeply affected auditories. He then departed for Boston, where he was met on the road by the governor's son, several of the clergy, and other gentlemen of principal character, who conducted him into the city. His assemblies there were so large, that the most capacious houses could not contain them, and he often necticut was, however, more remarkably the seat of the work than any part of New England, or of the American colonies. In the years 1740, 1741, and 1742, it had pervaded, in a greater or less degree, every part of the colony. In most of the towns and societies, it was very general and powerful.

It has been estimated, that, during three years, from thirty to forty thousand persons had their minds affected in the decided manner which has been described. It might naturally have been supposed, that, as many of these impressions occurred at a period of extraordinary excitement, they would not have been generally productive of permanently beneficial results. The contrary, however, in a very great majority of instances, appears to have been the fact. "The effects on great numbers," says Dr. Trumbull, "were abiding and most happy; they were the most uniform, exemplary christians, with whom I was ever acquainted. I was born, and had my education, in that part of the town of Hebron in which the work was most prevalent and powerful. They were extraordinary for their constant and serious attention on the public worship; they were prayerful, righteous, peaceable, and charitable; they kept up their religious meetings for prayer, reading, and religious conversation, for many years; they were strict in the religion and government of their families, and I never knew that any one of them was ever guilty of scandal, or fell under discipline. About eight or ten years after the religious revival and reformation, that part of the town was made a distinct society, and it was mentioned to Mr. Lothrop, the pastor elect, as an encouragement to settle with them, that there was preached on the common. This was the beginning of the most extraordinary revival of religion ever experienced in Boston, or in that part of New England. When Mr. Whitefield left Boston, it was for Northampton. He had read in England the narrative of Mr. Edwards, of the remarkable work of God in that place, in 1735, and had a great desire to see him, and receive the account from his own mouth. On his way, pulpits and houses were every where open to him, and the same happy influence and effects attended his preaching, which had been experienced in other places. When he arrived at Northampton, about the middle of October, he was joyfully received by Mr. Edwards and the people. After leaving their interesting society, he preached in the neighbouring towns to large and deeply affected congregations. On the 23d of October, he reached New Haven. Here he was affectionately received; and, as the general assembly were then sitting, he remained several days, and had the pleasure of seeing numbers daily impressed. After the sabbath he preached at Milford, and prosecuting his journey to New York, and the southern colonies, he preached with his usual popularity and success. Taking leave of Connecticut, he preached at Rye and Kingsbridge, and, on the 30th of October, arrived at New York. Here he remained three days, and then departed, preaching through the southern colonies, as he had done before, but apparently with still greater success. It appears he was the instrument of great good in New England, as well as in the southern colonies. He greatly quickened and animated ministers, as well as private Christians, especially in Massachusetts and Connecticut.

not a drunkard in the whole parish. While I lived in it, I did not know of one prayerless family among his people, nor ever heard of one. Some of those people, who dated their conversion from that period, lived until they were far advanced in life; and after I was settled in the ministry, I became acquainted with them in one place and another. They appeared to be some of the most consistent practical Christians with whom I ever had an acquaintance. Their light shone before men, through a long life, and brightened as they advanced on their way. Some I was called to visit in their last moments in full possession of their rational powers, who appeared perfectly to acquiesce in the will of God, to die in the full assurance of faith, and in perfect triumph over the last enemy."

These proceedings, though so accordant with the principles and spirit of the reformation, the professed model of the Connecticut establishment, did not receive its concurrence. In the midst of such a manifestation of popular feeling, there were some irregularities which did not comport with the discipline, and some doctrinal variations from the creed, of "the Saybrook platform." Every deviation or excess was magnified into importance by the majority of the clergy, who were indisposed to any extraordinary exertion, and who dreaded the infectious zeal spreading among their flocks. Numerous opposers appeared against what they were pleased to term the "new light;" and, as in most similar cases, the oppugners of reform were supported by the aristocracy. The baneful effects of establishments and of "consociations," were also plenteously exhibited. A striking instance of the deplorable illiberality of the latter occurred in the case of Mr. Robbins, who, after a variety of vexatious proceedings on the part of the consociation of New Haven county, was deposed from his office of pastor of the church at Branford, for having preached for a dissenting baptist minister at Wallingford, without the permission of the established clergyman of the parish! His own church, however, resolved, "that this society desire the Rev. Mr. Robbins to continue in the ministry among us, notwithstanding his preaching to the Baptists, and what the consociation of New Haven county have done thereon;" thus preferring to be excluded from the consociation, and become dissenters themselves, rather than submit to spiritual tyranny in so gross a form.*

than those of the clergy, and remind us of the paternal decrees of the Emperor Ferdinand II., who, from the "urgings of his tender conscience," and from his "fatherly care" for the salvation of his kingdom of Bohemia, denounced ruin and destruction against all who resisted his spiritual decrees. In May, 1742, the general assembly of Connecticut resolved as follows:—

"1. Be it enacted by the governor, council, and representatives in general court assembled, and by the authority of the same, that if any ordained minister, or any other person licensed as aforesaid, to preach, shall enter into any parish not immediately under his charge, and shall there preach and exhort the people, he shall be denied and excluded the benefit of any law of this colony, made for the support and encouragement of the gospel ministry, except such ordained minister, or licensed person, shall be expressly invited and desired to enter into such parish, and there to preach and exhort the people, by the settled minister, and the major part of the church and society within such parish.

"2. And it is further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that if any association of ministers shall undertake to examine or license any candidate for the gospel ministry, or assume to themselves the decision of any controversy, or as an association, counsel and advise in any affair that, by the platform, or agreement above mentioned, made at Saybrook, aforesaid, is properly within the province and jurisdiction of another association, then, and in such case, every member that shall be present in such association so licensing, deciding, or counselling, shall be each and every one of them denied and excluded the benefit of any law in this colony, for the encouragement and support of the gospel ministry.

"3. And it is further enacted, by the authority aforesaid, that if any minister, or ministers, contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, shall presume to preach in any parish, not under his immediate care and charge, the minister of the parish where he shall so offend, or the civil authority, or any of the committee of said parish, shall give information thereof in writing, under their hands, to the clerk of the society or parish where such offending minister doth belong, which clerk shall receive such information, and lodge and keep the same on file in his office, and no assistant or justice of the peace in this colony shall sign any warrant for the collecting any minister's rate, without first receiving a certificate from the clerk of the society, or parish, where such rate is to be collected, that no such information as is above mentioned hath been received by him, or lodged in his office.

"4. And be it further enacted, by the authority aforesaid, that if any person whatsoever, that is not a settled or ordained minister, shall go into any parish, without the express desire and invitation of the settled minister of such parish, if any there be, and the major part of the church and congregation within such parish, and publicly teach and exhort the people, he shall, for every such offence, upon complaint made thereof to any assistant or justice of the peace, be bound to his peaceable and good behaviour, until the next county court in that county where the offence shall be committed, by said assistant or justice of the peace, in the penal sum of one hundred pounds lawful money, that he or they will not offend again in the like kind; and the said county court may, if they see meet, further bind the said person or persons, offending as aforesaid, to their peaceable and good behaviour, during the pleasure of the court.

"5. And it is further enacted, by the authority aforesaid, that if any foreigner, or stranger, that is not an inhabitant of this colony, including as well such persons as have no ecclesiastical character, or license to preach, or such as have received ordination or license to preach, by any association or presbytery, shall presume to preach, teach, or publicly exhort, in any town or society within this colony, without the desire and license of the settled minister, and the major part of the church of such town and society, or at the call and desire of the church and inhabitants of such town and society, provided that it so happen that there be no settled minister there,—that every such preacher, teacher, or exhorter, shall be sent, as a vagrant person, by warrant from any assistant or justice of the peace, from constable to constable, out of the bounds of this colony."

These enactments were afterwards rendered still more severe; and, under their authority, several worthy ministers were arrested and imprisoned. This law was an outrage on every principle of justice, and on the most inherent and valuable rights of the subject. It was a palpable contradiction, and gross violation, of the Connecticut bill of rights. It was equally an invasion of the rights of heaven, and incompatible with the command, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature." In obedience to this command, the primitive preachers went every where, preaching the word. They regarded no parochial limits, and when high priests and magistrates forbade their preaching, they answered, "Whether it be right in the sight of God to hearken unto you more than unto God, judge ye; for we cannot but speak the things which we have seen and heard." This law was also contrary to the opinion and practice of all the reformers and puritans. The reformers all preached within the parishes and bishopricks of the Roman catholics, and by this means, under Divine Providence, effected the reformation. It never could have been effected without it. The puritans preached within the parishes of the church of England, and judged it their indispensable duty to preach the gospel whenever and wherever they had an opportunity. They did it zealously and faithfully, though exposed to fines, imprisonment, and loss of living. Even in Connecticut, the Episcopalians were allowed to preach and collect hearers, erect churches, and form ecclesiastical societies, in opposition to the established ministers and churches. The law was therefore partial, inconsistent, and highly persecuting.

Another circumstance, of a character equally illiberal, occurred about the same period as the enactment of these obnoxious laws. Two young men, of the name of Cleveland, were students at Yale College. Their parents had separated, with others, from the ministry of a Mr. Cogswell, at Canterbury, and had attended meetings at a private house. These young gentlemen, while at home during the vacation in September, attended the separate meetings with their parents. One of them, it seems, was a member of the separate church. For this, and their neglect to confess their fault in that respect, they were both expelled from college. The expulsion of these young men made a great clamour in the state, as unprecedented and cruel. It was considered as a severity exceeding the law of college respecting that case. The president and tutors allowed young men of the church of England, and of other denominations, to be in college without renouncing their principles; the treatment of these young men was therefore considered as partial, severe, and unjust. It began to be perceived, by many, that people had a right to worship God according to the dictates of their own consciences, and at such times, and in such places, as they pleased; that this was the principle on which the protestants and puritans acted, and the only one on which their separation and conduct could be justified. They discovered, that if christian legislatures and councils had a right to appoint the modes and places of worship, and confine Christians to them, that then the papists, and church of England, had a right to bind all Christians to worship with them, and the reformers and puritans were totally wrong, and the persecutions raised against them were just. Hence they rejected the constitution, as then understood and acted upon, and the laws as really tyrannical and persecuting.*

This circumstance tended considerably to increase the dissatisfaction which had already evinced itself by several separations from the established church, and these now became more frequent and extensive. The ministers of the separatists were exposed to continual persecution at Canterbury. Some of them were arrested, condemned, and sentenced to be bound in a bond of a hundred pounds not to offend again in the like manner; but as they conceived it was their indispensable duty to exhort and teach the people, and as they determined to teach and exhort when they should have opportunity, they would not give bonds, and so were committed to prison, and kept a long time from their families, and from the worship and communion of their brethren, and endured much hardship in their long confinement. Others were arrested and imprisoned for refusing to pay their minister's rates which were laid upon them, though they had protested against his settlement, and withdrawn themselves wholly from his ministry. Others had their cattle and goods taken and sold at half their value, to pay for the support of the minister of the parish. These violent measures, instead of checking the separation, and conciliating the minds of the people, alienated them more and more from the constitution and standing churches, and confirmed them in their belief that they were right, and actually suffering in the cause of christian liberty.

The persevering opposition of the dissenters, though a circumstance of great annoyance to a large portion of the community, was attended with results, remote indeed, yet highly beneficial. It put to the test the principles on which the Connecticut establishment was founded; its constitution has consequently undergone successive modifications, until it has been rendered far more worthy of a liberal and enlightened state.†

* "The act of the legislature, and the proceedings in consequence of it towards ministers and others, and the procedure at college, were repugnant to the sentiments of Mr. Locke, and all the best writers on toleration. The intolerant spirit of the president and governors of college at that time, will appear from an affair which happened soon after the law was made to prevent disorders, &c. A number of the senior class in college set a subscription on foot for the reprinting of Mr. Locke's essay on toleration, and obtained a considerable number of subscribers, and were about to engage, or had engaged, for the reprinting of it. The president found it out, and reprimanded them for such a piece of conduct, and ordered them to make a public confession for what they had done, or else they should not have their degrees. They all made their confessions but one; he was of age, and a man of considerable property, and had some knowledge of the credit of Mr. Locke's writings, and of that tract in particular, and he would make no confession for his attempts to obtain the reprinting of such a tract. The day before commencement he found his name was not in the catalogue of his class, who were to have their degrees; he waited on the president and corporation to know the reason why his name was not in the catalogue; he was told that he had been in the mischievous business of carrying about subscriptions for the reprinting of Mr. Locke on toleration. He told them he was of age, and had property, and if he could not have his degree, he would appeal to the king in council; that he had an attorney, and would enter it soon. Some time after, a freshman was sent to him, acquainting him that the president and corporation wished to see him. He waited on them, and they treated him with much complaisance, and told him to appear with his class, and take his degree."—Trumbull, vol. ii. p. 183.

† To know well the origin of our early institutions, and those shades of difference which mark different portions of the Union, in regard to our religious and literary establishments; and, also, the cause of certain sectional feelings or prejudices, now less felt than formerly, is a subject of some interest. We profess not to be able, in every case, to give complete satisfaction, but we hope, in the examination of this subject, to show, generally, the origin of our institutions, to develop the character of the first settlers of our country, and to exhibit the causes which have given certain sectional traits to our people.

We praise our ancestors, and deservedly too, for our literary, moral, and religious institutions; but when we examine the subject with accuracy, we shall know what, and how much, to attribute to accident, and what to design. To do this, we must look to the parent country, and ascertain, with brevity, the religious, and political state of England previous to the settlement of this country, and see with what motives and feelings our progenitors were induced to leave their native land, where were deposited the ashes of their ancestors, and dissolve all the ties of home and friendship, and emigrate to a wilderness, separated from the mother country by a great ocean.

We go back to the time of Henry VIII., and take a short view of the state of religion from that period to the time of the first settlements in our own country. During this period changes were effected which dissolved the ties by which England was held to the papal See, and created other sects, which equally dissented from the protestant episcopal church of England.

At the commencement of the reign of Henry, the whole Christian world acknowledged the supremacy of the Pope, and every crowned head did him homage and received his dominions of him. In fact, all countries were considered the dominions and actual patrimony of his holiness.

Perhaps no prince was ever more devoted to the representative of St. Peter than Henry VIII. The holy father pressed him to his bosom as his most faithful child. Henry wrote a book in vindication of the Pope's supremacy in temporal and spiritual affairs, and in answer to Martin Luther, a monk, who wrote and preached against the sale of indulgences by Leo X. For this act of filial devotion, Henry, in addition to his other splendid titles, received from his holiness that of "defender of the faith," a mark of confidence not before or since bestowed on any monarch. This appendage he bore with peculiar complacency during his reign, and handed it down to his successors.

But that capricious monarch received an affront from the Pope, because he refused to grant him a divorce from his queen, Catharine of Arragon. He openly renounced all subjection to his holiness, and actually declared war against him. He breasted the spiritual thunders of the Vatican, which in former times had shook the most powerful kingdoms, and humbled to the dust the proudest monarchs. Henry seized upon the revenues of the church, which were considered sacred, and converted them to his own use; besides this, he put himself at the head of the English church, without materially affecting any articles of faith or forms of worship.

This was then considered by the Christian world a wicked and blasphemous usurpation; and the life of Henry, as well as many subsequent monarchs of England, would badly fit them to stand at the head of those who minister at the altar of the living God

But the course pursued served in a degree to diminish the amount of general reverence for the Pope, and the head of the British church. Many were led to examine the pretensions of both, and to discard the arrogance of mortals, who should dictate creeds and forms of worship. But at this period, there was universally adopted this principle, by all sects, that uniformity of faith was indispensable to religion. It never entered their minds, that honest men could come to different results upon so momentous and so important a subject. Wickliff, Huss, Jerome of Prague, Luther, and Calvin, and their respective followers, were equally sure of infallibility with the King and the Pope. They seem never to have seriously thought or actually believed, that the great object of the Christian religion was to make mankind lead pure and honest lives, and extend the principles of charity and benevolence, to inculcate forgiveness to enemies, and give a confident hope in the hour of death. Hence we may trace the cruel persecutions inflicted by the dominant sects in succeeding reigns.

Edward, the successor of Henry, is represented to have been a mild and amiable prince, but his reign was short. He died before schemes of ambition and the pomp of power had corrupted his heart or inflamed his passions. He left the throne to Mary, without ameliorating the condition of ecclesiastical affairs. His successor was wholly devoted to the papal See. She threw herself into the arms of his holiness, and laboured to atone for the heresy of her father, by a prodigal use of fire and sword, to produce uniformity in faith and worship, according to the canons of the Romish church. All who perished in these religious conflicts, were believed by their respective sects to have fallen martyrs to the true faith; so that, in every change of power, the lines of party became distinct, and the parties more confirmed in a faith as positive as actual knowledge.

Elizabeth, the successor of Mary, possessing all the masculine virtues, without a moderate share of the qualities which render the woman amiable in private life, was equally tenacious of prerogative as her father, Henry, and exerted her power to stop the progress of popery,—seated herself at the head of the church, and remained undisturbed in this seat during her long, and to the people of England, happy reign. She appears to have been more than half a Papist; but the love of power would not permit her to submit to the supremacy of the Pope. She treated the dissenters with great rigour, and placed them without the pale of law and humanity. The dissenters increased in numbers, in proportion to their persecutions and hardships. But the vigilant energy of the government, and her unyielding nature, made the bravest dissenters timid. Uniformity in religious faith and worship, was with her a grand and unvarying object; but, in many instances, much relaxation was granted to the Papists.

This change from popery to protestantism effected by Henry, and from protestantism to popery by Mary, and protestantism restored by Elizabeth, appeared more the result of human pride, policy, and passion, than the effect of divine wisdom. Contradictory systems always tend to destroy each other; and especially when they have been advocated and enforced by the physical strength of a whole kingdom. When the rights of both contending parties were examined, these several claims weighed, and the balance struck, nothing remained for either, except what was retained by the arm of power. Hence, in England, were many who disregarded the claims of both, and threw off the imposing forms of established worship, and established one of their own. These were principally the followers of Calvin. They intended to institute a pure and spiritual worship, unshackled by the canons and rescripts of human invention; and it seems to be granted by all writers of the day, that the lives of these people were more in conformity with the strict rules of moral duty, than that of any other sect in the kingdom; and from this they assumed the name of Puritans, and were known by that appellation till long after the emigration of a portion of them to this country. But it should be remembered that at this time they were few in number—a weak and inefficient minority. They could hardly be said to have acted themselves from the spontaneous impulse of principle and chastened feeling, for they were continually surrounded by spies and informers, to drag them to imprisonment, scourging, and death. It is impossible that we should discern a complete development of their principles; for, however daring and bold, they must have acted under a partial disguise; undoubtedly much of human passion was enlisted on their side, for it is in our nature, and never has been on neutral ground in long and protracted controversy. However, we must behold them with admiration for their courage, which nothing can overawe, and for their constancy and zeal, which could brave danger, imprisonment, and death. Neal, in his history of the Puritans, gives a detail of the hardships and sufferings of this sect, during the reign of Elizabeth, so cruel, that whatever allowances we make for the times and circumstances attending them, we must see the unrelenting hand of a despot in a princess, where softness and sympathy might have been expected. The accumulated weight of distress heaped upon this class of Christians in England, France, and Germany, form a catalogue of horrors useful only to teach us moderation and forbearance in religious controversies; and that religion is a matter of conscience, and lies between man and his Maker.

James I., the successor of Elizabeth, came to the throne with as high notions of his unlimited power as any of his predecessors. His right to control the faith and consciences of men, was not to be questioned. James was a good natured prince, and valued himself much for learning, and his power of discussion upon all subjects. His object in matters of religion, was complete uniformity in faith and modes of worship, the reasonableness of which he attempted to show by argument. It seems that here he was unsuccessful; but what he wanted in argument and the arts of persuasion, he made up by absolute power; but this argument, enforced by power, did not convince or deter the unyielding Puritans. They held fast their determination to enjoy freedom in religion, and held equally fast the belief, that they were correct in matters of faith and worship; so determined and so confident were they in their principles, that civil liberty, disconnected with religious affairs, was hardly considered. Hence we find a whole congregation, with their minister, Mr. Robinson, in 1607, renounced their country and all its endearments, and settled in Holland, for the sole purpose of enjoying religious freedom. This was a most unequivocal mark of their sincerity, and devotion to their favourite object.

At this period the manners of the Puritans were rigidly austere—their long periods of fasting, and the length of their prayers and devotional exercises, approached, in severity, monkish castigation and corporeal chastisements. Their customs led to a belief, that they were the peculiar favourites of Heaven, and daily had peculiar converse and special tokens of favour from their Maker. But this removal to Holland by this resolute congregation, was by no means suited to their feelings and principles, although they were protected in all their civil and religious rights. The manners of the Dutch were not sufficiently austere. The youth of this congregation were insensibly drawn aside from the narrow path of puritanic discipline and walk in life, by the cold and frigid manners of the Dutch. The observance of the Sabbath was kept with a strictness surpassing the rigidity of the Jewish ceremony. Their fastings approached to starvation. No wonder, then, that the youth, and others who were not thoroughly saturated with enthusiasm, should intermix with the Dutch, and hail with pleasure, and even with gratitude to God, some relaxation from the severe duties of religion. The elders of this church were alarmed at the growing evil, and they resolved on another removal. Their attention was turned to the New World, where they should not be troubled by heretical neighbours, and where the youth would be kept pure from the contagion of loose morals.

This congregation, having obtained permission from James to settle in his territories, and also assurances from him of toleration in religion, determined to encounter the perils of the ocean, the hardships of the wilderness, and the dangers to which they must be exposed from the savage tribes who inhabited the shores of this new world. James was undoubtedly willing to rid his kingdom of subjects, which he could not subdue by confiscations, fines, imprisonment, and death—and indeed, of such as he could not quietly retain in his own kingdom. The public feeling was tired and satiated by frequent spectacles of horror, and the prisons had groaned a long time, by being overcrowded with obstinate and confirmed heretics. James granted them no aid for the voyage, or any facilities for commencing a new settlement. He undoubtedly expected that this wandering people would fall a prey to the hardships and diseases incident to new settlements, or be cut off by the natives, or should any survive, their obstinacy being subdued, and spirits broken, they would relent, and return with humble submission to his royal will, and bring with them a lesson and example to the Puritans in England, which they would learn and imitate; or should they brave and surmount all the difficulties to be expected, and make a permanent settlement in his waste and uncultivated lands, his power would be extended, and the resources of the nation would be increased, without any expense to the crown.

Perhaps no course of discipline could be contrived by the ingenuity of man, so well adapted to prepare the mind and feelings for a great and hazardous project, as was imposed on the first settlers of New England in the mother country. The forty years travel of the children of Israel in the wilderness, directed by Deity himself, was not better suited to them for a forcible entry into the promised land. Frederick the Great never enforced a discipline upon his troops more severe, nor half so salutary, to prepare them for conflict and victory, as was forced upon our progenitors, to fit them to settle in a new world. Our forefathers were familiar with danger and distress in all its forms. They knew the ties of home and of country, and they had experienced the dissolution of them. They had endured poverty, cold, hunger, stripes, and imprisonment, and rose above them, and even death was disrobed of his terrors. Such were the people who landed at Plymouth in the cold of winter, in 1620, and of this character were the settlers generally in New England, firm and resolute in action, and in matters of religion, unyielding, and fully persuaded in the complete rectitude of their own peculiar creed, without a single ray of toleration, or any thing like charity for those who might differ from themselves in opinion. They insisted, with equal force and power, to coerce opinion, and control matters of faith, and produce uniformity in it, as ever were practised by a Catholic or Protestant monarch.

The early writers and historians of our country give us only the details of ecclesiastical affairs, the gathering of churches, dull and uninteresting accounts of ministers, church disturbances, the suppression of heresy, and barbarous and cruel punishments inflicted against it, and various bloody conflicts with the Indians. But enough is told us to lead to a correct knowledge of the nature of the government, and of the spirit of the times. We have often been told, that our first settlers were a race of stern republicans, who came here to enjoy civil and religious freedom. But no opinion is more erroneous. It is true they came here to enjoy their own peculiar system of religious faith and mode of worship, but not to admit or tolerate any other. Our republican feelings, institutions, and habits, which made us free, were purely accidental, and were by no means designed by the first settlers.

In 1629, about three hundred emigrants arrived at Salem from England, where they found a few families under the care of Mr. Endicott. These families undoubtedly were there to attend to the fisheries and carry on a traffic with the natives. Mr. Hutchinson says, in the ten succeeding years, more than twenty-one thousand settlers came to New England. About 1640, emigration ceased, owing to the ascendancy of the puritanic party in England, headed by the famous Oliver Cromwell.

The first General Court in the Province of Massachusetts Bay was held in 1629, on board the ship Arabella, moored in Charles River. This court resolved that every elector, or any person eligible to office, should be a member of some regular church. This edict, so often praised, made the government purely ecclesiastical. The power of the church to punish heresy, afterwards so frequently exercised, and also to determine, in all cases, what heresy was, laid prostrate all civil liberty. We shall notice the exercise of this power hereafter in several instances. There can be no question, that nearly all the males of every congregation would become members of the church, and it was in fact a stigma upon a man then, as it would be now, not to possess the rights and privileges of his neighbour. All offices were then elective, and we may presume, that office then had charms, as well as at the present age. Office seekers then had their views to subvert, and the requisite means at hand, as they have at the present day. If long prayers, abstinence, and a piteous whine, were required to obtain an object, they were as readily performed, as professions of love of country and the happiness of the nation are made in the present state of our republic. We may, perhaps, calculate the amount of sincerity in the early professors, as we now may calculate the amount of patriotism of those who make loud and noisy professions of it. In both cases, perhaps, much credit will be given, but the man of experience will not be bound beyond the conclusions formed by the honest dictates of his own mind.

To repel the attacks of the Indians, to acquire their lands, and to guard against the various avenues where heresy might advance and make encroachments upon their religious system, were the only public employments of our ancestors. They were nearly as hostile to the deluded and mistaken heretic, as to the savage, armed with his tomahawk and scalping knife. It is true, that the heretic was first ordered to recant and renounce his wicked and erroneous opinions, but on refusal he was doomed to banishment, and on a return to the province was to suffer death. But with the Indians there was not perpetual war; there were times of peace and a friendly interchange of kind offices between them and the whites, but there was neither truce nor peace with heretics.

In 1634, Roger Williams, who had been a distinguished minister at Plymouth, and afterwards at Salem, was banished the colony for holding many exceptionable tenets. He was enthusiastic in his sentiments, and had in great abhorrence every relic of popery, and any conformity to the protestant episcopal church of England; yet he was no persecutor. His declared opinion was, "that to punish a man for any matters of conscience is persecution." His attachment to this principle, so worthy of an enlightened mind, was fully evinced by his subsequent life and conduct. Mr. Williams went south, without the jurisdiction of the province, and settled in a place, now Providence. He obtained a charter from the crown of a district called Providence Plantations, of which he was a long time governor. Here he displayed all the mild and Christian virtues. His province was the asylum of the oppressed and persecuted of all sects and denominations. Mr. Williams possessed a mind more than a century and a half in advance, in liberality and manly thinking, to his contemporaries in New England. His example is scarcely equalled in brightness at the present day. It is true we have not at present actual persecution in matters of religion or conscience, yet the hollow murmur of heresy too often rolls through the gloomy recesses of the dark, and its labours sometimes are exposed to the light, attended with the fierce and intolerant spirit of ancient times.

The case of Mrs. Hutchinson is worthy of consideration, since it shows more unequivocally the temper of the times, the state of the church, and the important and religious triflings of synods and councils, composed of the civil and religious dignitaries of the colony. Mrs. Ann Hutchinson came to Boston, in 1636. Her husband was a man of good estate, and of much note and esteem among the people. He several times represented the town in General Court. She was a woman of good education, of a lively imagination, and of distinguished zeal and piety. She attracted much attention in Boston, was greatly caressed by Sir Harry Vane, the governor, and treated with marked respect by Mr. Cotton and Mr. Wheelwright, two very distinguished ministers of that day. Her house became the resort of religious females, to whom Mrs. H. expounded the Scriptures, and made her remarks upon the sermons recently delivered. She was greatly extolled for learning and an ardent piety. At her lectures, she had an attentive and crowded auditory. Whether her popularity gave the alarm to the ministers of the other sex, who chose rather that women should listen and obey—or that the good lady actually stepped aside from the narrow and mysterious path of prescribed faith, we have not sufficient documentary evidence to determine. But certain it is, that she was charged with heresy, and brought before the governor, deputy governor, and council of assistants, the teachers and elders of the churches, assembled in conclave at Cambridge. A historian of that day says, "the heresy she propagated divided the people, and came near bringing destruction upon church and state." "Fortunately," says he, "by the vigilance and prudence of Governor Winthrop, the evils and mischiefs of her heresy were brought upon herself."

This grave and dignified assembly continued in session at Cambridge for three weeks; and all this time they spent in fervent prayer for divine light and direction, and in interrogatories put to the accused with all the subtlety peculiar to scholastic divinity. Every member of this synod was a grave inquisitor; and what is remarkable in this transaction, is, that a female, unassisted by counsel, should be able to stand this length of time in presence of this most dignified and learned body, and answer, defend and reply to it, individually and collectively. The council must have been greatly embarrassed; and this is manifest from the long period of its session. But the charge of heresy was a crime hard to defend, and we have no records of a complete acquittal in such a case. At the conclusion, the synod found that Mrs. Hutchinson entertained more than eighty heretical opinions in matters of religion! These opinions she was ordered to recant and renounce, under the penalty of excommunication and banishment from the jurisdiction of the province, and not to return under pain of death! Mrs. Hutchinson did not renounce to the satisfaction of the church, and she left the province according to sentence.

Our grave historian does not inform us how many correct opinions this lady had, but charity would lead us to conclude that she had some. So plain are Christian precepts and Christian doctrine, that it is a matter of surprise, that a person could entertain more than eighty distinct heresies. We have not the curiosity to inquire more particularly into the doctrines or discipline of the church at that time. It is apparent that much, and perhaps the greater part, was mere serious and holy trifling, wherein the heart and understanding had very little to do.

It is manifest from history, that the inquisitorial powers and arbitrary proceedings of the Cambridge synod, were not wholly approved by the people. They must have seen the hand of oppression in the long and protracted inquiry, and cruelty in the sentence pronounced against Mrs. Hutchinson. This may be fairly inferred from the nature of the transaction, unless we suppose the last feeling of sympathy and the generosity natural to man to be wholly extinct. That this council was censured is evident; for at the next general court a law passed rendering it highly penal for any person to censure or comment upon the doings of ministers or magistrates. It was tantamount to saying that ministers and magistrates "could do no wrong."

It was expected that numbers of Mrs. Hutchinson's friends and adherents were on the eve of embarking to this country. This gave alarm to the people, and that they might guard against so great an evil, in 1637 the general court took the matter into hand. They intended to preserve entire the absolute power of the church at the expense of humanity and ordinary justice. The general court passed a severe law against entertaining strangers in their houses, or selling lands to them, or affording aid, as, we now conceive, the common principles of humanity enjoin. By the two laws above mentioned, the right of expressing an opinion of censure, or making any comments upon the doings of ministers or magistrates, and of showing hospitality and kindness to strangers, were wholly taken away and rendered highly penal. It would require a wonderful degree of chymical knowledge in politics and religion, to find a single principle, upon which our republican liberty of any kind could claim growth and residence at this time. For the liberties of our country we must look to other sources than the principles of our ancestors at that day, or till long after the restoration of Charles II. For the government was completely ecclesiastical, and equally arbitrary and despotic as any government in all Christendom.

Our early historians dwelt much upon remarkable providences, and the frowns and favours of God; so that His clear and manifest counsels were open and known to the people. If a heretic should die of a fever, break a limb, be taken captive by the Indians, or killed by them, they would see, in all this, the just anger of Heaven, and deserved punishment and displeasure of God towards them. Should the same pious historians revisit New England, and see the great variety of sects, and not one pursuing the course of the then dominant party, they would think that our Heavenly Father had neglected his business, and ceased from his watchful care; otherwise we should all have been exterminated without distinction, for having violated the primitive and puritanic faith. They might bewail our departure, but if they possessed the kindly feelings of humanity, they would rejoice to see errors corrected, abuses reformed, and the principles of justice and charity widely extended; so that, except in some strongly excited people, shadowed by ignorance and strong and gloomy prepossessions, the different sects live in harmony, without any provocation, unless it be "to provoke one another to love and good works"

Our ancestors separated from all other religious sects by their own acts, and guarding at every corner against heresy, soon became sensible that time would shortly lessen the number of elders and teachers, and many more would be required to supply destitute flocks, daily increasing by natural growth of population, and by emigration. Those who could afford to send their sons to the mother country for an education, would not harbour the thought of exposing them to the heresies of the established church of England; and above all, on their return to the province, these sons would be a medium to communicate doctrines so much detested. There were very few in the province of sufficient wealth to give their sons an education in a distant country. All these circumstances combined, our progenitors looked to their own resources, and resolved to educate their sons at home for the ministry, the only liberal profession of that day, and in fact, all that was great and good in society. For this purpose, a college was established in Cambridge as early as the year 1638, for the sole and express purpose of educating and raising up a learned ministry. Common and public schools were also established, that the youth might be able to read the scriptures and the standard works of puritanic faith and discipline in our churches.

Cotton Mather, who wrote voluminously and reasoned sparingly, if he reasoned at all, states explicitly the object of the founders of our college, and the object of our common and public schools. This writer says nothing upon the principles of civil liberty, nor does he any where advocate the rights of conscience and private judgment in matters of religion. These were unknown in his day, and his writings serve only to show the darkness of the mental atmosphere. Dr. Mather filled a great space in his time, both in church and state—for church included both. In his writings we have specimens of the greatest fanaticism, the most shameless credulity, that ever escaped the lips or pen of mortals. His account of the flying vessel and the Salem witchcraft, and the latter upon his own knowledge, are enough to give a lasting stamp upon his own character, and mark in capitals the spirit of the times. We hope not to offend by our remarks; but we would rather wish that our institutions, so wisely calculated for the happiness of our nation, and as blazing examples to the world, should be traced to their true and legitimate sources. We have so long been in the habit of extolling our brave and venerable forefathers, as if they came pure from the regions of blessedness, pious, devout, and patriotic, that they with political foresight laid the foundation of our republican liberties, that we shall not be disappointed if we do not obtain full credence, when we state, that our liberties, both civil and religious, were accidental, rather than designed. We have no need to call to our aid any thing like a fabulous origin of our race—we have no need of a "she wolf" to nurture our ancestors, or to carry off in a tempest the founders of our churches. We have only to follow the march of mind, attended with local circumstances, to account for our freedom and our goodly institutions. We ought to value highly every thing done by our fathers, the fruits of which we daily reap; but by no means ought we to suppose that our ancestors had powers and faculties, or wisdom, superior to those of the present generation—for we must remember, that their whole business was to repel the Indians, and acquire possession of their lands, to preserve uniformity of faith and practice in matters of religion, and to guard with sleepless vigilance against heresy.

It is not the present object to censure with severity the acts of the ecclesiastic government of the colony, and much less to apologize for them. We could not offer any thing to extenuate the cruelty, or even guilt, of punishing four Quakers in Boston, with death, about the year 1660, for heresy. This rigour in discipline has often been passed over, if not with applause, certainly with the plea of necessity—this necessity we could never understand. Dr. Increase Mather, once a promoter of these cruel and bloody proceedings, in time relented, and denounced this intolerant spirit. The colonies of Plymouth and Massachusetts obtained no advantages by such proceedings over Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, and Maryland, where religious persecutions have never been known. Governor Winthrop, in the last days of his life, when urged to sign a warrant, to carry into effect the decrees of spiritual domination, said, "I have done too much of this business already," and refused his signature. When such men as Governor Winthrop and Dr. Increase Mather, in the cool of the evening of life, when objects of earthly power were in subjection to reason and conscience, gave their decided and unequivocal opinion against cruel coercion in matters of faith and modes of worship, what must we think of those of the present day, who stand their professed apologists, and represent the present, compared with former times, as the period of impiety and irreligion?

We know that our fathers have been praised with the extravagance of eulogy, and we acknowledge that they have strong claims upon us for respect and reverential regard, but we cannot bestow upon them any thing of commendation for piety and love of religion beyond what now belongs to the present age. We would ask the most enthusiastic admirer of the puritans, whether he would now desire to exchange his turn of existence, and spend his life with such a people, or wait and stay with the present generation, till he returned to the dust? We believe that he would not be inclined for a change, and we are confident that the present circumstances of our country are such, that no period since the first settlement of it has been equally propitious to the man of science, the artisan, agriculturist, and merchant. The man of benevolence and charity will hail the present as the holyday of holy affections, compared to any former period. We, in fact, belittle ourselves, as did many of the Patrician families in Rome, by a constant strain of panegyric upon our venerable forefathers, and pious pilgrims.

Liberty is natural to man, and we can scarcely find an instance since the creation of Adam, that man has not exercised that liberty when in his power. Our ancestors did this, and were cautious in leaving a single trace of neglect in their course. But they did no more than what has been done in the mother country. The British parliament from the time of King John, when they wrested from him his magna charter, which he nor his successors ever observed, unless in extreme peril, and to avoid a revolution, have seized upon every circumstance to extend the liberty of the subject. Even what the British call their constitution at the present day, is an invasion upon what was once the acknowledged rights of the king. The increase of knowledge, directing physical force, is the origin of modern liberty; and this liberty is more or less extensively enjoyed according to the degree of knowledge and other accompanying circumstances favourable or unfavourable to the attainment of the object. The love of liberty was as great in Britain at the commencement of our revolution as in America, but circumstances in regard to the enjoyment of it were different in these two portions of the world.

We would not here be understood that Great Britain was then ruled in despotism. The person, property, and reputation of the subject, were as well secured and protected at that period in the realm, as at any subsequent time, in this or any other country. Where these rights are secured by permanent and equal laws, aided by the trial by jury, there must be liberty, let the form of government be what it may. We have, in a great measure, in politics, said what our ancestors often repeated in regard to religion, that none could be genuine, except the one of our own creed. The object of religion is to make men good, and the object of government is to make the governed secure in their rights, promote industry, encourage learning and enterprise, and make the nation contented, safe, and happy. When these objects are attained, the names and forms are of minor consideration. The mind of man has never been able to devise a system of government so well adapted to the feelings, habits, and circumstances of a people, as our own is for us; but we should greatly err, should we suppose that our constitution and form of government were suited, under existing circumstances, to almost any other nation in the world.

From the first landing of our ancestors, in New England, till the year 1692, if we except the rule of Sir Edmund Andros, which lasted about two years, all officers were elective. Plymouth and the Massachusetts colonies were as free in the management of their affairs in the election and support of their rulers, as the Commonwealth is now. The lands were parcelled out in such manner that every one had enough, and few had any to spare. A monopoly was not sought, except by Mason and Gorges, who probably failed in the accomplishment of their wishes, for this very reason. Industry and rigid economy were requisite among the early settlers, to obtain the means of subsistence. Almost every settler had a freehold estate, that he would claim as absolute property—he had no tithes, rents, or service to perform, as the condition of his tenure. This raised him to the dignity of a peer of the realm, in all respects, but a seat in the house of lords. He acknowledged himself a loyal subject, but felt no gratitude to the king, for he or his ancestors never received any acts of parental kindness for which they should return any sincere acknowledgments. The story of the wrongs which were suffered at home, and the actual labours and hardships endured here, without aid or assistance, were enough to extinguish all sincere regard for king, queen, lords, and commons; and above all, the abhorrence with which they beheld the religion of the court, amounted to absolute hatred.

But from the influence which the French had with the natives, the common enemies of the whites, by means of the Jesuits, our ancestors could look only to the mother country for aid in case of extremity. This almost continual and common danger operated powerfully to restrain and keep within bounds the common and uniform feelings of the colonists towards the parent country. The great number of people, to whom our ancestors were connected by family and friendship, at home, was another tie which bound them to remember Great Britain with partial affection. Our fathers had much more loyalty upon their lips than was felt in their hearts. Until the arrival of the new charter under William and Mary, excepting the short government of Andros, the colonies exercised all the rights and privileges they could desire, and these continued for a period of more than sixty years. Many of the settlers were born and bred with this free exercise of right; so that they could not be divested of it, without an invasion of their best and dearest privileges. The crown took care to control their commerce, and profit by it. The duties levied on goods in England, exported to the colonies, were acquiesced in without a murmur, and these duties being paid by the consumer, were scarcely felt or thought of here.

Sir William Phipps, the first governor under the charter of William and Mary, arrived here in 1692. By this charter, the governor, deputy governor, and secretary, were appointed by the crown. The judicial department was appointed by the executive, at the head of which was the governor, who represented majesty itself. The people chose their representatives, who, in general court, elected a council, to assist in executive duties. The general court could make no laws to have any force or effect, if the crown should disapprove of them within three years from the time they were enacted. Power was reserved to parliament, to make laws, to regulate our trade, and legislate for us in other cases; and these statutes were to be binding upon us. This charter prohibited any religious test in regard to the elective franchise. By this, an end was put to ecclesiastical tyranny; and from the time the provisions of this charter went into operation, we may date the cry of the decay of religion in our country. We may also, with more truth, state the gradual decay of hypocrisy, and from this period, the commencement of bold and correct reasoning, and the introduction of common law and common sense in courts of justice. By all these our liberties were deeply rooted, had their growth, and have arrived to maturity.

When Governor Phipps came here, he found the colonies distracted with ecclesiastical matters, at the old business of hunting out and punishing heresy, to the almost total neglect of civil affairs. Although the people were deprived of a voice in the choice of some of their rulers, they gained much in other respects. They were freed from ecclesiastical domination, under which republican liberty never has, and probably never will be enjoyed. The one depends on an accurate development of our natural rights, and the methods to make them secure against passion, pride, avarice, and hostile attacks at home, and from our enemies abroad; the other depends wholly upon the credulity of the people, and a complete surrender of private judgment and the reasoning powers to fallible man, inflated with spiritual pride, and armed with physical force.

This charter, framed with so much caution as to restrain the colony in all acts of legislation, unless these acts were conformable to royal will and pleasure, left not a trace of liberty to the subject. The resistance to the measures of Great Britain afterwards made by the colonists, could not be for a violation of any rights secured by this charter. The rights exercised under former charters were expressly taken away by this; but the love and fondness of former rights and privileges were increased by privation, and enkindled into a flame the bosoms of the thinking and intelligent men of our country. They saw nothing but complete and absolute subjection which awaited them. The habits of the people firmly fixed, and the great increase of population, and a good share of knowledge generally diffused among them, and this knowledge, and those habits, all favourable to resist encroachments upon natural rights, excited the jealousy of Britain, and caused her to adopt measures that could not be borne, and such measures as were successfully resisted.

In practice and in principle, the colony lost nothing, but gained much in the emancipation from religious tyranny. Whatever of liberty had been granted was enjoyed, while practicable, and was never forgotten. The recollection of past privileges remained in their minds, fresh as the existence of perpetual spring. These feelings and habits were not to be controlled by charters, and they afford a lasting example of the complete futility of compacts of a national character, when these compacts are opposed to national habits and feelings. In the great question which separated this country from Britain, our fathers did not confine themselves to the provisions of the charter of William and Mary, but claimed the right of representation in parliament, as a condition upon which a revenue should be raised in this country for the use of the crown. This representation they knew was impracticable; and in regard to the revenue, it had been imposed upon them by exactions at home, and acquiesced in for a long period. In fact, our remonstrances and petitions acknowledged the right of parliament "to regulate our trade," even at the commencement of the American revolution. This undoubtedly meant the imposition of import and export duties. We cannot see any difference in principle, whether these duties were collected in a port of Great Britain, or in Boston.

But the difference of places in the exaction of revenue could not alter the principle on which it was exacted; yet place had a powerful effect upon the minds of the scrutinizing and watchful public. Our leading men knew the power and influence which office has upon the people; they knew that these revenue officers were numerically so many spies upon their liberties; and that by style of living and caresses, these officers would allure some, and by that hauteur and manner, the frequent concomitant of handsome salaries, would deter more to a complete acquiescence to the raising a revenue here. The resistance to the acts of these exactors shows a degree of sagacity in meeting the insinuating influence of men of rank, from the highest grade down to the petty placeman, and must command our admiration and applause.

The great Earl of Chatham, Burke, and others, who knew well our character, and who were the reputed advocates of the colonies, never pretended that parliament had invaded chartered rights; but the measures pursued by ministers were inexpedient and impolitic, that they had a direct tendency to exasperate the colonists, and injure the dignity and happiness of the British nation. They recommended measures to soothe our feelings and hold fast our trade, but not to surrender a single principle for which we then contended. Had such measures been adopted and pursued, as recommended by the noble earl, the independence of the colonies would have been retarded for more than half a century. The leaders of our revolutionary struggle claimed rights and privileges granted by former charters, which had been annulled, and reasoned from the impulse of habits, and upon the true principles of civil liberty, and they came to results which gained our complete emancipation. With them independence was the grand object from the first and serious difficulties with the parent country. We presented humble and loyal petitions to king and parliament with one hand, while we held the sword in the other. It is not a matter of astonishment, that these petitions were not graciously received. Had the colonies been sufficiently strong, and their strength sufficiently concentrated, these humble petitions would have never been sent across the Atlantic, nor would the date of Lexington battle have been the first in order of conflict.

If positive resistance was not intended, why were companies of minute men organized through the whole colony? What meant our committees of safety and correspondence? Why were magazines of warlike stores placed in various parts of the country? And for what purpose were the British troops under General Gage so narrowly watched, and their particular movements made known in all parts of the colony, while the troops were closely besieged in Boston by public opinion? Hancock, Patrick Henry, the Adamses, and other distinguished men of that day, knew too well the pride and power of the British nation, to petition the throne in hope of success under such warlike and daring attitudes. They did what will be done in all countries, where the education, habits, and moral feelings of the people, concur to promote so noble an enterprise.

We have seen that the foundation of Harvard College was laid in the fear of propagating heresy, and receiving any thing from the mother country which could possibly entail upon us so great an evil. It must be confessed, that New England, at the time of founding the college, had many learned men among them. But their learning was chiefly confined to the clergy; and we may here acknowledge, in sincerity, that the clergy have been the main depositories of science here from the first settlement of the country, nearly to the present day; and from this class of men, we have received more light and knowledge than from all others. Our fathers looked well to their own resources, and have seldom been remiss in making the most of them. From this we must attribute the degree of advancement in science and the arts, to which New England has attained beyond most of her neighbours. We find the effect of this in the persevering enterprise of our young men and citizens, who have, with much advantage, incorporated themselves with our sister States. In fact, the common and general good has thereby been greatly increased; an impulse has been communicated, which will be felt for generations yet to come.

Virginia, the oldest state in the Union, settled at the expense of the crown, nurtured for years as an only child, felt not the necessity to look to her own resources. She was always dandled in the lap of complaisance. Her religion was congenial to the mother country, and she drew her nourishment from the breast of parental kindness. She had all the assurance and importance of the child of a rich and indulgent father. She sent her youth to Cambridge and Oxford, in England, to be educated, where they were, in many things well instructed, and where they drank deeply of the prejudices against the puritans. To deride with ability our New England habits and principles, and beat poor Jonathan soundly, was the first point in a complete Virginia education. He felt the dignity of his church, he remembered with pride the loyalty of his colony, during the Rump and the protectorate of Cromwell, he contrasted the manners in religious worship between his own and the colonies of New England; while he repeated his liturgy with the "ore rotundo," he could not but feel a hearty disrelish to the singsong manner of the puritans, who distorted their faces, and tortured their language, to resemble nothing which belonged to the protestant episcopal church. These northern peculiarities became his pastime, and to transmit them down to succeeding generations, was a labour of some exertion and much pleasure, but at present exercised with limited success.

In Massachusetts every thing which belonged to the episcopal church was treated as antichristian, and carried the mark of the beast. Christmas holydays were forbidden by law. Perhaps no two colonies ever existed with more strongly marked and defined antipathies than the Massachusetts and Virginia. Unlike in education and habits, the one driving from her jurisdiction all puritans, the other equally unbending and stern to all episcopalians, separated by a great extent of country, they scarcely felt for each other according to the dictates of a common humanity.

While a law imposing five shillings fine for observing a Christmas holiday in Massachusetts was in force, Virginia gave full scope to all the festivities usual on such occasions in the mother country. The social and convivial feelings of man could not, with alacrity, forego all pastime, and be resigned to abject sobriety in the form of religion. Our ancestors well knew this, and set apart one day in the year, previous to Christmas, as a day of public thanksgiving and praise to our Heavenly Father, for the mercies and favours of the past year. But in this, there should be no resemblance of an episcopal Christmas. We may here observe, that our puritanic institution answered all the purposes of bringing together family, friends, and connexions, and afforded a multitude of enjoyments of the social kind in the short space of one day, before satiety could degenerate into disgust, and much more conveniently suited to good morals and the condition of the people, than the twelve days of Christmas observed by the episcopal church. There can be no doubt that we varied in our food, and substituted pumpkin pie in room of the antichristian plumb pudding, and used some exertion that our thanksgiving should not resemble a Christmas dinner. Our pies, and manner of reading, and devotional exercises, now caricatured by our southern neighbours, are sufficient proofs that we were offensive to the southern colonies; and from our own establishments and customs, we cannot suppose that they were our favourites.

Virginia was the great mother and leader in the south. She was proud of her ascendancy in the affections of the court, and took to herself a peculiar complacency in regard to religion. She drove from her colony all dissenters from the protestant episcopal church; and, by this ill timed and cruel policy, built up Maryland to become a rival in trade. In return for her affections for the crown and the church, she obtained extensive credit at home, imported largely the luxuries of Europe, and assumed a style of living, and a grandeur of deportment, far beyond any sister colony. It is hard to retrench when the charms of good living are well known to a people. The expense of educating their sons in England, and by private tutors at home, was no addition to economy or frugal habits among the Virginians. Their expenditures were great beyond ordinary income, so that in time a large European balance of debt had gradually increased, and amounted, according to their own statement, to more than they were then able to pay.

While our southern friends lived in much ease and great splendour, eating the luxuries of Europe, and wearing foreign fabrics, and their sons drinking at the full fountains of science in England, we were looking well to our own resources, avoided a large colony debt, and left individuals unembarrassed in their circumstances. Our sons drank of the wells dug by their fathers, and preserved their identity with their countrymen; and if not so learned, they made a favourable impression upon the public on the side of economy and simplicity of manners. All this was accomplished here from the fear of heresy and hatred of the episcopal church. We cannot trace the origin of our college, and the establishment of our schools, to other sources. This fear and hatred did not exist in Virginia, and there public education was wholly neglected. The college of William and Mary was early established, but has had only a languishing existence. The fact is, the people took no degree of interest in the establishment, and sent most of their sons abroad, or without the colony, to be educated. This must ever be the issue of all literary establishments under the like circumstances.

During this period, our New England colleges were well appreciated by the people, and generously patronized; and have proved sources of great moral and political worth to the public. From them, we have obtained a rank in the literary world beyond our neighbours of the south, and the moral impulse given by them to all classes of people here, are such as distinguish us from our less fortunate neighbours. But we can by no means say, that these effects of education were designed, or even contemplated, by our ancestors—they are, in fact, the production of accident. We can neither believe, that the Virginia policy was so pursued to produce the effects already witnessed. Virginia has never been charged with the want of self-love and self-respect, nor with the want of acute discernment to ascertain her own interest, nor with not bringing forward the measures to promote it. The different results, in regard to education, in both Massachusetts and Virginia, must be attributed to accident, rather than design. Should we say that they were designed, we should claim a compliment for ourselves, of which our fathers never dreamed, and of which Cotton Mather, in his time, never heard, or he would have placed it in his Magnalia; and at the same time, we should cast a reproach on Virginia, which she ought not to bear, and which she by no means deserves.

But the pride and aristocracy of Virginia have been equal to that of lords, dukes, and nobles. She could not assume any thing on the score of her resources beyond her sisters, and nothing from her origin and ancestry, which could be subjects of boasting. Many, very many, were descended from mothers "who came to try their luck in Virginia," and were purchased by their sires with tobacco, at prices according to the quality and soundness of the article. The resources of that commonwealth at the present day, and of her industry, hardly keep pace with the other states in the Union. She has produced men who would do credit to any civilized nation in the world, and one, whom we all acknowledge was emphatically the father of his country; yet, for many years, her influence in the councils of the nation has declined with the decline of party feeling, and her overwhelming influence and power receded in proportion to the test we have made from experience. We could wish to cast a veil over some portion of what has been, but we would by no means attribute any thing to corrupt motives. We must blame ourselves, that we elected many to the office of public servants, who had little knowledge, and less political honesty. These men, without much training, stood on their ground, and kept their ranks filled, in array against their own constituents; and the victory being now won, it is with reluctance that the victors lay aside their weapons. But we hope not to arouse any unpleasant feelings, or blow into a blaze the embers which a long time have been sleeping.

At the commencement of the revolutionary war, the most difficult thing for solution is, that all the colonies united and made common cause against the parent country. As has been already observed, Massachusetts in the east, and Virginia in the south, were the two great and leading colonies. They were not equally oppressed by king and parliament; the one, a favourite of the court, and shared largely of the royal bounty and favour—the other, never a favourite, alienated in affection from oppression at home, and heavy exactions abroad, and both differing in religious forms and creeds, and obnoxious and hateful to each other on that account. How happened it, that they should both coalesce in decided opposition to the mother country? How could men unite in arms, and in their physical energies, when they could not mingle their prayers at the altar of their common God?

The Massachusetts colony was oppressed and cruelly treated, and the measures adopted against her, were unworthy of the British crown and nation. But those oppressions were not dealt out to the colonies generally—some of them had no cause of complaint; but all had cause to fear the weight of the heavy hand laid upon Massachusetts. They undoubtedly viewed the measures of king and parliament, as a rod in terrorem. If the oppressed colony had submitted, the restrictions and exactions imposed were so great, that the discontented and aggrieved would have soon left it, and sought a residence in some of the sister colonies, less oppressed and less aggrieved. They would have carried with them a discontented spirit, and a spirit desirous of the enjoyment of political liberty, and would, from the natural propensity of man, have carried this spirit and infused it at the place of migration. The vindictive temper of parliament would have watched with sleepless vigilance every motion of the malcontents, and have visited, in vials of wrath, every symptom of disloyalty and disobedience; so that, sooner or later, each colony might expect a similar course of measures adopted for her, as had been imposed on the colony of Massachusetts. These are such reasonings, as might, we think, have been used with propriety at the epoch of our revolution. They were in some degree familiar with the statesmen of the several colonies, we well know; but that other circumstances strongly operated in the decision of the colonies to meet force with force, and "try the tug of war," is equally well known.

From the character of the people of New England, and their warlike preparations, the other colonies could not doubt her intentions to manfully resist the cruel acts of parliament, and the first encounter with the veteran soldiers of England, fully justified this anticipation, and taught the haughty Briton a lesson of circumspection, which lasted for more than seven years. For one colony to assist in enslaving the others, would have been subversive of the principles of common justice, and would, at the same time, have been an avowal of sentiments which would have prepared the way for complete slavery with themselves. But, we apprehend, although similar reflections had weight with the Virginians, there was another subject equally weighty, which fixed their resolution to make common cause with New England in resisting the parent country.

The great amount of debt due from the merchants and planters of Virginia, to creditors in England, was more than they were able to pay; and it was expected, that a war with Britain, ending in the independence of the colonies, would fully liquidate and cancel this great amount. Two great and important objects, then, would be attained. This position is greatly strengthened, if not fully confirmed, by subsequent facts, which took place in the State of Virginia, and in the halls of Congress. The violent opposition made to the commercial treaty of 1794, between the United States and Great Britain, commonly called Jay's treaty, must lead to the conclusion, that the payment of these debts by the war, was not an insignificant object in the struggle. The most active and strenuous opposers of measures which were adopted to carry into effect that treaty, by which British subjects should find no impediments in collecting the debts of our citizens, were peculiarly caressed, loaded with honours, and overwhelmed in the affections of the people. On the other hand, those in Congress who laboured for its ratification, and struggled hard and successfully to procure the measures necessary to carry this treaty into effect, were loaded with reproach, and Washington himself did not escape without severe censure.

After a lapse of thirty years, we can look back upon transactions, and weigh circumstances and opinions, and find many ingredients which, in the smoke and heat of passion, were wholly obscured. What is called patriotism, is often the result of some sordid self-interest, some unhallowed prejudice or violent hatred, and much sagacity and dispassionate judgment are requisite in forming and giving a correct decision upon public measures in time of great political excitement. It is no certain mark that a man tenderly loves his own family, because he bitterly hates his neighbour. We have several flagrant and well authenticated instances which transpired during the late war with England, and which show that some public men regarded their own private interest more than they did the public good or the laws of the land; and what has been, we again expect under the like circumstances.

In regard to education, Virginia has commenced where Massachusetts began nearly two hundred years ago, by founding a college and using laudable efforts for its encouragement and support; but in one particular, she differs much from us. She has imported largely in teachers from Europe to fill the several seats of instruction in her new college; and in this particular, it is hoped, that the balance of trade will not be against her. But there is something in this importation which shows a want of knowledge of the character of New England men, and of their literary acquirements, or a strong partiality to England, indicative of a return to "her first love;" and that Virginia should prefer gentlemen bred and educated in a monarchical government, to teach republican principles and enforce republican habits, is strange indeed. The time has been, when such an act in New England would have substantiated, in the mind of a Virginian, "a bold and wicked attempt to dissolve our Federal Union, and again put ourselves under the protection and government of the British king."

New England has often been arraigned at the public tribunal, on information of the ancient colony, and charged with crimes and heresies—to all which, New England has pleaded not guilty, and hath put herself upon posterity. New England could not subscribe to the requirements of the south, and the south has been too proud to confess an error, but come to the right about; yet still persists, that she has not changed the line of march. We care not, whether the people discover it, or not; but in a practical point of view, this change of course is of some importance—for we have never considered public men raised to a high degree of sublimation, who could act contrary to their public and openly declared convictions and settled principles.

Climate and productions have, and always will cause, a difference in manners and customs in all countries, as well as the origin of the inhabitants. But as it respects New England, Virginia, and some of the southern states, the lines of distinction which so plainly defined them, are now less vivid and fresh; the original demarcations were imported into both sections nearly at the same time. These limits have continued, and probably will continue for centuries to come. Although the partition wall of separation is broken down, yet the effects of this wall will long remain. We have now no religious test, nor any tribunal, thank God, to punish by banishment, fines, imprisonment, stripes, and death, for heresy; but we have some imaginary lines of distinction, which will be done away in time.

Since many in the south laid a foundation to fame and consequence, by their opposition to Jay's treaty, and by that means have provided well for themselves and families, by a monopoly of honourable and lucrative offices, it would be fair and just to bring again this subject, as well as many others connected with it, and growing out of it, before the public; for at the public tribunal all public measures must be tested, and have their award of merit or demerit, accordingly as the people are benefited or injured by such measures. Such a course is due, not only to individuals, but to the nation,—that we look dispassionately upon measures, at the cool of the present time, and take a fair and manly view of the whole. Mr. Jay is not alive, but his worth and worthiness are not questioned by the most fastidious and squeamish politicians, who contribute their effusions to the veriest sinks of the nation. We should look back to the object of our departure, and examine well the course which we have steered, to the motives and skill of our pilots, in order to come to a correct conclusion, whether our voyage, under all circumstances, has been so prosperous as it ought, or might have been, under the direction of dispassionate councils and prudent and firm management. The above subject, and many others, which have agitated and convulsed the public mind, demand investigation. The present generation owe it to posterity and to the world.

The New England people, from the first arrival of the puritans upon our shores, as far as their limited and intolerant principles of religion would admit, have uniformly been republican in habits and in manners. If not so from inclination, and a common feeling, they were republican from circumstances, all being involved in common labour and industry, and from the absolute necessity of situation. Our fathers have left our common schools, and a wholesome law, to perpetuate them in their high standing and purity; our colleges and churches, as lasting monuments of their moral and political excellence. In vain shall we look to other portions of the United States for similar and noble establishments. We would not boast of our principles, habits, and manners, and the amount of general information among the people, but we have a right to make these observations with some self-gratulation. Our fathers, or those of the present day, have not been republican in theory and aristocratic in practice. There has been a harmony in principle and practice, which has emanated from a long and practical observance of the natural rights of man, brought in subserviency to his most substantial good. We choose the dull and slow method of determining differences, wherein the dearest rights of the citizen are concerned, by established laws and legal forms, to the quick and capricious decision of the rifle. In sober and correct thinking, we have without doubt surpassed the south; but in genuine hospitality and cordial reciprocation of kindly feelings, we cannot claim any superiority. But the great and prominent events, which have in appearance divided the north from the south, will in some day be analyzed, and honour will be given to whom honour is due. Posterity will demand a severe investigation, and will not be silenced or satisfied by a few cant phrases and epithets. Some Hume or Robertson will rise up, and place before posterity the deeds of our fathers and our contemporaries, with their proper lights and shades, for the instruction of generations yet to come. The records of our time will afford ample and sufficient materials.

The great contest in our happy republic is for place and power. We cannot think that these can give so many joys, and the satisfactions of a brief hour upon the stage can have so many charms, that every fibre of mind and body should be exerted to attain them. The mind must reach to posterity, and anticipate the solid and lasting honours to be bestowed by after ages for good and upright conduct. Nero and Caligula, in their own time, had their respective eulogists, as well as Aurelius. Upon their characters, public opinion is fixed; the names of the two former have become epithets denoting the worst and most malignant combination of qualities that ever existed in the mind of man. Let not the fortunate aspirant from any section of our country, indulge the thought, that he shall pass on unnoticed by subsequent historians. They will tear off the mask of the hypocrite, and show the deformity and true lineaments of his face. Facts will be faithfully recorded and preserved, and will speak for themselves, when present interest, prejudice, and partiality, will be for ever buried. Perhaps such an historian of the events since the formation of our constitution, need not at present give the result of his labours to the public, since some, and even many, of the great actors are now alive, who took conspicuous parts in many important transactions; but he might with much propriety have in readiness a faithful narrative of all

CHAPTER VI.

RHODE ISLAND.

THE circumstances which originated the settlement of Providence and Rhode Island, have necessarily been recorded in the history of the Massachusetts colony. In the year 1634, Roger Williams being banished, for his too liberal opinions, or for his zeal important events from the close of the revolutionary war to the close of the administration of President Washington. This period will include a time of great labour and much and complicated difficulty; a period, the events of which, should be well studied, and completely understood, by every freeman of the United States. In this time, the French revolution which convulsed all Europe, and shook to its centre our republic, burst forth like a tempest, threatening general destruction. In this period, our own politicians were fruitful in conjectures as to the results of our own struggle, and the throbs and throes of France. We owe much, and perhaps our national existence, to the cool dispassionate judgment and unbending firmness of the distinguished individual then at the head of our nation. But most of his constitutional advisers, and others, who co-operated with him, in this time of peril, are forgotten; their labours are no longer mentioned with applause, nor a single pulse beats in lively gratitude for the services of the patriotic dead, nor is sincere respect shown for the living.

We boast not of our ancestry, but claim an origin equally respectable as that of any portion of our country. Our public schools and colleges, founded by our ancestors, are so many monuments of our moral and intellectual worth. These monuments we have preserved, beautified, strengthened, and adorned; they will last, and increase in grandeur and utility, till we, as a people, shall be completely changed.

The foregoing observations on the first settlement of our country, were communicated to me by a shrewd and deep thinking New England historian, and we believe will give the reader much information, and great pleasure, though he may not agree with him in all his reasoning.—American Editor.

* The spot where Mr. Williams and his companions landed, was within the jurisdiction of the Narraganset Indians.* The sachems of this tribe were Canonicus, and his nephew Miantinomo. The former was an old man, and he probably associated with him his young nephew, as better fitted to sustain the toils and cares of royalty. Their residence is said by Gookin to have been about Narraganset Bay, and on the island of Canonicus.

The first object of Mr. Williams would naturally be, to obtain from the sachems a grant of land for his new colony. He probably visited them, and received a verbal cession of the territory, which, two years afterwards, was formally conveyed to him by a deed. This instrument may properly be quoted here:†

“At Narraganset, the 24th of the first month, commonly called March, the second year of the plantation or planting at Moshassuck, or Providence; Memorandum, that we, Canonicus and Miantinomo, the two chief sachems of Narraganset, having two years since sold unto Roger Williams the lands and meadows upon the two fresh rivers, called Moshassuck and Wanasquatucket, do now, by these presents, establish and confirm the bounds of these lands, from the river and fields of Pawtucket, the great hill of Notaquoncanot, on the northwest, and the town of Mashapaug, on the west.‡

* “Under the general name of Narraganset, were included Narraganset proper, and Coweset. Narraganset proper extended south from what is now called Warwick, to the ocean; Coweset, from Narraganset northerly to the Nipmuck country, which now forms Oxford, (Mass.) and some other adjoining towns. The western boundaries of Narraganset and Coweset cannot be definitely ascertained. Gookin says, the Narraganset jurisdiction extended thirty or forty miles from Seekonk river and Narraganset Bay, including the islands, southwesterly to a place called Wekapage, four or five miles to the eastward of Pawcatuck river; that it included a part of Long Island, Block Island, Coweset, and Niantuck, and received tribute from some of the Nipmucks. After some research, I am induced to believe, that the Nianticks occupied the territory now called

He purchased the land of the Indians,* and, in acknowledgment of the kindness of Heaven in affording him a shelter from his perse-

ROGER WILLIAMS,
BENEDICT ARNOLD.”

The lands thus ceded to Mr. Williams he conveyed to twelve men, who accompanied, or soon joined him, reserving for himself an equal part only. Before we narrate the particulars of this transaction, a few remarks are necessary.

It appears from the tenor of the deed, and from other evidence, that the original sale included only the lands mentioned in the first part of the deed. These are said by the sachems to have been “sold” to Mr. Williams. The grass and meadows on Pawtuxet river are said to be given to him, in consideration of his services.

An interesting question, which occasioned much debate in the early times of the colony, claims consideration here. Were the lands, ceded by the sachems, so conveyed, that they became the property of Roger Williams himself, and might he, with justice and honour, have sold or retained them, as he pleased? An answer to this question will throw light on his subsequent conduct.

The conveyance in the deed is made to him alone. The title, consequently, was vested in him, so far as the instrument went. But this fact does not decide the point. It was a subject of accusation against him, that the conveyance was not made to him and his associates. Did he, then, act on behalf of others, as well as for himself?

If his own solemn and often repeated assertions are worthy of credit, he obtained the lands by his own money and influence, and might have held them as his property.

He argues the case at large, in his letter to the Commissioners, in 1677, to whom he was accused of unfair conduct respecting the lands.

He asserts, in the first place, “It is not true, that I was employed by any, was supplied by any, or desired any to come with me into these parts. My soul’s desire was, to do the natives good, and to that end to learn their language, (which I afterwards printed,) and therefore desired not to be troubled with English company.”

Westerly. If so, then the jurisdiction of the Narragansets extended to the Pawcatuck, and perhaps beyond it.”—Whitcheer, Notes, p. 176.

cutors, he called his new abode Providence. Acting in conformity with the wise and liberal principle he had avowed, and previously maintained, he allowed

He adds, that "out of pity, he gave leave to several persons to come along in his company." He makes the same statement in his deed of 1661:—"I desired it might be for a shelter for persons distressed for conscience. I then considering the condition of divers of my distressed countrymen, I communicated my said purchase unto my loving friends, [whom he names,] who then desired to take shelter here with me."

It seems, then, that his original design was to come alone, probably to dwell among the Indians, and do them good; but he altered his plan, and resolved to establish a refuge for those who might flee from persecution. The project was his own, and worthy of his generous and liberal mind. He certainly was not employed, as an agent to purchase lands for others. He uses another argument: "I mortgaged my house in Salem (worth some hundreds) for supplies to go through, and, therefore, was it a single business."

Having thus shown that he acted for himself, and on his own responsibility, he states, that the lands were procured from the sachems by his influence alone. He enumerates several advantages which he enjoyed in this negotiation: "1. A constant, zealous desire to dive into the natives' language. 2. God was pleased to give me a painful, patient spirit, to lodge with them in their filthy, smoky holes, (even while I lived at Plymouth and Salem,) to gain their tongue. 3. I spared no cost towards them, and in gifts to Ousamequin, yea, and all his, and to Canonicus, and all his, tokens and presents, many years before I came in person to the Narraganset, and when I came, I was welcome to Ousamequin, and to the old prince Canonicus, who was most shy of all English, to his last breath. 4. I was known by all the Wampanoags and the Narragansets to be a public speaker at Plymouth and Salem, and, therefore, with them, held as a sachem. 5. I could debate with them (in a great measure) in their own language. 6. I had the favour and countenance of that noble soul, Mr. Winthrop, whom all Indians respected."

He proceeds to state, respecting Canonicus, that "it was not thousands nor tens of thousands of money could have bought of him an English entrance into this bay."

In the deed, already quoted, he says, "By God's merciful assistance, I was the procurer of the purchase, not by moneys nor payment, the natives being so shy and jealous, that moneys could not do it, but by that language, acquaintance and favour with the natives, and other advantages, which it pleased God to give me; and also bore the charges and venture of all the gratuities, which I gave to the great sachems, and other sachems round about us, and lay engaged for a loving and peaceable neighbourhood with them, to my great charge and travel."

* See above. He adds, "It hath been told me, that I laboured for a licentious and contentious people; that I have foolishly parted with town and colony advantages, by which I might have preserved both town and colony in as good order as any in the country about us." The following letter from his son may be properly quoted here, as confirming the preceding statements:

"To all them that deem themselves purchasers in the town of Providence, if they be real purchasers, I would have them make it appear.

"Gentlemen,

"I thought good in short to present you with these few lines, concerning the bounds of Providence, &c. I have put forth several queries to several men in the township, to be answered; but have not any answer from any of them; and, as I judge, doth not care to have any discourse about it. Therefore, now I speak to you all, desiring your honours will be pleased to consider of the matter, and to answer me to one or two queries; that is, whether you have any thing under my father's hand to prove the bounds of this town afore those twelve men were concerned; or whether my father disposed of any of the township to any other persons since the twelve men were first in power, &c. If my father had disposed or sold his whole township, and they he sold it to, or have it under his hand, prove the sale, although it was but for one penny, God forbid that ever I should open my mouth about it, &c. It is evident, that this township was my father's, and it is held in his name against all unjust clamours, &c. Can you find such another now alive, or in this age?

entire freedom of conscience to all who came within his borders, and set the first practical example of the perfect equality of all religious sects in the same poli-

These facts prove, that the lands were granted to Mr. Williams, as a personal favour, as an expression of gratitude on the part of the sachems, and as a remuneration for presents which they had been receiving from him for several years. Mr. Williams, then, was entitled to make the assertion, which is contained in his touching letter to the town of Providence, in 1654: "I have been blamed for parting with Moshassuck, and afterwards Pawtuxet, (which were mine own, as truly as any man's coat upon his back,) without reserving to myself a foot of land, or an inch of voice, more than to my servants and strangers."

Mr. Williams was thus the legal proprietor of the lands which were ceded to him, and he might have remained so, if he had pleased. He had a clear title from the Indians, and he had, a few years later certainly, sufficient influence with the rulers in England, to obtain a recognition of his rights, and a confirmation of his authority. He might, doubtless, have been, like William Penn, the proprietary of his colony, and might have exercised a control over its government. He would, we may easily believe, have exercised his authority as wisely and beneficially as the great legislator of Pennsylvania. The peace of his settlement and his own comfort would, perhaps, have been promoted, if he had retained this power awhile, instead of committing it to the whole company of settlers, among whom, from the nature of the colony, as a refuge for "all sorts of consciences," some heterogeneous and discordant tempers might be expected to find admission. That he was blamed for this conduct, we know from his letter to the town of Providence, already quoted,* and as that letter was written soon after his return from England, we may infer, that the censure came from leading men there.

But he chose to found his colony on pure democratic principles; as a commonwealth, where all civil power should be exercised by the people alone, and where God should be the only ruler over the conscience.

We will now relate the facts respecting his division of the lands among his associates.

The persons who accompanied him, at his first landing, were William Harris, John Smith, Joshua Verin, Thomas Angell, and Francis Wickes. Several others joined him at various times, previously to October 8, 1638, on which day Mr. Williams executed an instrument, of the following tenor:†

"Providence, 8th of the 8th month, 1638, (so called.)

"Memorandum, that I, Roger Williams, having formerly purchased of Canonicus and Miantinomo, this our situation, or plantation, of New Providence,‡ viz. the two fresh rivers, Wanasquatucket and Moshassuck, and the grounds and meadows thereupon;

He gave away his lands and other estate, to them that he thought were most in want, until he gave away all, so that he had nothing to help himself, so that he being not in a way to get for his supply, and being ancient, it must needs pinch somewhere. I do not desire to say what I have done for both father and mother. I judge they wanted nothing that was convenient for ancient people, &c. What my father gave, I believe he had a good intent in it, and thought God would provide for his family. He never gave me but about three acres of land, and but a little afore he deceased. It looked hard, that out of so much at his disposing, that I should have so little, and he so little. For the rest, &c. I did not think to be so large: so referring your honours to those queries you have among you,

"Your friend and neighbour,

"DANIEL WILLIAMS.

"If a covetous man had that opportunity as he had, most of this town would have been his tenants, I believe. D. W."

† The first deed was "written in a strait of time and haste," as he alleged, and contained only the initials of the names of the grantees. He was censured for this by some of them, as if he had done it for some sinister design! They urged him to give them another deed, which of finally did, on the 22d of December, 1666, when the document in the text was written, retaining the original date.

Witness my hand,

On the 20th of December, 1661, the following deed was executed. It is inserted here, because it is an interesting document, and it throws much light on the transactions which we are considering.

“Be it known unto all men by these presents, that I, Roger Williams, of the town of Providence, in the Narraganset Bay, in New England, having, in the year one thousand six hundred thirty-four, and in the year one thousand six hundred thirty-five, had several treaties with Canonicus and Miantinomo, the two chief sachems of the Narraganset, and in the end purchased of them the lands and meadows upon the two fresh rivers called Moshassuck and Wanasquatucket, the two sachems having, by a deed, under their hands, two years after the sale thereof, established and confirmed the bounds of these lands from the rivers and fields of Pawtucket, the great hill of Notaquoncanot on the north-west, and the town of Mashapaug on the west, notwithstanding I had the frequent promise of Miantinomo, my kind friend, that it should not be land that I should want about these bounds mentioned, provided that I satisfied the Indians there inhabiting. I having made covenant of peaceable neighbourhood with all the sachems and natives round about us, and having, of a sense of God's merciful Providence unto me in my distress, called the place Providence, I desired it might be for a shelter for persons distressed for conscience. I then considering the condition of divers of my distressed countrymen, I communicated my said purchase unto my loving friends, John Throckmorton, William Arnold, William Harris, Stukely Westcott, John Greene, Senior, Thomas Olney, Senior, Richard Waterman, and others, who then desired to take shelter here with me, and in succession unto so many others as we should receive into the fellowship and society of enjoying and disposing of the said purchase; and besides the first that were admitted, our town records declare, that afterwards we received Chad Brown, William Field, Thomas Harris, Senior, William Wickenden, Robert Williams, Gregory Dexter, and others, as our town book declares; and whereas, by God's merciful assistance, I was the procurer of the purchase, not by moneys nor payment, the natives being so shy and jealous that moneys could not do it, but by that language, acquaintance, and favour with the natives, and other advantages, which it pleased God to give me, and also bore the charges and venture of all the gratuities, which I gave to the great sachems and other sachems and natives round about us, and lay engaged for a loving and peaceable neighbourhood with them, to my great charge and travel; it was therefore thought fit by some loving origin of the epithet New may have been, a desire to distinguish the town from the island of Providence, one of the Bahama islands, on which a plantation was begun in 1629. Holmes's Annals, vol. i. p. 201. This island has since received the name of New Providence. The town of Roger Williams was entitled to the precedence.

* This seems to be loosely expressed. Mr. Williams could not mean that he delivered the deed to the grantees in 1637, for several of the persons named did not arrive in Providence till after April, 1638. (Backus, vol. i. p. 92.) His own deed of cession is dated Oct. 8, 1638. He probably meant, that he delivered the deed, signed by the sachems in 1637, to friends, that I should receive some loving consideration and gratuity, and it was agreed between us, that every person, that should be admitted into the fellowship of enjoying land and disposing of the purchase, should pay thirty shillings unto the public stock; and first, about thirty pounds should be paid unto myself, by thirty shillings a person, as they were admitted; this sum I received, and in love to my friends, and with respect to a town and place of succour for the distressed, as aforesaid, I do acknowledge the said sum and payment as full satisfaction; and whereas in the year one thousand six hundred and thirty-seven,* so called, I delivered the deed subscribed by the two aforesaid chief sachems, so much thereof as concerneth the aforementioned lands, from myself and from my heirs, unto the whole number of the purchasers, with all my power, right and title therein, reserving only unto myself one single share equal unto any of the rest of that number; I now again, in a more formal way, under my hand and seal, confirm my former resignation of that deed of the lands aforesaid, and bind myself, my heirs, my executors, my administrators and assigns, never to molest any of the said persons already received, or hereafter to be received into the society of purchasers, as aforesaid; but that they, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, shall at all times quietly and peaceably enjoy the premises and every part thereof, and I do further by these presents bind myself, my heirs, my executors, my administrators and assigns, never to lay any claim, nor cause any claim to be laid, to any of the lands aforementioned, or unto any part or parcel thereof, more than unto my own single share, by virtue or pretence of any former bargain, sale or mortgage whatsoever, or jointures, thirds or entails made by me, the said Roger Williams, or of any other person, either for, by, through or under me. In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and seal, the twentieth day of December, in the present year one thousand six hundred sixty-one.

“WILLIAM FIELD, Assistant.

“Enrolled, April the 6th, 1662, pr. me,

“THOMAS OLNEY, Junr., Town Clerk.”

From this document, it appears, that the twelve person to whom the lands, on the Moshassuck and Wanasquatucket rivers, were conveyed by Mr. Williams, did not pay him any part of the thirty pounds, which he received; but that the sum of thirty shillings was exacted of every person who was afterwards admitted, to form a common stock. From this stock, thirty pounds were paid to Mr. Williams, for the reasons mentioned in the instrument last quoted.

For the lands on the Pawtuxet river, however, Mr. Williams received twelve-thirteenths of twenty pounds, from the twelve persons named in the deed of October 8, 1638. On the same day, the following instrument was executed:—

“It is agreed, this day abovesaid, that all the meadow grounds at Pawtuxet, bounding upon the fresh river, on both sides, are to be the purchasers. This deed was dated March 24, the last day of 1637, old style.

† An anchor, reclining.

‡ We are surprised at the form of this signature. That Mrs. Williams could not write, would be incredible, if it were not rendered certain that she could write, by a reference to her letters, in a public document at Providence. It is probable, that she wrote the initials, believing them to be sufficient; and some person added the words, the mark of, and wrote the name at length.

Two or three years after this, the antinomian con-impropriated unto those thirteen persons, being now incorporated together in our town of Providence, viz.: Ezekiel Holliman, Francis Weston, Roger Williams, Thomas Olney, Robert Cole, William Carpenter, William Harris, John Throckmorton, Richard Waterman, John Greene, Thomas James, William Arnold, Sukely Westcott; and to be equally divided among them, and every one to pay an equal proportion to raise up the sum of twenty pounds for the same; and if it shall come to pass, that some, or any one, of these thirteen persons aforesaid, do not pay or give satisfaction of his or their equal proportion of the aforesaid sum of twenty pounds, by this day eight weeks, which will be the 17th day of the 10th month next ensuing, then they or he shall leave their or his proportion of meadow grounds unto the rest of those thirteen persons, to be at their disposing, who shall make up the whole sum of twenty pounds, which is to be paid to Roger Williams."

This money was punctually paid on the 3d of December following, and was acknowledged as follows:—

"According to former agreement, I received of the neighbours abovesaid the full sum of 18*l.* 11*s.* 3*d.* Per me,

ROGER WILLIAMS."

He thus retained an equal share in the lands on the Pawtuxet river, which were very valuable to the new settlers, on account of the natural meadows along its banks. These lands were afterwards the occasion of a protracted contention.

From the facts which we have stated, it appears, that Mr. Williams generously admitted the first twelve proprietors of the Providence purchase to an equal share with himself, without exacting from them any remuneration. The thirty pounds which he received were paid by succeeding settlers, at the rate of thirty shillings each. But this sum of thirty pounds was not paid to him, as an equivalent for the land. It was, as he calls it, a "loving gratuity," and was intended to remunerate him for the presents which he had given to the Indians, and for the expenses which he had incurred in procuring the lands. But he affirmed, that all which he received was far less than he expended.* The same may be said respecting the money paid for the Pawtuxet lands.

The conduct of Mr. Williams, in these transactions, must be acknowledged to have been highly honourable, disinterested, and liberal. He held the title to the whole territory, and he might, apparently, have amassed wealth and gratified ambition, by retaining the control of the town, and selling the lands, to be held of him as the proprietor. But he renounced all plans of power and emolument; he placed himself on an equality with the other settlers, and surrendered the territory to the whole body of freemen, among whom he claimed no other influence than that which sprung from his personal character. The sum which he received was not even a remuneration for his actual expenses in procuring the territory.

It does not diminish this praise, that the settlers were obliged to satisfy the claims of many individual Indians. The grant from the sachems might, perhaps, have been considered as a full title; but the justice and humanity of Roger Williams and his friends, led them to make compensation to the natives who occupied the territory. The whole sum paid to Mr. Williams and to the Indians, for Providence and Pawtuxet, was stated by William Harris, in 1677, to have been one hundred and sixty pounds.—Knowles's Memoir of Roger Williams.

* "He died in April, 1683, at the age of eighty-four years. He seems in the early part of his residence in this country to have been governed in some respects by a blind zeal; but his memory is deserving of lasting honour for the correctness of his opinions respecting liberty of conscience, and for the generous toleration which he established. So superior was he to the meanness of revenge, and such was his magnanimity, that he exerted all his in-

* He found "Indian gifts" very costly. He was under the necessity of making frequent presents. He says, that he let the Indians have his shallop and pinnace at command, transporting fifty at a time, and lodging fifty at his house; that he never denied them any thing lawful; that when troversy, as it has been called, arose in Massachusetts, and Mrs. Hutchinson, Mr. Coddington, and others, were also banished from that colony.† These persons, with the assistance of Roger Williams, in fluence with the Indians in favour of Massachusetts, and ever evinced the greatest friendship for the colony from which he had been driven. For some of its principal men he preserved the highest affection, and maintained a correspondence with them. In his controversial writings, especially with Mr. Cotton respecting toleration, he shows himself a master of argument. His talents were of a superior order. In the religious doctrines which he embraced, he seems to have been remarkably consistent. The Scriptures he read in the originals. Though his writings and his conduct in the latter periods of his life evince that he was under the influence of the Christian spirit, yet his mind was so shrouded in doubt and uncertainty, that he lived in the neglect of the ordinances of the gospel. He did not contend, like the quakers, that they were superseded, but found himself incapable of determining to what church it was his duty to unite himself. He would pray and preach with all who would hear him, of whatever denomination. If his conscience had been enlightened, one would suppose, it must have reproved him for not partaking of the sacrament also with different sects. His first baptism he appears to have renounced, not so much because he was dissatisfied with the time or the mode of its administration, as because it was received in the church of England, which he deemed anti-christian. He published a Key to the Language of America, or, A Help to the Tongue of the New England Indians, 8vo. 1643, which has been lately reprinted in the collections of the Massachusetts Historical Society; An Answer to Mr. Cotton's Letter, concerning the Power of the Magistrate in matters of Religion; The Bloody Tenet of Persecution for the cause of Conscience, 1644; The Bloody Tenet yet more Bloody by Mr. Cotton's endeavour to wash it White in the Blood of the Lamb, &c., to which is added, A Letter to Mr. Endicott, 4to. 1652; The Hirling Ministry none of Christ's, or, A Discourse on the Propagation of the Gospel of Christ Jesus; Experiments of Spiritual Life and Health, and their Preservatives, London, 1652; George Fox digged out of his Burrows, 1676, which was written against Fox and Burrows, and gives an account of his dispute with the Quakers. An answer to it was published in 1678, entitled, A New England Fire-Brand Quenched. An interesting letter of Mr. Williams to Major Mason is preserved in the collections of the Historical Society."—Allen's Biography, p. 608, 609.

† "Lastly, Samuel Gorton, and his eleven followers, descending the Narraganset Bay on the west side, settled on Warwick Neck. This flourishing abode of heresy and toleration soon inflamed the religious or official zeal of Governor Winthrop, and a Captain Cook, with an armed party of treble Gorton's number, was despatched with strict orders to bring the heretics to Boston, dead or alive. At the head of this crusade in miniature, marched a holy man, with strict injunctions to keep his soldiers regularly to their prayers, and to explain to Gorton and his deluded followers the whole enormity of their errors before they put them to death. What these errors were, it is immaterial to relate; suffice it to say, they had reference to the most abstruse and speculative doctrines, and were wholly immaterial to christian piety and a good life. Gorton persisted sturdily in the argument against the nuncio of Winthrop, and thinking he had the best of it, refused to acknowledge himself convinced. Cook accordingly gave the word for the onset, and they were made prisoners, and conveyed to Boston. The women and children were dispersed in the woods, and as it was at a time when the ground was covered with snow, several of them actually perished. The rest of these helpless fugitives, after sustaining incredible hardships, were protected, clothed, and hospitably entertained—by savages."—Johnson's Life of Greene. "Being brought before the court at Boston, the charge exhibited against them was in the following words:—'Upon much examination, and serious he established a trading house at Narraganset, Canonius had freely what he desired; and when the old chief was about to die, he sent for Mr. Williams, and "desired to be buried in my cloth, of free gift."

March, 1638, purchased of the Indians, the island of Aquetnee, since called Rhode Island. The settlers at Providence and Rhode Island, were, at first, distinct communities, and had separate governments. Both formed civil compacts for themselves. The inhabitants of Providence, and "all new comers," at first promised "to submit themselves in active and passive obedience to all such orders and agreements as should be made for the public good of the body, in an orderly way, by major consent of the inhabitants." At Rhode Island, the settlers, to the number of eighteen, subscribed to the following civil compact: "We, whose names are underwritten, do hereby solemnly, in the presence of Jehovah, incorporate ourselves into a body politic; and as he shall help, will submit our persons, lives, and estates, unto our Lord Jesus Christ, the King of kings and Lord of lords, and to all those perfect and absolute laws of his, given in his holy word of truth, to be judged and guided thereby." In 1640, being about forty in number, they combined in a plan of government, as best suited to promote peace and order in their circumstances. William Coddington, was chosen a judge, to do justice and judgment, and to preserve the peace. In March, 1641, at a general court of election, it was unanimously declared, that the government was a democracy, or popular government, and that the power was in the body of the freemen, orderly assembled, or the major part of them, to make or constitute just laws, by which they should be regulated, and to depute from among them such ministers as should see them faithfully executed. It was at the same time ordered, that none should be accounted delinquent for doctrine, provided it be not directly repugnant to the established government and laws.*

When the New England colonies, in 1643, formed the celebrated confederacy, Rhode Island applied to be admitted into the union. Plymouth objected, on the ground that the settlements were within her boundaries. The commissioners decided that Rhode Island might enjoy all the advantages of the confede-consideration of your writings, with your answers about them, we do charge you to be a blasphemous enemy of the true religion of our Lord Jesus Christ and his holy ordinances, and also of civil authority among the people of God, and particularly in this jurisdiction. Their writings were produced in evidence against them; and they explained them in such a manner, that the governor, Mr. Winthrop, said he could agree with them in their answer, though he could not in their writings; but Mr. Dudley stood up, much moved, and said he would never consent to it while he lived, that they were one with them in those answers. The governor then asked Gorton what faith was? He answered, in the words of the apostle, that "faith is the substance of things hoped for, and the evidence of things not seen;" the governor told him that was true, but he could say more of faith than that. He desired to be excused, and Mr. Bradstreet, prudently enough, excepted to such questions, unless he was free to speak to them; and thereupon they racy, if she would submit to the jurisdiction of Plymouth; this she resolutely declined, proudly preferring independence to all the benefits of dependent union.

In the year 1644, Roger Williams was deputed to England to obtain of the commissioners of plantations, appointed by Parliament, a new charter. These commissioners granted to the inhabitants of the towns of Providence, Portsmouth, and Newport, residing in a tract of country, called by the name of Narraganset Bay, bordering northward and north-east on the patent of the Massachusetts, east and south-east on Plymouth patent, south on the ocean, and west and north-west on the country of the Indians, called Narragansets, the whole tract extending about twenty-five English miles unto the Pequod river and country, "a free and absolute charter of incorporation, to be known by the name of the Incorporation of Providence plantations in the Narragansets Bay, in New England, with full power and authority to rule themselves, and such others as shall inhabit in any part of the said tract of land, by such a form of civil government, as by voluntary consent of all, or the greater part of them, they shall find most suitable to their estate and condition; and for that end, to make and ordain such civil laws and constitutions, and to inflict such punishments upon transgressors; and for the execution thereof, so to place and displace officers of justice, as they, or the greatest part of them, should, by free consent, agree thereto;" with a proviso, that the laws, constitutions, and punishments, for the civil government of the plantation, be conformable to the laws of England, so far as the nature and constitution of the place would admit. A court of commissioners, consisting of six persons from each of the towns, was invested with legislative authority, but all acts passed by these commissioners were subject to be repealed by a majority of the freemen assembled in town meetings called for that purpose. A president and four assistants were chosen annually, to be conservators of the peace, with civil powers, and by special commission they were judges of the courts, assisted by were dismissed and remanded to prison. Their sentences were cruel. Gorton was ordered to be confined to Charles-town, there to be kept at work, and to wear such bolts and irons as might hinder his escape; and if he broke his confinement, or by speech or writing published or maintained any of the blasphemous abominable heresies wherewith he had been charged by the general court, or should reproach or reprove the churches of our Lord Jesus Christ in these united colonies, or the civil government, &c., that upon conviction thereof, upon trial by jury, he should suffer death. The rest were confined to different towns, one in a town, and upon the same conditions with Gorton; their cattle were seized and ordered to be sold, and the charge of fetching them, and the expense attending the trial and imprisonment, to be paid out of the proceeds and the overplus to be reserved for their future maintenance during their confinement."—Hutchinson, vol. i. p. 120—122

two wardens or justices of the peace in the towns in which the courts were held. Each town elected a council of six persons to manage their own affairs. This council was also a town court, for the trial of causes of inferior magnitude, with a right of appeal to the court of president and assistants. This form of government continued, with little interruption, until a charter was obtained from Charles II. in 1663.

The town of Newport was situated on one of the best harbours in America, and its inhabitants soon engaged in commerce. Their commercial transactions were deemed of so much importance in 1647, as to require laws suited to commercial men and seamen. At this early period, therefore, it was ordered at the court of election, "that the sea laws, otherwise called the laws of Oleron, should be in force among us, for the benefit of seamen, (upon the island,) and the chief officers in the town should have power to summon the court for the case or cases prescribed.*

Upon the application of the inhabitants, in 1663, Charles II. granted a charter to Rhode Island and Providence plantations. The supreme or legislative power was to be exercised by an assembly, which was to consist of the governor, of ten assistants, and of representatives from the several towns, all to be chosen by the freemen. The first meeting of the general assembly, under the new charter, was on the 1st of March, when the government was organized. Among a great variety of ordinances which were enacted by the legislature of this colony, one was for declaring the privileges of his majesty's subjects. It enacted, "that no freeman shall be imprisoned, or deprived of his freehold, or condemned, but by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the colony; that no tax shall be imposed or required of the colonists, but by the act of the general assembly; that all men of competent estates, and of civil conversation, (Roman Catholics only excepted,)[†] shall be admitted freemen, or may choose or be chosen colonial officers." In 1665, the general assembly enacted a law, authorizing the seizure of the estates of quakers, who refused to bear arms in defence of the colony; but being generally condemned by the people, it was never carried into execution.

The commissioners sent by Charles II. to inspect the affairs of the New England colonies, were received at Rhode Island with more deference than in the neighbouring colony of Massachusetts, arising, probably, partly from their religious sentiments, and partly from a sense of their comparative want of strength to cope with royal power. Their conduct received the warmest approbation of their monarch; and he assured them, that he should never be unmindful of their dutiful behaviour, which, he observed, was set off with the more lustre by the contrary deportment of Massachusetts, as if, by its refractoriness, it had designed to recommend and heighten their merits.‡ The general strain of the government of Rhode Island and Providence was conciliatory, though independent, and seems to have given satisfaction to Charles II. during the remainder of his reign.

On the accession of James II. to the British crown, the assembly of Rhode Island immediately transmitted an address, acknowledging themselves his loyal subjects, professing obedience to his power, and begging protection for their chartered rights. Their supplications, however, could not protect them from the effects of those plans of reformation for New England which were now resolved on. Articles of high misdemeanour were exhibited against them before the lords of the committee of colonies, accusing them of breaches of their charter, and of opposition to the acts of navigation. These charges were referred, in July, 1685, to Sawyer, attorney-general, with orders forthwith to issue a writ of quo warranto against their patent; and formal notice of the legal process was soon afterwards communicated to the governor and company. But, without much hesitation, they resolved that they would not stand suit with their king. It was ordered by the committee of colonies, that Sir Edmund Andros, the governor of Massachusetts, should demand the surrender of their charter, and govern them as other colonies of New England, the king assuring them of his protection, and of his determination to extend no other rule of administration over them, than over the neighbouring plantations. In December, 1686, Andros, agreeably to his orders, dissolved the government of Rhode Island, broke its seal, admitted five of its inhabitants into his legislative council, and assumed the administration in

† "The authenticity of the clause, 'Roman Catholics only excepted,' has been disputed; and strictures have been made upon Chalmers, as maintaining 'that the toleration of Roger Williams did not extend to Roman Catholics,' and upon the author of American Annals, as having 'repeated this charge.' That clause was an integral part of the ordinance, as recited by Chalmers, and the omission of it would have been censurable. It has since been affirmed, on very respectable authority, that the act in question is not to be found in the records of Rhode Island. In copying the ordinance, the supposed implication of Mr. Williams was not adverted to; it was merely a transcript of an article in our history. Whatever may have been the legislation of 1664, Roger Williams has a just claim to the honour of establishing, at the foundation of his colony, 'a free, full, and absolute liberty of conscience.'"—American Annals, vol. i. p. 336, 337.

the place of that which he had thus annihilated. When the revolution put an end to his power, Rhode Island and Providence resumed their charter, on the ground that an act which was extorted by terror might be justly recalled when restraint no longer remained. All the officers who had been displaced three years before were now restored.

The benevolence, justice, and pacific policy of Williams, secured to the colony an almost total exemption from Indian hostility. Its prosperity was proportionate to these favourable circumstances, and the population rapidly increased; in 1730, the number of inhabitants was 18,000; and in 1761, it had augmented to 40,000.

Brown University was founded at Warren, in 1764. On the petition of a number of respectable persons, a charter for founding a seminary of learning was granted by the general assembly of the colony; the incorporation took place in the name of the "trustees, or fellows of the College or University in the English colony of Rhode Island and Providence plantations." The president must be a Baptist, but professors and other officers of instruction are not limited to any denomination of Christians. The charter, in the spirit of the other institutions of that colony, declares, "All the members of this institution shall forever enjoy full, free, absolute, and uninterrupted liberty of conscience; and the places of professors, tutors, and all other officers, the president excepted, shall be free and open for all denominations of protestants." In 1770, the college was removed to Providence, where, by the generous donation of individuals, principally of the town of Providence, a large and elegant building was erected for the accommodation of the students.

CHAPTER VII.

NEW YORK.

THE history of the middle ages renders it very apparent that many of the ideas which were entertained by the governments of Europe on the subject of title to property, both private and national, have been very incorrect. This was especially the case with respect to the claim to proprietorship, supposed to be conferred by discovery, a doctrine which gave rise to many, by no means bloodless, disputes. Had the simple idea of priority of occupation been deemed the just ground of national or individual claims to colonial possessions, little difficulty would have arisen, though it would have been subversive of many of the lofty imaginations of regal or aristocratic ambition.

This principle would have been just to the natives, who, as far as their occupancy extended, were the only parties who could convey a just title to the newcomers to the American continent. What would have been the indignation of British pride, had some adventurous Indian sachem discovered, and granted to his faithful followers, some of the extensive and thinly inhabited wastes which Britain exhibited in the reigns of James or Charles? Yet, what other title could Charles urge to the territories of the brave king Philip, that the latter could not, had he visited the coast of England, have retorted on the former?

The absurdity of the principle of a legitimate title being conferred by discovery only, was nowhere more clearly evinced, than in the transactions of the colony of New York. In 1609, Henry Hudson, an Englishman employed by the East India Company of Holland, set sail from the Texel for the discovery of a north-west passage to India. Not succeeding in the object of his voyage, he entered the bay of Chesapeake, where he found the infant settlement of the English. He afterwards proceeded to Long Island, and sailed up the river Manhattan, on whose banks the chief fruits of his enterprise were destined to grow. It has been affirmed, that he sold his right to this territory to the Dutch; but the assertion is as unsupported by proof as it is improbable; he could convey to them no right which the voyage did not vest, by a much better title, in themselves. Several voyages were afterwards made from Holland to the river Manhattan, which subsequently received the name of the able navigator, by whom it had been introduced to the acquaintance of the Dutch. The favourable report of Hudson having been confirmed by other voyagers, a body of Dutch merchants embraced the resolution of establishing a trading settlement; and the States-General promoted the enterprise by granting them a patent for the exclusive trade of Hudson's river. They erected a fort near Albany, which they named Fort Orange, and a few trading-houses on the island of New York, then called by the Indians, Manhattan.

If the Dutch settlers made proper arrangements with the natives, they had certainly now a right to be considered as the legitimate occupiers of the soil; and no other European nation was entitled to dispute their possession. The British monarch, however, was of a different opinion, as were his representatives in America—pretending to found their claim on the discovery of the Cabots in the previous century, a claim which has found an advocate in so sensible a writer as Chalmers; and the title of the Hollanders is denied, because "the sovereign of France in 1603, and the king of England, in 1606, had declared their intention to appropriate the same region, which their subjects immediately planted."* Why the intention of the French or English was a better title than the occupation of the Dutch, or what definition is to be allotted to the term region, when no European had a settlement within one hundred miles of the Dutch, Mr. Chalmers has left his readers to guess; and if they exercise their rational faculties correctly, they will be far from countenancing his opinion.

It was not long before the Dutch experienced the injurious effects of the unjust principle to which we have alluded. In the very first year of their settlement, Captain Argal, who had proceeded from Virginia to drive the French from their settlements on the bay of Fundy, visited, on his return, the Dutch on Hudson's river. Claiming the country for his sovereign, he demanded their acknowledgment of his authority; and being few in number, they prudently submitted, without attempting to resist. In the year following, however, a new governor having arrived at the fort with an additional complement of settlers, the claim of the English to the stipulated dependence was forthwith defied, and the payment of tribute imposed by Argal resisted. For the better protection of their independence, the colonists now erected another fort on the south-west point of Long Island. They continued for a series of years, in unmolested tranquillity, to mature their settlement, enlarge their numbers, and by the exercise of their national virtues of patience and industry, to subdue the first difficulties and hardships of an infant colony.

In 1621, the Dutch republic, desirous of establishing a colony in America on a firm basis, granted to the Dutch West India Company, an extensive territory on both sides of the Hudson, and entitled it New Netherlands. The boundaries were not accurately defined, but were considered by the company as including Connecticut river at the north, and Delaware river at the south. Under the management of this company, the settlement was soon both consolidated and extended. The city of New Amsterdam, afterwards called New York, was built on York Island, then known by the name of Manhattan; and at the distance of a hundred and fifty miles higher up the Hudson, were laid the foundations of the city of Albany. In 1623, they erected a fort on the Delaware, which they called Nassau; and ten years afterwards another on the Connecticut, which they called Good Hope. Near the former, the Swedes had a settlement; and from the interfering claims of the two nations, quarrels arose between the settlers, which, in a few years, terminated in the subjugation of the Swedes.†

* Annals, p. 568.

† New Netherland, born republican, might have been nurtured in free principles, made the healthy and vigorous representative of the parent republic, and the depository for transmission to posterity of that liberty which was to expire at home. The infant colony, might, at least, have been saved from the contamination which rendered profession a mockery in practice. The West Indian Company were amply remunerated for all expenses and care which they bestowed; and if magnanimity in policy had prevailed over the unstatesman-like maxims of gain and loss, they might have added to their renown, the celebrity of founding the first republic in the new world. But actuated by different views, and calculating the progressive profits of trade only, they now determined, if we may judge from the amount of their last transshipment, to carry to a fuller extent the commercial strength and spirit of the colony.

Since their brilliant commencement, they suffered within the last two years reverses and misfortunes from the pirates, the Dunkirk free-booters, and the public enemy. But in 1627, the capture of thirty of the enemy's ships, under the batteries of St. Salvador, by Admiral Peter Pietersen Heyn, after an unequal conflict on his part, in which skill was seconded by the most obstinate heroism, gave renewed vigour to the company. These prizes were richly laden with sugar, tobacco, cotton, and some gold and silver.

Sugar, linens, cloths, and stuffs of various fabric, formed a part of the imports into New Netherland. Its trade was with the natives, who, as far as from Quebec and Tadousac, brought furs to Fort Orange. But to this chief mart of the province, the five nations introduced the greatest supplies. Fort Amsterdam was still the head-quarters, where ships rendezvoused, and whence smaller vessels coasted the country from New-port-May to the Flat Corner, (De Vlack-hoeck; the Dutch name for Cape Malabar.) But the above mentioned articles were unnecessary in the fur-trade, excepting cloth of a dark colour, suitable to the melancholy temperament of the Indians, who rejected fabrics in which the least whiteness in their texture was discoverable. Cloth of this description, hoes, hatchets, awls, beads, and other trinkets, looking glasses, Dutch trumpeys in which the natives delighted, fire-arms, which originated a mischievous traffic with the Mohawks, were the articles for the Indian trade. The circulating medium was seawan.* This was manufactured particularly by the Indians of Searwan-hacky, (Long

* Seawan was the name of Indian money, of which there were two kinds; wompam (which signifies white) and suckauhook, (sucki signifying black.) Wompam or wompampeague, or simply peague, was, though improperly, also understood among the Dutch and English, as expressive of the generic denomination. Wompam, or white money, was made of the stem or stock of the meteahook or periwinkle: suckauhook, or black money, was manufactured from the inside of the shell of the quahaug, (venus mercenaria), a round thick shell-fish, that buried itself but a little way in the sand, and was generally found lying on it in deep water, and gathered by rakes, or by diving after it. The Indians broke off about half an inch of a purple colour of the inside, and converted it into beads. These, before the introduction of awls and thread, were bored with sharp stones, and strung upon sinews of beasts, and when interwoven to the breadth of the hand, more or less, were called a belt of seawan or wom-

pam. A black bead, the size of a straw, about one third of an inch long bored longitudinally, and well polished, was the gold of the Indians, and always esteemed of twice the value of the white; but either species was considered by them of much more value than European coin. An Indian chief, to whom the value of a six-dollar was explained by the first clergyman of Renselaerwyck, laughed exceedingly to think the Dutch set so high a price upon a piece of iron, as he termed it. Three beads of black, and six of white, were equivalent, among the English, to a penny, and among the Dutch, to a stuyver. But with the latter, the equivalent number sometimes varied from three and six, to four and eight. One of Governor Minuit's successors fixed, by placard, the price of the "good splendid seawan of Manhattan," at four for a stuyver. A string of this money, one fathom long, varied in price from five shillings, among the New Englanders. (after the Dutch gave them a knowledge of it,) to four guilders.

Island,) and of this, as well as the first mentioned articles, the New Netherlanders had on hand a surplus quantity. It is obvious, therefore, that for the purpose of vending these wares, a favourite policy of Governor Minuit was to ascertain a new market. His trading vessels had visited Anchor-bay and Sloop-bay, situate on each side of Red-Island, (Roode Eylandt, corrupted into Rhode Island,) ascended the river, (Taunton), flowing into the bay of Nassau, (Narragansett), and trafficked at Sawaans or Puckanokick, where Massasowaw, the friend of the Plymouth people, held dominion. From him and other Indians the latter had often heard of the Dutch, and from the same source the Dutch had no doubt received intelligence of the English. But during the six years which had elapsed since the settlement of Plymouth, there had not been the least intercourse with New Netherland. This negative relation would have continued, if the commercial policy which has been suggested, had not now induced Governor Minuit to seek out New Plymouth, as the market which was most convenient to intercourse, most congenial in temper and circumstances, and, therefore, preferable to Virginia or Canada, for the purpose of establishing a treaty of commerce and amity. The people of Plymouth had a trading house at Manomet, (north side of Cape Cod,) but, comparatively unambitious, their commerce, fortifications, and strength of men, were, as was acknowledged by them, far inferior to those of New Netherland. Confined in their operations to the vicinity of the barren and lonely spot on which they had been cast, their little trade was indispensable, and they were aggrieved that the Dutch had encroached upon this trade, almost to their very doors. Having no transatlantic commerce, they, this year, (1627,) sent an agent to England and Holland, to make arrangements for such supplies as their wants or commerce demanded.

Such was the relative situation of the two colonies, when in March, Governor Minuit caused a deputation to the Governor and Council of Plymouth, with two letters, written in Dutch and French, dated at "Manhataas, in Fort Amsterdam, March 9th, 1627," (N. S.) signed "Isaac de Razier, Secretary." The Dutch governor and council congratulated the people of Plymouth on the success of their praise-worthy undertaking, proffered their "good will and service in all friendly correspondency and good neighbourhood," invited a reciprocity of amicable feeling, suggested for this purpose, among other things, "the propinquity of their native countries, and their long continued friendship"—and concluded by desiring "to fall into a way of some commerce and trade"—offering "any of their goods that might be serviceable," and declaring that they should feel themselves bound to accommodate and help "their Plymouth neighbours with any wares that they should be pleased to deal for."*

The answer of Governor Bradford and Council was as follows:—

(one dollar sixty-six and a half cents,) among the Dutch. The process of trade was this: the Dutch and English sold for seawan, their knives, combs, scissors, needles, awls, looking-glasses, hatchets, hoes, guns, black cloth, and other articles of the Indian traffic, and with the seawan bought the furs, corn, and venison, from the Indians on the seaboard, who also, with their shell money, bought such articles from Indians residing in the interior of the country. Thus by this circulating medium, a brisk commerce was carried on, not only between the white people and the Indians, but between different tribes among the latter. For the seawan was not only their money, but it was an ornament to their persons. It distinguished the rich from the poor, the proud from the humble. It was the tribute paid by the vanquished to those, the five nations for instance, who had exacted contribution. In the form of a belt, it was sent with all public messages, and preserved as a record of all public transactions between nations. If a message was sent without the belt, it was considered an empty word, unworthy of remembrance. If the belt was returned, it was a rejection of the offer or proffer accompanying it. If accepted, it was a confirmation, and strengthened friendships or effaced injuries. The belt, with appropriate figures worked in it, was also the record of

"To the Honourable and Worshipful the Director and Council of New Netherland, our very loving and worthy friends and Christian neighbours.

"The Governor and Council of Plymouth, in New England, wish your Honours and Worships all happiness and prosperity in this life, and eternal rest and glory with Christ Jesus our Lord, in the world to come.

"We have received your letters wherein appeareth your good will and friendship towards us, but is expressed with over high titles, and more than belongs to us, or than is meet for us to receive: but for your good will and congratulation of our prosperity in this small beginning of our poor colony, we are much bound unto you, and with many thanks do acknowledge the same, taking it both for a great honour done unto us, and for a certain testimony of your love and good neighbourhood. Now these are further to give your Honours, Worships, and Wisdoms, to understand, that it is to us no small joy to hear, that it hath pleased God to move his Majesty's heart, not only to confirm that ancient amity, alliance, and friendship, and other contracts formerly made and ratified by his predecessors of famous memory, but hath himself, (as you say,) and we likewise have been informed, strengthened the same with a new union, the better to resist the pride of that common enemy, the Spaniards, from whose cruelty the Lord keep us both, and our native countries. Now for as much as this is sufficient to unite us together in love and good neighbourhood in all our dealings, yet are many of us further tied by the good and courteous entreaty which we have found in your country, having lived there many years with freedom and good content, as many of our friends do to this day, for which we are bound to be thankful, and our children after us, and shall never forget the same, but shall heartily desire your good and prosperity as our own for ever. Likewise, for your friendly proposition and offer to accommodate and help us with any commodities or merchandise which you have, and we want, either for beaver, otters, or other wares, is to us very acceptable, and we doubt not but in short time we may have profitable commerce and trade together. But you may please to understand that we are but one particular colony or plantation in this land, there being divers others besides, unto whom it hath pleased those Honourable Lords of his Majesty's Council for New England, to grant the like commission, and ample privileges to them, (as to us,) for their better profit and subsistence, namely, to expulse or make prize of any, either strangers or other English, which shall attempt either to trade or plant within their limits, (without their special license and commission,) which extends to forty degrees: yet, for our parts, we shall not go about to molest or trouble you in any thing, but continue all good neighbourhood and correspondence as far as we may; only we desire that you would forbear to trade with the natives in this bay, and the river of Narragansett and Sowames, domestic transactions. The confederation of the five nations was thus recorded. The cockle shells had indeed more virtue amongst Indians, than pearls, gold, and silver, had among Europeans. Seawan was the seal of a contract—the oath of fidelity. It satisfied murders and all other injuries, purchased peace, and entered into the religious as well as civil ceremonies of the natives. A string of seawan was delivered by the orator in public council, at the close of every distinct proposition made to others, as a ratification of the truth and sincerity of what he said; and the white and black strings of seawan were tied by the pagan priest around the neck of the white dog suspended to a pole, and offered as a sacrifice to T'hahlonghyawaagon, the upholder of the skies, the god of the five nations.

"May it please you further to understand, that for this year we are fully supplied with all necessaries, both for clothing and other things; but it may so fall out, that hereafter we shall deal with you, if your rates be reasonable: and therefore, when your people come again, we desire to know how you will take beaver by the pound, and otters by the skin, and how you will deal per cent. for other commodities, and what you can furnish us with; as likewise what commodities from us may be acceptable to you, as tobacco, fish, corn, or other things, and what prices you will give.

"Thus hoping that you will pardon and excuse us for our rude and imperfect writing in your language, and take it in good part, because, for want of use, we cannot so well express that we understand, nor happily understand every thing so fully as we should: and so we humbly pray the Lord, for his mercy's sake, that he will take both us and our native countries, into his holy protection and defence. Amen.

"By the Governor and Council, your Honours' and Worships' very good friends and neighbours."

In August, Governor Minuit and council sent another deputy, and in reply, insisted upon their right to trade to the places which Governor Bradford and council had interdicted, that, "as the English claimed authority under the King of England, so we, the Dutch, derive ours from the states of Holland, and will defend it." The letter was in other respects very friendly, and, as if to preclude any interruption to the harmony of their projected intercourse, the messenger was charged with a present of "a rundlet of sugar and two Holland cheeses," for which many thanks were returned in the answer by Governor Bradford: he also requested that a deputy might be sent to confer respecting their future trade and commerce, and with the most friendly zeal cautioned the Dutch to avoid the Virginia ships or fishing vessels, which might make prize of them, as they had a few years previously, of a French colony that had intruded within their limits; apprised them of the patents of Queen Elizabeth, and advised them to solicit the States General, to negotiate with England for an amicable understanding upon the subject. Governor Bradford communicated copies of the correspondence to the council for New England, and to Sir Ferdinando Gorges, requesting advice. But now, as if apprehensive lest the contemplated intimacy with the New Netherlanders, might give plausibility to their local pretensions, he wrote again to Governor Minuit in October, that he should suspend a decision on the question of trade, till the Plymouth agent should return from England and Holland, Bradford:—"If any tax me for wasting paper with recording these small matters, such may consider, that small things in the beginning of natural or politic bodies, are as remarkable as greater, in bodies full grown." † Addressed to "Monsieur Monseigneur, William Bradford, governor in Nieu Plemeuen.

"After the wishing of all good unto you, this serves to let you understand that we have received your (acceptable) letters, dated the 14th of last month, by John Jacobson of Wiring, who besides, by word of mouth, hath reported unto us your kind and friendly entertainment of him: for which cause (by the good liking and approbation of the director and council) I am resolved to come myself in friendship to visit you, that we may by word of mouth friendly communicate of things together; as also to report unto you the good will and favour that the Honourable Lords of the authorized West Indian Company bear towards you; and to show our willingness of your good accommodation, have brought with me some cloth of three sorts and colours, and a chest of white sugar, as also some

English colonists extended their settlements beyond the boundaries of Massachusetts into the territory of Connecticut. He was succeeded in the following year by William Kieft, a man more fitted to encounter whither he had been sent to make arrangements, before it was ascertained that supplies could be obtained from the Dutch. He again advised them to adjust their title to a settlement "in these parts," lest in these "stirring evil times," it should become a source of contention.

But before the reception of the last letter, Secretary Razier, actuated by the prior communication of Governor Bradford, resolved, with the approbation of the Governor and Council, to be himself the bearer of an embassy to Plymouth. In the bark Nassau, freighted with a few articles for traffic, manned with a retinue of soldiers and trumpeters, conformable to the fashion of the day, and proportional to the dignity of his station, this second officer of the government, departed on an embassy, which was as important in the primitive affairs of New Netherland and New Plymouth, as any of the magnificent embassies of the old world were to full-grown kingdoms.*

The reader's fancy will follow the bark through the east river, (Oost rivier, called also Helle Gadt rivier.) into the great bay of the island of shells, (Long Island Sound,) and as it boldly swept over the bay, or cautiously glided along its shores, skirted by thousands of wigwams, he will picture the wild and joyful gesticulations of the Indians, as they gazed upon the fantastic arrangements of the little vessel, or listened to the deep notes of the trumpeters.

Arrived in safety at Manomet, (north side of Cape Cod,) the secretary despatched to Governor Bradford a letter,† announcing his arrival, specifying the articles that comprised his cargo, and requesting some mode of conveyance to Plymouth. His request was granted. A boat was sent to Manonscusset, (on the south side of Cape Cod,) and Razier, "honourably attended by noise of trumpeters," was ushered into fort Plymouth. Here he was kindly entertained several days. The meeting was not merely one of commercial speculation and heartless formality. It was the first meeting, in the solitude of the new world, of the friendly colonists of two allied European nations. It was the joyful meeting of kindred as well as friends, for the wives and little ones of some of the pilgrims had also their birth-place in Holland. Though the rigid simplicity of puritan costume and manners, the simple salutation, for instance, of goodman and goody, were in direct opposition to the high-sounding titles, formal stateliness, and warlike decorations of the Dutch, yet the very spirit of amity consecrated the intercourse upon this novel occasion.

When the Dutch departed, they were accompanied to Manomet by the Plymouth people, by whom articles of their merchandise were purchased, particularly the seaweed, which was then introduced into New England, and became the medium of profitable trade with the Eastern Indians.‡ Such was the harmony of the first communication between the two colonies, that the Dutch offered seaweed, &c. not doubting but, if any of them may be serviceable unto you, we shall agree well enough about the prices thereof. Also, John Jacobson aforesaid, hath told me that he came to you over land in six hours, but I have not gone so far this three or four years, wherefore I fear my feet will fail me; so I am constrained to entreat you to afford me the easiest means, that I may, with least weariness, come to congratulate with you: so leaving other things to the report of the bearer, shall here-with end; remembering my hearty salutations to yourself and friends, &c. From aboard the bark Nassau, the 4th of October, 1627, before Frenchman's point.

"Your affectionate friend, ISAAC DE RAZIER."

‡ Dr. Chalmers (Political Annals) says that Razier brought peltry and purchased corn. Hence it is inferred the Dutch had made little progress in agriculture. The conclusion is true, though the premises are not. It is doubtful whether Plymouth raised corn enough for domestic consumption. "But whatever were the honey in the mouth of that beast of trade, there was a deadly sting in the tail. For it is said they first brought our people to the knowledge of wampampeag; and the acquaintance therewith occasioned the Indians of these parts to learn the skill to make it, by which, as by the exchange of money, they purchased store of artillery, both from the English, Dutch, and French, which hath proved a fatal bu-with spirit, than to stem with prudence, the troubles which now began to assail the possessions of the Dutch. Numberless causes of dispute were continually occurring between New Netherlands and the colonies of Connecticut and New Haven. The English charged the Dutch with disturbing, kidnapping, and plundering their traders; with enticing servants to rob and desert their masters; and with selling arms and ammunition to the natives. Yet, notwithstanding their mutual disagreements, the Dutch and English colonists never suffered themselves to forget entirely either the forms of courtesy, or the more substantial rights of humanity; and when, their assistance against the French, if needed; urged their friends to abandon the barren spot on which fate had cast them, and remove to the fertile banks of the Fresh River, (Versche Rivier—the Connecticut.) The adoption of this advice might have perpetuated their good feeling, which, though afterwards supplanted by contention and bitterness, was for years the foundation of repeated intercourse and profitable commerce. The Dutch frequently went to Manomet, exchanged their linens and stuffs for tobacco, which trade was extremely advantageous to the people of Plymouth, until the Virginians found out the Dutch colony, and drove them from this market by underselling them in tobacco.

The West Indian Company also enjoyed immediately the salutary fruits of this commercial interchange, for the year after it commenced, (viz. 1628,) Governor Minuit, without the necessity of any fresh imports that year, exported to the Amsterdam department more furs than at any other prior period.

The earnestness of Governor Bradford and his council, in advising the Dutch to clear up their right to settle in the land, evinces the light in which the former viewed that right, and their ignorance of any previous remonstrance upon the subject. It has, however, been affirmed that Sir Ferdinando Gorges, one of the patentees of the New England charter of 1620, had remonstrated, in 1624, to King James, against the occupation of the Hudson, and that the States General, by their ambassador, disclaimed it, as merely a private undertaking of their West Indian Company.* It might admit inquiry whether the English charter, in its constructive application, embraced that river; for though it extended nominally to the fortieth degree, it contained an exception in favour of the possession of any Christian prince or state. The Hollanders in 1620 had the possession. The policy of King James, not, perhaps, very liberal on this subject, was pacific, and he probably preferred that the river should be settled upon by the Dutch rather than by the Spaniards or French, both of whom claimed the country. He was, if we credit English statements, aware that the Dutch had begun a settlement, and, perhaps, he caused the proviso in the great charter, as a tacit acquiescence. If therefore the remonstrance was made, no efficient interposition was obtained, nor was any regard paid to it by the West Indian Company: their measures with respect to New Netherland were not to be overawed by remonstrance, or varied by conflicting title, but proportioned to the success of their arms, consequently to the amplitude of their resources, and the adaptation of the province to a lucrative investment of capital. This year they achieved a victory over the enemy, so decisive, so complete, so unexampled in the magnitude of its trophies and advantages, as not only to enrich the members of the company, but tend directly to the establishment of permanent colonization in New Netherland. In September (1628) Admiral and General Peter Pieterse Heyn captured in the bay of Mautanzas a fleet of twenty vessels laden with silver, gold, and other precious articles, valued at more than twelve millions of guilders.† This was the famous Spanish silver fleet. The company during this and the preceding year took one hundred and four prizes from the Spaniards and Portuguese. Profit had augmented to fifty per cent. The treasure now poured upon the bosom of the society was so infatuating, that the States General found it necessary to interpose some rules of government over foreign conquests, not leaving them to the arbitrary whim and caprice of the conquerors or naval commanders, and on the other hand found it not very difficult to persuade the company, to their own ruin ultimately, to turn their operations expressly for the advantage of the republic, and commence a "prince-like, instead of merchant-like war." But at this particular crisis, the interposition of their high mightinesses, for the benefit of transmarine conquests and colonies, accompanied by a decree, authorizing the different departments of the company to appoint a council of nine persons, who should be entrusted with the management of the whole, was the foundation of the appointment of commissioners over the affairs of New Netherland, and of the adoption by the college of XIX. of a charter of Liberties, and exemptions for patroons, masters, and private individuals, who should plant colonies in New Netherland, or import thither any neat cattle. These privileges and exemptions were adopted in the spring of 1629, and recorded in the book of resolutions of the department of XIX.‡

A knowledge of the provisions of this charter is not only necessary for understanding perfectly the civil basis on which the colony of New Netherland was erected, but the charter merits attention as an object of curious political speculation. It discloses the peculiar notions of an armed mercantile society with regard to colonization. While it secured the right of the Indians to the soil, and enjoined schools and churches, it scattered the seeds of servitude, slavery, and aristocracy. While it gave to freemen as much land as they could cultivate, and exempted colonists from taxation for ten years, it fettered agriculture, by restricting commerce and prohibiting manufactures.—Moulton's History of New York.

in the course of the same year, Kieft applied to New Haven for assistance against the Indians, the government of this colony tendered the amplest contribution they could afford of provisions for men and cattle, to supply the scarcity that might have arisen from the Indian devastations. So unwarlike were the Dutch colonists in general, that they found it necessary to invite Captain Underhill, who had been banished from Boston for his eccentricities in religion, to take command of the troops. Collecting a flying party of one hundred and fifty men, he was enabled to preserve the Dutch settlements from destruction. The number of Indians whom he killed in the course

† 5,000,000 dollars. De Laet (History West India Co. book V.) says 11,509,524 guilders, exclusive of musk, ambergris, bezoar, and other precious articles in great quantity, besides the cargoes of two galleons and one small prize.

‡ Lambrechtsen says they are to be found in the Notules of that department, March 10, 1628, (old style;) but in a deed from Gov. Kieft to ex-Governor Van Twiller, in 1638, of a tobacco plantation at Sapokanickan, (Greenwich, in the city of New York,) the date of the grant of the liberties and exemptions is cited to have been the 7th of June, 1629. Perhaps, as they were not published till 1630, they underwent modifications after they were first adopted, previously to their being finally confirmed as a charter.

business to those that were concerned in it. It seems the trade thereof was at first, by strict proclamation, prohibited by the king. "Sed quid non mortalia pectora cogis—Auri sacra fames!" The love of money is the root of all evil," &c. Hubbard. Hist. New Eng. Mass. Hist. Col. V. 100.

* This is put about the period of the meeting of the English parliament, in February, 1624. See Belk. Biog. vol. i. 369–375. But the loose manner in which the complaint is told, without any authority cited, and particularly the reply which it is said the states made, viz. that if a settlement on the Hudson had been made, it was without their order, as they had only erected a company for the West Indies, are circumstances which throw a suspicion over the statement. The grant to the company extended as far north as Newfoundland. Perhaps this story is confounded with one of a similar kind in the time of Charles I.

of the war was supposed to exceed four hundred. In 1646, a severe battle was fought on that part of Horseneck called Strickland's Plain. The Dutch were victorious; on both sides great numbers were slain; and for a century afterwards the graves of the dead were distinctly visible.

Kieft was succeeded, in the following year, by Peter Stuyvesant, a brave old officer, and one of the most magnanimous spirits of the republican service of Holland. By his prudence and vigour, he appears to have succeeded in restoring peace with the Indians, and preserving it uninterrupted during the whole of his administration. In 1650, he met the commissioners of the New England colonies at Hartford, where, after much altercation, a line of partition between their respective territories was fixed by mutual agreement. Long Island was divided between them; the Dutch retained the lands which they occupied in Connecticut, surrendering their claim to the residue.

In the Delaware territory, Stuyvesant resolutely defended the claims of his countrymen against the invasions both of the English and the Swedes. In 1651, the Dutch built Fort Casimir, now called New-castle, on Delaware. The Swedes claiming the country formally protested against this proceeding. Risingh, the governor, under the disguise of friendship, came before the fortress, and landed thirty men, who were entertained by the commandant as friends; but he had no sooner discovered the weakness of the garrison, than he made himself master of it; and compelled several of the people to swear allegiance to Christiana, queen of Sweden. Stuyvesant was not of a disposition to submit tamely to such an outrage, or to content himself with a simple recapture of the fort. He determined to invade and subdue the whole Swedish settlement. But no sooner did they find themselves about to be attacked by this determined warrior, and perceived that their forts failed to intimidate the enemy, than they peaceably surrendered them, together with the whole of their establishments. Thus, unassisted by the parent state, fell the only colony that Sweden has ever possessed.

During nearly ten years of peace, Stuyvesant used diligent exertion in extending and consolidating the colony of New Netherlands; all his labours were, however, doomed to prove unavailing to the advantage of his country. Charles II. had now ascended the British throne; and although he had received, during his exile, more courtesy from the Dutch than from any other nation, he had conceived a peculiar aversion towards the people of Holland; and did not hesitate to use every means to provoke the resentment of the States-General: among others, he asserted his claim to the province of New Netherlands; and, without any attempt at negotiation with the States, he executed a charter, conveying to the Duke of York the whole territory, from the eastern shore of the Delaware, to the western bank of the Connecticut. This grant took no more notice of the existing possession of the Dutch, than it showed respect to the recent charter of Connecticut, which, whether from design or ignorance, it tacitly, but entirely superseded. No sooner did the Duke of York obtain this grant, than he conveyed to Lord Berkeley and Sir George Carteret all that portion now constituting the province of New Jersey.

It was manifest that this grant would require a military force to carry it into effect. While the Dutch, notwithstanding the intimations they received from Stuyvesant, continued unsuspecting or incredulous, an armament, under the command of Colonel Nichols, who was also appointed governor of the province he was about to conquer, was prepared and despatched. After touching at Boston, the fleet sailed to Hudson river, and took a position before the capital of New Netherlands. Stuyvesant resolved to make a gallant defence, but his sentiments did not pervade the minds of the inhabitants, who, apprehending all resistance to the disciplined forces, and powerful artillery of the invaders, utterly hopeless, the most valorous and faithful satisfied themselves with the resolution not to remain the subjects of their tyrannical conqueror, but could not perceive the propriety of aggravating their distress by exposing their persons and habitations to the certainty of capture by storm, and the extremity of military violence.

Colonel Nichols lost no time in sending a summons to surrender the fortress, towns, and the whole territory, to the king of England, as his lawful right, which had been intruded on and usurped by the Dutch. As the reply of Stuyvesant gives what may be considered an authentic account of the grounds of the claims of the Dutch, a part of it is presented to the reader:

"MY LORDS,

"Your first letter, unsigned, of the 20—31 August, together with that of this day, signed according to form, being the 1st of September, have been safely delivered into our hands by your deputies, unto which we shall say, that the rights of his majesty of England, unto any part of America hereabout, amongst the rest, unto the colonies of Virginia, Maryland, or others in New England, whether disputable or not, is that which, for the present, we have no design to debate upon. But that his majesty hath an indisputable right to all lands in the north parts of America is that, which the kings of France and Spain will disallow, as we absolutely do, by virtue of a commission given to me, by my lords, the high and mighty States-General, to be governor-general over New Holland, the Isles of Curacoa, Bonaire, Aruba, with their appurtenances, and dependencies, bearing date the 26th of July, 1646. As also by virtue of a grant and commission, given by my said lords, the high and mighty States-General, to the West India Company, in the year 1621, with as much power, and as authentic, as his said majesty of England hath given, or can give, to any colony in America, as more fully appears by the patent and commission of the said lords the States-General, by them signed, registered, and sealed with their great seal, which were shewed to your deputies, Colonel George Carteret, Captain Robert Needham, Captain Edward Groves, and Mr. Thomas Delavall, by which commission and patent, together, (to deal frankly with you,) and by divers letters, signed and sealed by our said lords the States-General, directed to several persons, both English and Dutch, inhabiting the towns and villages on Long Island, (which, without doubt, have been produced before you, by those inhabitants,) by which they are declared and acknowledged to be their subjects, with express command, that they continue faithful unto them, under penalty of incurring their utmost displeasure, which makes it appear more clear than the sun at noon-day, that your first foundation (viz. that the right and title of his majesty of Great Britain to these parts of America is unquestionable) is absolutely to be denied. Moreover, it is without dispute, and acknowledged by the world, that our predecessors, by virtue of the commission and patent of the said lords the States-General, have, without control and peaceably, (the contrary never coming to our knowledge,) enjoyed Fort Orange about forty-eight or fifty years, the Mannhattans about forty-one or forty-two years, the South River forty years, and the Fresh Water River about thirty-six years. Touching the second subject of your letter, viz. 'His majesty hath commanded me, in his name, to require a surrender of all such forts, towns, or places of strength, which now are possessed by the Dutch under your command;' we shall answer, that we are so confident of the discretion and equity of his majesty of Great Britain, that in case his majesty were informed of the truth, which is, that the Dutch came not into these provinces by any violence, but by virtue of commissions from my lords the States-General,—first of all in the years 1614, 1615, and 1616, up the North River, near Fort Orange, where, to hinder the invasions and massacres commonly committed by the savages, they built a little

fort, and after, in the year 1622, and even to this present time, by virtue of commission and grant to the governors of the West India Company; and, moreover, in the year 1656, a grant to the honourable the burgomasters of Amsterdam, of the South River, inso-much that, by virtue of the abovesaid commissions from the high and mighty States-General, given to the persons interested as aforesaid, and others, these provinces have been governed, and consequently enjoyed; as also in regard of their first discovery, uninterrupted possession, and purchase of the lands of the princes, natives of the country, and other private persons, though Gentiles,—we make no doubt, that if his said majesty of Great Britain were well informed of these passages, he would be too judicious to grant such an order, principally in a time when there is so straight a friendship and confederacy between our said lords and superiors, to trouble us in the demanding and summons of the places and fortresses which were put into our hands, with order to maintain them, in the name of the said lords the States-General, as was made appear to your deputies, under the names and seal of the said high and mighty States-General, dated the 28th of July, 1646. Besides what had been mentioned, there is little probability, that his said majesty of England. (in regard the articles of peace are printed, and were recommended to us to observe seriously and exactly, by a letter written to us by our said lords the States-General, and to cause them to be observed religiously in this country,) would give order touching so dangerous a design, being also so apparent, that none other than my said lords the States-General have any right to these provinces, and consequently ought to command and maintain their subjects; and in their absence, we, the governor-general, are obliged to maintain their rights, and to repel and take revenge of all threatenings, unjust attempts, or any force whatsoever, that shall be committed against their faithful subjects and inhabitants, it being a very considerable thing to affront so mighty a state, although it were not against an ally and confederate. Consequently, if his said majesty (as it is fit) were well informed of all that could be spoken upon this subject, he would not approve of what expressions were mentioned in your letter."

The reasoning of Stuyvesant, as might have been anticipated, did not produce any effect on his opponents, who made immediate preparations for the reduction of the fort. These prompt measures induced the governor to make another attempt at negotiation; but Colonel Nichols replied, that he could treat on no subject but that of surrender. Unsupported as was Stuyvesant by his countrymen, he felt compelled to agree to a treaty of capitulation, which was concluded on the most favourable terms to the inhabitants; and, to gratify the punctilious feelings of Stuyvesant, an article was introduced, that the English and Dutch limits in America should be settled by the court of England and the States-General. On the 27th of August, 1664, the commissioners on behalf of both parties, met at the governor's farm, and signed the articles of capitulation.

The first article of the treaty declared, "That the States-General, or the West India Company, shall freely enjoy all farms and houses (except such as are in the forts;) and that within six months they shall have free liberty to transport all such arms and munition, as now belong to them, or else they shall be paid for them." The third, that "All people shall still continue free denizens, and shall enjoy their lands, houses, goods, wheresoever they are within this country, and dispose of them as they please." The sixth, that "Any people may freely come from the Netherlands, and plant in this colony, and that Dutch vessels may freely come hither, and any of the Dutch may freely return home, or send any sort of merchandise home, in vessels of their own country." The last of these conditions was manifestly in direct opposition to the navigation acts, and conferred a privilege it was not in the power of the crown to ratify, and which was consequently of very short duration. Favourable as were these conditions, it was not till two days after their signature by the commissioners, that the governor could be induced to add his ratification.

Immediately after its subjugation, New Amsterdam received the name of New York; the appellation was also extended to the whole province. Fort Orange, which capitulated before the close of the month, took the name of Albany. During his abode in that neighbourhood, Carteret, who had been despatched to reduce Fort Orange, had interviews with the chiefs of the Indians of the Five Nations, and entered into a treaty of friendship with them, the beneficial effects of which long continued to be realized by the colonists. Sir Robert Car was equally successful in the south, the garrison of the Delaware surrendering on the 1st of October, on which day the whole of the New Netherlands became subject to the British crown; and by an act of flagrant injustice, the States-General ceased to exercise any authority over the North American continent. All the early writers agree in describing New Amsterdam as a handsome well-built town. Indeed, the various provisions that were introduced into the articles of surrender, to guard the comforts of the inhabitants from invasion, attest the orderly and plentiful state which these colonists had attained. No account has been preserved of the total population of the province and its dependencies; but the metropolis, at this time, seems to have contained about three thousand persons.* Few of the inhabitants thought proper to remove out of the country. Even Governor Stuyvesant himself continued to hold his estate, and died there. "Justice obliges me to declare," says Smith, "that for loyalty, and a pure attachment to the Protestant religion, the descendants of the Dutch planters are perhaps exceeded by none of his majesty's subjects."†

Nichols immediately assumed the command of the territory he had conquered, as deputy governor for the duke of York; and without delay proceeded to reduce the affairs of the state to one uniform constitution and policy. In imitation of what had been previously established by the Dutch, he erected a court of assize, composed of the governor, the council, and the justices of the peace, which was invested with every power in the colony, legislative, executive, and judicial. The only liberal institution that he was allowed to introduce was trial by jury; and to this admirable check on judicial proceedings all causes and controversies were subjected. The court having collected into one code the ancient customs, with such improvements as the change of circumstances rendered necessary, still regarding the laws of England as supreme, these ordinances were transmitted to England, and confirmed by the duke of York the following year. A dispute having arisen between the inhabitants of Jamaica on Long Island respecting Indian deeds, it was ordered, that no purchase from the Indians should be deemed valid without the governor's license, executed in his presence. Several of the English methods of government were gradually introduced into the province; and on the 12th of June, the inhabitants of New York were incorporated under a mayor, five aldermen, and a sheriff.

When the intelligence of the declaration of war against Holland reached New York, the governor naturally anticipated an attempt on the part of the Dutch to regain their territory of the New Netherlands, and proceeded to adopt measures calculated to insure a vigorous and successful defence. The inhabitants felt the pressure of the assessments made by the court of assize to furnish the requisite pecuniary supplies the more keenly, since their trade, which had been almost exclusively carried on by Dutch shipping, was now nearly annihilated. In these circumstances, Governor Nichols nobly sacrificed the greater part of his fortune to supply the public exigencies. Happily, however, the States-General, made no attempt to repossess themselves of New York during this war; and at the peace of Breda it was ceded to England, in exchange for Surinam, by a general stipulation, that each of the two nations should retain what its arms had acquired since the commencement of hostilities. It was by this treaty also that Acadie was ceded to France, which had acted as the ally of Holland during the war, and was the only party that reaped advantage from it.

Early in the following year, Colonel Nichols found himself compelled, from the pecuniary sacrifices he had made, to resign his appointment. He was both respected and beloved by the people over whose interests he had presided. The benefit of his exertions devolved on his successor, Colonel Lovelace, during whose administration the colony enjoyed nearly six years of content and prosperity, the only memorable occurrence being the unfortunate event that brought it to a close. During the second war with Holland, a small squadron was despatched to destroy the commerce of the English colonies; and having performed this service with great effect, they were induced to attempt a more important enterprise. Repairing with secrecy to New York, they had the good fortune to arrive at the metropolis while Lovelace was at a distance, and the command was exercised by Colonel Manning, who sent down a messenger, and treacherously made terms with the enemy. The Dutch sailed up the harbour, landed their men, and took possession of the fort and city without firing or receiving a shot. Captain Anthony Colve was appointed governor, but he retained the authority for a few months only; peace being concluded the next year, the country was restored to the English by the treaty of Westminster. On this pacification, the duke of York, to remove all doubt respecting his property in America, took out a new patent from the king. This grant recited and confirmed the former. It empowered the duke to govern the inhabitants by such ordinances as he or his assigns should establish, and to administer justice according to the laws of England, allowing an appeal to the king in council. It prohibited trade thither without his permission. It allowed the provincials to import merchandises, but required them "to pay customs according to the laws of the realm." Under the authority of this charter the duke ruled New York until his accession to the throne of England. He now commissioned Major Edmund Andros to be governor of all his territories from the western bank of the Connecticut to the farther shore of the Delaware. In October, the Dutch resigned their authority to Andros, who immediately received the submission of the inhabitants.

The administration of Andros and of his successor Anthony Brockholst, are not distinguished by any remarkable event. In 1682, Colonel Thomas Dongan was appointed governor. During his government the inhabitants of New York first participated in the legislative power. The council, the court of assize, and the corporation of New York, having concurred in soliciting their royal patentee to permit the people to possess some share in the government, the duke had informed the deputy governor of the province that he intended to establish the same form of government as the other plantations enjoyed "particularly in the choosing of an assembly," and Governor Dongan was accordingly instructed to call an assembly of the province. It was to consist of a council composed of ten members, and a house of representatives chosen by the people, composed of eighteen members; but its laws were to be of no force without the ratification of the proprietary. Orders were issued to the sheriffs, to summon the freeholders for choosing representatives to meet the governor in assembly on the 17th of October. A session of the assembly was held, pursuant to the summons, and several important laws were passed. One of the acts of this assembly, passed on the 30th of October, is entitled, "The Charter of Liberties, and Privileges granted by his royal highness to the Inhabitants of New York and its dependencies." Another session was held the following year, but it is believed there was no other previous to the revolution of 1688.*

The interior of New York was originally inhabited by a confederacy, which consisted at first of five, and afterwards of six, nations of Indians. This confederacy was formed for mutual defence against the Algonquins, a powerful Canadian nation, and displayed much of the wisdom and sagacity which mark the institutions of a civilized people. By their

* Collections of New York Historical Society, vol. iii. p. 347, 352. "It has been alleged, and it is not improbable, that the duke, upon becoming king, refused to confirm the privileges he had before granted, and determined to govern the province by his absolute power. It is therefore reasonable to suppose, that in the new commission, or orders to Governor Dongan, the authority respecting the assembly was omitted, or revoked."—Holmes's American Annals, vol. i. p. 410.

union they had become formidable to the surrounding tribes. Being the allies of the English, the French were alarmed at their successes, and became jealous of their power. In the year 1684, De la Barre, the governor of Canada, marched to attack them, with an army of seventeen hundred men. His troops suffered so much from hardships, famine, and sickness, that he was compelled to ask peace of those whom he had come to exterminate. He invited the chiefs of the five nations to meet him at his camp, and those of three of them accepted the invitation. Standing in a circle, formed by the chiefs and his own officers, he addressed a speech to Garrangula, of the Onondago tribe, in which he accused the confederates of conducting the English to the trading grounds of the French, and threatened them with war and extermination if they did not alter their behaviour. Garrangula, knowing the distresses of the French troops, heard these threats with contempt. After walking five or six times round the circle, he addressed De la Barre in the following bold language, calling him Yonnondio, and the English governor, Corlear :

"Hear, Yonnondio, I do not sleep; I have my eyes open, and the sun which enlightens me, discovers to me a great captain, at the head of a company of soldiers, who speaks as if he was dreaming. He says that he only came to smoke the great pipe of peace with the Onondagas. But Garrangula says, that he sees the contrary; that it was to knock them on the head, if sickness had not weakened the arms of the French. We carried the English to our lakes, to trade there with the Utawawas, and Quatoghies, as the Adirondacs brought the French to our castles, to carry on a trade which the English say is theirs. We are born free, we neither depend on Yonnondio nor Corlear. We may go where we please, and buy and sell what we please. If your allies are your slaves, use them as such; command them to receive no other but your people. Hear, Yonnondio! what I say is the voice of all the Five Nations. When they buried the hatchet at Cadaracui, in the middle of the fort, they planted the tree of peace in the same place, to be there carefully preserved, that instead of a retreat for soldiers, the fort might be a rendezvous for merchants. Take care that the many soldiers who appear there do not choke the tree of peace, and prevent it from covering your country and ours with its branches. I assure you that our warriors shall dance under its leaves, and will never dig up the hatchet to cut it down, till their brother Yonnondio or Corlear shall invade the country which the Great Spirit has given to our ancestors."

De la Barre was mortified and enraged at this bold reply; but, submitting to necessity, he concluded a treaty of peace, and returned to Montreal. His successor, De Nonville, led a larger army against the confederates; but fell into an ambuscade, and was defeated. These wars within the limits of the colony kept Colonel Dongan actively employed, and served to perpetuate the enmity of the Indians against the French, and their attachment to the English.

James II. having ascended the throne, determined to superadd New York and the Jerseys to the jurisdiction of the four colonies of New England; a new commission was passed in March, appointing Sir Edmund Andros captain-general and vice-admiral over the whole. The constitution established on this occasion was a legislative and executive governor and council, who were appointed by the king, without the concurrence of the people. The royal order to Governor Dongan to deliver up the seal of the province to his excellency Sir E. Andros, was read in the provincial council on the 28th of July, and ordered to be entered among the records of the province of New York. His rule was, however, of very brief duration. In the following year, the welcome intelligence of the accession of William and Mary to the British throne was joyfully received at New York, and the inhabitants waited with anxiety for orders to proclaim them; but while the principal officers and magistrates were assembled to consult for the public safety, Jacob Leisler, a captain of the militia, seized the fort, and held it for the prince of Orange. William and Mary were proclaimed there in June; and the province was for some time ruled by a committee of safety, at the head of which was Leisler. He was destitute of many of the qualifications necessary to conduct a difficult enterprise, but possessed the esteem and confidence of many of the officers, and of the people. His sudden elevation excited the envy of those magistrates and citizens who had declined to join him in proclaiming King William. Unable to raise a party against him in the city, they retired to Albany, where their exertions were successful. To diminish their influence, and to allay the jealousy of others, Leisler invited several of the principal citizens to unite with him in administering the government, a trust which had been confided to him alone by the militia. In a few months, however, a letter arrived from the ministry in England, directed "to such as, for the time being, take care for administering the laws of the province," and conferring authority to perform all the duties of lieutenant-governor. Leisler considered this letter addressed to himself, assumed the authority conferred, appointed his council, and issued commissions in his own name. Before these disturbances, Colonel Dongan had resigned his office, and embarked for England. Lieutenant-governor Nicholson, unable to contend with Leisler, absconded in the night.

The people of Albany, led by Bayard, Courtlandt, formerly mayor of New York, and Livingston, acknowledged King William, but refused to submit to Leisler. Milborne was sent with a body of troops to enforce obedience, but, finding them united, he returned without attempting it. The next spring, going with a stronger force, he succeeded. Abandoning the fort to their rival, the leaders of the party took refuge in the neighbouring colonies; and Leisler, with vindictive rashness, proceeded to confiscate their estates. This arbitrary and unjust measure so exasperated the sufferers, that they long retained the most violent animosity against Leisler and his adherents.

In this state of contention the colonists of New York continued nearly two years, and the miseries of a foreign aggression were soon added to those of internal discord. War had been declared between France and England; and De Nonville had been replaced in the governorship of Canada by Count Frontignac, a veteran officer, whose skilful and energetic measures, aided by a large re-enforcement, soon raised the affairs of the French from the brink of ruin, and enabled them to act on the offensive. Frontignac was indefatigable in his efforts to gain over the Five Nations, who had made two attacks upon Montreal, and murdered a great number of inhabitants. He held a great council with them at Onondaga; and, as they seemed to be somewhat inclined to peace, he resolved to give their favourable disposition no time for change, and, at the same time, to inspirit his own drooping countrymen, by finding them immediate employment against the English colonies. On the 19th of January, a party of about two hundred French, and some Cahnuga Indians, set out, in a deep snow, for Schenectady; they arrived on the 8th of February, at eleven o'clock at night; and the first intimation the inhabitants had of their design, was conveyed in the noise of their own bursting doors. The village was burnt, sixty persons were butchered, twenty-seven suffered the worse fate of captivity, the rest made their way naked through the snow towards Albany, where some arrived in extreme distress, while many perished in the attempt. A party of young men, and some Mohawk Indians, set out from the latter place, pursued the enemy, and killed or captured twenty-five.

To avenge these barbarities, and others perpetrated in New England, a combined expedition against Canada was projected. An army, raised in New York and Connecticut, proceeded as far as the head of Lake Champlain, whence, finding no boats prepared, they were obliged to return. Sir William Phipps, with a fleet of more than thirty vessels, sailed from Boston into the St. Lawrence, and, landing a body of troops, made an attack by land and water upon Quebec; but the return of the army to New York allowing the whole force of the enemy to repair to the assistance of the garrison, he was obliged to abandon the enterprise. Leisler, transported with rage when he was informed of the retreat, caused Winthrop, who commanded the New England forces, to be arrested, but was instantly compelled, by universal indignation, to release him. It was to the misconduct or incapacity of Leisler and Milborne, (the latter of whom, as commissary-general, had made no adequate provision for the enterprise,) that the failure of this expedition was attributed.

The messenger whom Leisler had despatched to convey his assurances of devoted loyalty to King William, had been most graciously received, and admitted to the honour of kissing his majesty's hand. But the latter lieutenant-governor, Nicholson, on his arrival in England, found means to induce the king not to recognise expressly the authority of Leisler, and so early as August, 1689, the government of New York was confided to Colonel Sloughter; though this officer being engaged in affairs of more immediate interest at home, did not arrive at New York till two years afterwards. Leisler felt himself so neglected by being thus superseded, and was so intoxicated with power, that he determined to retain it, and although twice summoned, refused to surrender the fort; he, however, sent two persons to confer with the governor, who, declaring them rebels, arrested and confined them. Alarmed by this measure, Leisler attempted to escape, but was apprehended with many of his adherents, and brought to trial. In vain did they plead their zeal for King William. In vain did Leisler insist that the letter from England authorized him to administer the government. They had lately resisted a governor with a regular commission, and this governor, and a subservient court, were resolved upon their conviction. Leisler and Milborne were both condemned to death for high treason. Sloughter was, however, unwilling to sacrifice two men, who, though they had sometimes erred, had served his master with zeal; but at length he yielded to the urgent persuasions of their enemies, and signed the warrant for their execution, which was speedily carried into effect. On application to the king, their estates, which had been confiscated, were restored to their heirs.

Sloughter's administration was terminated by his sudden death in July, 1691. It had been turbulent and ineffective; the only portion of his government which appears to have been beneficial, was a conference which he held with the chiefs of the Five Nations, who had manifested some disposition to enter into a treaty with the French; but in consequence of Sloughter's explanations and persuasions, they expressed themselves willing to "brighten their ancient belt of friendship," and renew their offensive and defensive league with the English.

To put their friendship to the test, and to confirm it by calling it into exercise, Major Schuyler, who possessed great influence with the Indian chiefs, undertook, at the close of this year, an expedition against Montreal. The attempt did not succeed as to the principal object of attack, but the spirit of hostility was so intensely aroused in the Indians of the Five Nations, that they continued to wage war on the French during the winter, though the colonial troops had retired. Count Frontignac was so exasperated with their continued assaults, that he condemned to a death, accompanied by all the torments French ingenuity could devise, two Mohawk captives, whom the fate of war had thrown into his power. "Shortly before the execution, some Frenchman, less inhuman than his governor, threw a knife into the prison, and one of the Mohawks immediately despatched himself with it: the other, expressing contempt at his companion's mean evasion from glory, walked to the stake, singing in his death-chant that he was a Mohawk warrior, that all the power of man could not extort an indecent expression of suffering from his lips, and that it was ample consolation to him to reflect that he had made many Frenchmen suffer the same pangs that he must now himself undergo. When attached to the stake, he looked round on his executioners, their instruments of torture, and the assembled multitude of spectators, with all the complacency of heroic fortitude; and, after enduring for some hours, with composed mien and triumphant language, a series of barbarities too atrocious and disgusting to be recited, his sufferings were terminated by the interposition of a French lady, who prevailed with the governor to order that mortal blow, to which human cruelty has given the name of coup de grace, or stroke of favour."*

Colonel Fletcher was appointed to succeed Sloughter, as governor of New York. He was active and energetic, but of sordid disposition and violent temper. One of his first exploits, the assertion of his claim to command the militia of Connecticut, and the reception given him by Captain Wadsworth, has already been related in the history of that colony. It was a fortunate circumstance that he yielded to the superior information and advice of Major Schuyler in all affairs relating to the Indians, who were thus kept from embracing the offers of peace which were continually presented them by Count Frontignac.

It had been the favourite object of all the governors of New York to assimilate the language and religion of the inhabitants, and to remove, as much as possible, the more striking indications of the Dutch origin of the colony. No one pursued this object with more zeal than Fletcher, who was bigotedly attached to the church of England. In two successive sessions he introduced the subject to the attention of the assembly; but the members, being generally in favour of the church of Holland, to his great mortification, disregarded his recommendations. The matter being again laid before them in a subsequent session, they passed a bill providing for the settlement, in certain parishes, of ministers of the gospel, to be chosen by the people. The council added an amendment, giving to the governor the power of approval or rejection; but the house refused to concur in the amendment, at which Fletcher was so much enraged, that he commanded them instantly to attend him, and addressing them in an angry speech, prorogued them to the next year.†

The remainder of Fletcher's administration was

* Grahame, vol. ii. p. 279. Smith, p. 78, 79.

† This speech is at once a specimen of Colonel Fletcher, and of colonial government; it is therefore inserted at length. "Gentlemen,—There is also a bill for settling a ministry in this city, and some other countries of the government. In that very thing you have shown a great deal of stiffness. You take upon you, as if you were dictators. I sent down to you an amendment of three or four words in that bill, which, though very immaterial, yet was positively denied. I must tell you, it seems very unmannerly. There never was an amendment yet desired by the council board, but what was rejected. It is the sign of a stubborn ill temper, and this I have also passed. But, gentlemen, I must take leave to tell you, if you seem to understand by these words, that none can serve without your collation or establishment, you are far mistaken. For I have the power of collating or suspending any minister in my government, by their majesties' letters patent; and whilst I stay in the government, I will take care that neither heresy, sedition, schism, or rebellion, be preached among you, nor vice and profanity encouraged. It is my endeavour to lead a virtuous and pious life amongst you, and to give a good example: I wish you all to do the same. You ought to consider, that you have but a third share in the legislative power of the government; and ought not to take all upon you, nor be so peremptory. You ought to let the council have a share. They are in the nature of the house of lords, or upper house; but you seem to take the whole power in your hands, and set up for every thing. You have set a long time to little purpose, and have been a great charge to the country. Ten shillings a day is a large allowance, and you punctually exact it. You have been not signalized by any occurrence worthy of record. The war between the French and the Five Nations sometimes languished by the address of Frontignac's negotiations, but was oftener kindled into additional rage and destruction by his enterprise and activity ; and as their hostilities were prolonged, the French and the Indians seemed to be inspired with a mutual emulation of cruelty in victory, no less than of prowess in battle. The prisoners on both sides were made to expire in horrible tortures.* "On one occasion, when Frontignac succeeded in capturing a Mohawk fort, it was found deserted of all its inhabitants except a sachem in extreme old age, who sat with the composure of an ancient Roman in the capitol, and saluted his civilized compeer in age and infirmity with dignified courtesy and venerable address. Every hand was instantly raised to wound and deface his time-stricken frame ; and while French and Indian knives were plunged into his body, he recommended to his Indian enemies rather to burn him with fire, that he might teach their French allies how to suffer like men."†

In 1697, the peace of Ryswick, which was concluded between Great Britain and France, gave security and repose to the colonies. The next year, the earl of Bellamont was appointed governor. He was particularly desirous of clearing the American seas of the pirates with which they had for some time been grievously infested. The government, however, declining to furnish an adequate naval force, the earl engaged with others in a private undertaking against them. Among the associates were Lord Chancellor Summers and the duke of Shrewsbury ; the king himself, too, held a tenth share. The company, having procured a vessel of war, gave the command to Captain Kidd, and despatched him on a cruise against the pirates. He had been but a short time at sea, when he made a new contract with his crew, and, on the Atlantic and Indian oceans, became himself a daring and successful pirate. Three years afterwards he returned, burned his ship, and, with a strange infatuation, appeared in public at Boston. The earl always forward enough to pull down the fees of other ministers in the government. Why did you not think it expedient to correct your own to a more moderate allowance ? Gentlemen, I shall say no more at present, but that you do withdraw to your private affairs in the county. I do prorogue you to the 10th of January next, and you are hereby prorogued to the 10th day of January next ensuing."—Smith, p. 84, 85.

* We shall give but one instance out of many. "The prisoner being first made fast to a stake, so as to have room to move round it, a Frenchman began the horrid tragedy, by broiling the flesh of the prisoner's legs, from his toes to his knees, with the red-hot barrel of a gun. His example was followed by an Utawawa, who, being desirous to outdo the French in their refined cruelty, split a furrow from the prisoner's shoulder to his garter, and filling it with gunpowder, set fire to it. This gave him exquisite pain, and of Bellamont wrote to the secretary of state, desiring that Kidd might be sent for, and a man-of-war was despatched upon this service ; but being driven back by a storm, a general suspicion prevailed in England, that there was collusion between the ministry and the adventurers, who were thought unwilling to produce Kidd, lest he might discover that the chancellor and the other associates were confederates in the piracy. So powerful was this feeling, that a motion was made in the house of commons, that all who were concerned in the adventure might be deprived of their employments ; but it was rejected by a great majority, and all subsequent attempts to implicate the unfortunate shareholders, only proved more satisfactorily their entire innocence of any participation either in the designs or the profits of Captain Kidd ; although their imprudence in selecting a person whose previous character was very indifferent, was evident and undeniable. Ultimately Kidd was conveyed to England, where he was tried and executed.

The state in which Lord Bellamont found the government at New York was thus emphatically described by him in his first address to the assembly : "I cannot but observe to you, what a legacy my predecessor has left me, and what difficulties to struggle with ; a divided people, an empty purse, a few miserable, naked, half-starved soldiers, not half the number the king allowed pay for ; the fortifications, and even the governor's house, very much out of repair ; and, in a word, the whole government out of frame." After this introduction, he puts them in mind that the revenue was near expiring. "It would be hard," he adds, "if I that come among you with an honest mind, and a resolution to be just to your interest, should meet with greater difficulties, in the discharge of his majesty's service, than those that have gone before me. I will take care there shall be no misapplication of the public money. I will pocket none of it myself, nor shall there be any embezzlement by others ; but exact accounts shall be given you, when, and as often, as you shall require."‡ raised excessive laughter in his tormentors. When they found his throat so much parched that he was no longer able to gratify their ears with his howling, they gave him water, to enable him to continue their pleasure longer. But at last his strength failing, an Utawawa flayed off his scalp, and threw burning hot coals on his skull. They then untied him, and bid him run for his life. He began to run, tumbling like a drunken man. They shut up the way to the east, and made him run westward, the country, as they think, of departed miserable souls. He had still force left to throw stones, till they put an end to his misery by knocking him on the head. After this every one cut a slice from his body, to conclude the tragedy with a feast."—Smith, p. 88.

however, were by no means the most severe disorders which marred the peace of the colony; the increasing animosity of two numerous factions, consisting of the friends and the enemies of the unfortunate Leisler, were a still greater evil. Their mutual antipathy was roused by the occurrence of fresh opportunities to indulge it, and the public business of the province was seriously impeded. The character and manners of Lord Bellamont were adapted to compose these dissensions, although his just displeasure against the conduct of his predecessor extended itself to every person who had held office along with him, and in this class were comprehended the principal adversaries of Leisler. The assembly now consisted chiefly of the friends of Leisler, and they voted the sum of 1000*l.* to be paid to his son, to be levied immediately on the province, as a compensation for the damage he had sustained by the violent proceedings against his father.

The administration of Lord Bellamont, which was proceeding with a degree of integrity and wisdom calculated to excite hopes of very beneficial results to the colony, was terminated by his sudden demise, in March, 1701. In the appointment of a successor, that principle appears to have been acted upon, which has been so extensively injurious to the prosperity and to the loyalty of British colonies: the convenience of the ministry at home, and not the welfare of the state, induced them to send into honourable and gainful exile, the grandson of the celebrated earl of Clarendon. Possessing not one of the virtues of his ancestor, Lord Cornbury was mean, profligate, and unprincipled; a burden to his friends at home, they procured for him an appointment beyond the reach of his creditors. He declared himself an anti-Leislerian, and, by his influence, the first assembly that he summoned was composed principally of men of that party. They provided liberally for his expenses; yet several sums of money raised for public purposes, being entrusted to him as governor, were chiefly appropriated to his own use. His extravagance and oppression exposed him to the reprehensions of the house of assembly. A committee of grievances was appointed, and the resolutions proposed by them were adopted by the assembly. Although this took place at the beginning of the session, the haughty governor was so subdued by the opposition against him, and so dispirited through indigence, that he not only omitted to justify himself, but to show even an impotent resentment; for, after all the censures of the house, he tamely thanked them for passing a bill to discharge him from a small debt. Among the resolutions adopted by the assembly is one too remarkably indicative of the tendency to independence which existed even at this period, to suffer it to pass unnoticed. It declares, "That the imposing and levying of any monies upon her majesty's subjects of this colony, under any pretence or colour whatsoever, without consent in general assembly, is a grievance, and a violation of the people's property;" an open avowal of the sentiment which subsequently occasioned the revolution.

The profligate and indecent manners of the governor rendered him universally odious. It was not uncommon for him to dress himself in a woman's habit, and then to patrol the fort in which he resided. Such freaks of low humour exposed him to the universal contempt of the people, while their indignation was kindled by his despotic rule, and injustice, not only to the public, but even to his private creditors; for he left some of the lowest tradesmen in his employment unsatisfied in their just demands.* In 1708, the assemblies of New York and of New Jersey, of which colony he was also governor, complained to the queen of his misconduct. She removed him from office; he was soon after arrested by his creditors, and remained in custody until the death of his father, when he returned to England and took his seat—where pauperism and crime were no disqualification for the highest honours and the most important duties—in the house of lords. Lord Lovelace, who had been appointed to succeed Lord Cornbury in the spring of 1708, did not arrive till the middle of December. The oppressive character of the preceding administration had rendered the people very desirous of a change, and the new governor was received with every demonstration of respect, and indeed with universal joy. His lordship informed them, in his speech at the opening of the session of the assembly, "that he had brought with him large supplies of soldiers and stores of war, as well as presents for the Indians," than which nothing could be more agreeable to the people. Although the assembly, in their answer, heartily congratulated his lordship on his arrival, and thanked the queen for her care of the province, yet they sufficiently intimated their disinclination to raise the revenue which the governor had requested. Lord Cornbury's conduct had rendered them utterly averse to a permanent support for the future, and yet they were unwilling to quarrel with the new governor. The project of providing annually for the support of government, however, as it rendered the governor and all the other servants of the crown dependent upon the assembly, would, doubtless, have produced a rupture between the several branches of the legislature, but the very day on which the vote passed the house, his lordship died of a disorder contracted at his first arrival. His lady continued to reside at New York long after his death, soliciting for the sum voted to her husband, but nothing was allowed till several years had transpired.

When General Hunter, who had been appointed to succeed Lord Lovelace, arrived in the colony, he brought with him nearly three thousand Germans, some of whom settled in New York, and some in Pennsylvania. During the disgraceful administration of Lord Cornbury, the assembly had obtained from Queen Anne permission, in cases of special appropriations, to appoint their own treasurer. They now passed a bill, confiding to this officer the disbursement of certain sums appropriated for ordinary purposes. The council proposed an amendment. The house denied the right of that body to amend a money bill. Both continuing obstinate, the governor prorogued them, and at their next session dissolved them.

In the year 1709, expensive preparations were made for an attack upon the French settlements in Canada; but the promised assistance not arriving from England, the enterprise was abandoned. In 1711, however, the project was resumed; and a fleet sailed up the St. Lawrence to attack Quebec, while an army of four thousand men, raised by New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut, marched to invade Canada, by the route of lake Champlain. The fleet, shattered by a storm, was compelled to return; and the army, informed of the disasters of the fleet, retired without accomplishing the object proposed.

To defray the expenses of this expedition, the newly elected assembly passed several bills, which the council persisted in amending. Between these two bodies another contest ensued. The representatives, deriving their authority from the people, considered themselves bound to watch over the expenditure of the money. The council, deriving their authority from the same source as the governor, were desirous of increasing his influence by giving him the management of the revenue. During this and a subsequent session both continued inflexible. The governor, provoked at the persevering determination of the representatives, again dissolved the assembly. At the ensuing election, which was warmly contested, most of the members chosen were opposed to the governor. This assembly was dissolved by the death of the queen. The next met a similar fate from the governor soon after it met, a majority of the representatives being known to be unfriendly to his views. At length, however, the people became weary of contending; and most of the members chosen at the succeeding election were favourable to the governor, and, for several years, the utmost harmony existed between the different branches of the legislature.

General Hunter quitted the province in 1719, and his authority devolved on Peter Schuyler, the oldest member of the council. The next year, William Burnet, son of the celebrated bishop of that name, was appointed governor. "He was," says Smith, "a man of sense and polite breeding, a well-read scholar, sprightly, and of a social disposition. Being devoted to his books, he abstained from all those excesses into which his pleasurable relish would otherwise have plunged him. He studied the art of recommending himself to the people, had nothing of the moroseness of a scholar, was gay and condescending, affected no pomp, but visited every family of reputation, and often diverted himself in free converse with the ladies, by whom he was very much admired. No governor before him did so much business in chancery. The office of chancellor was his delight. He made a tolerable figure in the exercise of it, though he was no lawyer, and had a foible very unsuitable for a judge, I mean, his resolving too speedily, for he used to say of himself, 'I act first, and think afterwards.'"^{*} Mr. Burnet's long acquaintance with his predecessor in office gave him an excellent opportunity, before his arrival, to obtain correct information respecting those by whom he was now surrounded; and as the late governor recommended all his old friends to the favour of his successor, he made few changes among them.

Of all the governors of New York, none had more just views of Indian affairs, and of the dangers arising from the vicinity of the French, than Burnet. Turning his attention towards the wilderness, he perceived that the French, in order to connect their settlements in Canada and Louisiana, to secure to themselves the Indian trade, and to confine the English to the sea coast, were busily employed in erecting a chain of forts from the St. Lawrence to the Mississippi. He endeavoured to defeat their design, by building a trading-house, and afterwards a fort, at Oswego, on Lake Ontario. But the French had the command of more abundant resources, and applied them to the accomplishment of their object with great activity and zeal. They launched two vessels upon that lake; and, going farther into the wilderness, erected a fort at Niagara, commanding the entrance into it; they had previously erected Fort Frontignac, commanding the outlet. The Jesuit Charlevoix does no more than justice to Mr. Burnet, in declaring that he left no stone unturned to defeat the French at Niagara. Besides supplanting his favourite trade at Oswego, these operations tended to the defection of the Five Nations; and, in case of a rupture, exposed the frontiers of the southern colonies to the ravages of the French and their allies. Mr. Burnet, upon whom these considerations made the deepest impression, laid the matter before the house, remonstrated against the proceedings to Longueuil, in Canada, wrote to the ministry in England, who complained of them to the French court, and met the confederates at Albany, endeavouring to convince them of the danger they themselves would be in from an aspiring, ambitious neighbour. He spoke first about the affair privately to the sachems, and afterwards, in the public conference, informed them of all the encroachments which the French had made upon their fathers, and the ill-usage they had met with, according to La Potherie's account, published with the privilege of the French king, at Paris, in 1722. He then reminded them of the kind treatment they had received from the English, who constantly fed and clothed them, and never attempted any act of hostility to their prejudice. This speech was extremely well drawn, the thoughts being conceived in strong figures, particularly expressive and agreeable to the Indians. The governor required an explicit declaration of their sentiments concerning the French transactions at Niagara, and their answer was truly categorical. "We speak now in the name of all the Six Nations, and come to you howling. This is the reason why we howl, that the governor of Canada encroaches on our land, and builds thereon." After which they entreated him to write to the king for succour. Mr. Burnet embraced this favourable opportunity to procure from them a deed, surrendering their country to his majesty, to be protected for their use, and confirming their grant in 1701, concerning which there was only an entry in the books of the secretary for Indian affairs.

It was an unfortunate circumstance, which tended to prevent the execution of Mr. Burnet's vigorous designs, that the electors of the colony had become dissatisfied at the length of time which had elapsed since they had been called on to exercise their functions. The assembly elected in 1716 had been on such good terms with the governor, that he continued its existence during the long period of eleven years. In the year 1727, however, the clamours of the people induced him to dissolve it; and, as might be expected, that which next met, was composed almost exclusively of his opponents. The court of chancery, in which he presided, had become exceedingly unpopular. It had been instituted by an ordinance of the governor and council, without the concurrence of the assembly, and some of the decisions had given great offence to powerful individuals. The house passed resolutions, declaring it "a manifest oppression and grievance," and intimating that its decrees were void. Mr. Burnet no sooner heard of these votes, than he called the members before him, and dissolved the assembly. They occasioned, however, an ordinance in the spring following, as well to remedy sundry abuses in the practice in chancery, as to reduce the fees of that court, "which, on account of the popular clamours, were so much diminished," says Smith, "that the wheels of the chancery have ever since rusted upon their axles, the practice being contemned by all gentlemen of eminence in the profession."

Mr. Burnet was soon after appointed governor of Massachusetts, and was succeeded at New York by Colonel Montgomery, who devoted himself so much to his ease that he has left nothing else to distinguish his brief rule. Upon his death, in 1731, the supreme authority devolved upon Rip Van Dam, the senior member of the council. Under his inefficient administration, the French were permitted to erect a fort at Crown Point, within the acknowledged boundaries of New York, from which parties of savages were often secretly despatched to destroy the English settlements.

In August, 1732, Van Dam was superseded by William Cosby. Having been the advocate in parliament of the American colonies, he was at first popular, but he soon lost the affection and confidence of the people. One of his most unpopular acts was the prosecution of Zenger, the printer of a newspaper, for publishing an article derogatory to the dignity of his majesty's government, bringing him to trial, after a severe imprisonment of thirty-five weeks from the printing of the offensive articles. Andrew Hamilton, an eminent lawyer of Philadelphia, though aged and infirm, learning the distress of the prisoner, and the importance of the trial, went to New York to plead Zenger's cause, which he did so effectually, that the jury brought in the prisoner not guilty. The common council of the city of New York, for this noble and successful service, presented Mr. Hamilton the freedom of their corporation in a gold box.

Governor Cosby was succeeded, in 1736, by George Clark. During his administration, the contest which had ended, twenty years before, in the victory gained by Governor Hunter over the house of representatives, was revived. The colony being in debt, the house voted to raise the sum of 6000*l.*; but, in order to prevent its misapplication, declared that it should be applied to the payment of certain specified debts. Offended by this vote, Clark immediately dissolved the assembly. At the election which ensued, the popular party was triumphant. In their second session, the house voted an address to the lieutenant-governor, in which, after stating some of the vital principles of free government, and referring to recent misapplications of money, they say, "We therefore beg leave to be plain with your honour, and hope you will not take it amiss when we tell you, that you are not to expect that we will either raise sums unfit to be raised, or put what we shall raise into the power of a governor to misapply, if we can prevent it; nor shall we make up any other deficiencies than what we conceive are fit and just to be paid; nor continue what support or revenue we shall raise for any longer time than one year; nor do we think it convenient to do even that, until such laws are passed as we conceive necessary for the safety of the inhabitants of this colony, who have reposed a trust in us for that only purpose, and which we are sure you will think it reasonable we should act agreeably to; and, by the grace of God, we shall endeavour not to deceive them." With men so resolute in maintaining their rights, Clark wisely declined to contend; and promised his cordial co-operation in all measures calculated to promote the prosperity of the colony. Harmony did not, however, long continue. Clark, in his speech at the opening of the next session, declared that unless the revenue was granted for as long a time as it had been granted by former assemblies, his duty to his majesty forbade him from assenting to any act for continuing the excise, or for paying the colonial bills of credit. The house unanimously resolved, that it would not pass any bill for the grant of money, unless assurance should be given that the excise should be continued and the bills of credit redeemed. The lieutenant-governor immediately ordered the members to attend him. He told them that "their proceedings were presumptuous, daring, and unprecedented, that he could not look upon them without astonishment, nor with honour suffer the house to sit any longer;" and he accordingly dissolved it. In April, 1740, the assembly again met. It had now risen to importance in the colony; and the adherence of the representatives, to their determination, not to grant the revenue for more than one year, made annual meetings of the assembly necessary. Their attachment to liberty was construed by the lieutenant-governor into a desire for independence: in a speech delivered in 1741, he alludes to "a jealousy which for some years had obtained in England, that the plantations were not without thoughts of throwing off their dependence on the crown."

George Clinton superseded Clark in the government of the colony in 1743. Like most of his predecessors he was welcomed with joy; and one of his earliest measures confirmed the favourable accounts which had preceded him, of his talents and liberality. To manifest his confidence in the people, he assented to a bill limiting the duration of the present and all succeeding assemblies. The house evinced its gratitude by adopting the measures he recommended for the defence of the province against the French, who were then at war with England. In 1745, the savages in alliance with France made frequent invasions of the English territories; and their hostilities were continued, with little intermission, till the war which terminated the French dominion in Canada.

In the middle of the seventeenth century, the whole colony of New York contained scarcely one hundred thousand inhabitants,* not half the number which the city of New York alone can now boast. That the population would have been much more numerous at this time, had not the inhabitants been so continually exposed to the irruptions of the French and their Indian allies, is evident from its rapid increase when those unfavourable circumstances ceased to exist. The consideration of this period belongs, however, to another department of the work.

CHAPTER VIII.

NEW JERSEY.

THE rival settlements of the Swedes and the Dutch in New Jersey have been referred to in the preceding chapter. It was not till the year 1640, that any attempt to colonize this portion of the continent was made by the English, and then they were successfully resisted. The Swedes built a fort on the spot from which the English had been driven; and thus acquiring the command of the river, claimed and exercised authority over all vessels that entered it, even those of the Dutch, their late associates. They continued in possession of the country on both sides of the Delaware until 1655, when the governor of the New Netherlands, as has already been related, conquered all their posts, and transported most of the Swedes to Europe. The Dutch, consequently, possessed themselves of the whole territory of New Jersey, New York, and Delaware.

* Smith's History of New York, p. 207.

The settlements in New Jersey shared the fate of those on the Hudson, when, in the year 1664, they were captured by the English, under Colonel Nichols. In the same year, the duke of York conveyed that portion of his grant lying between Hudson and Delaware rivers to Lord Berkeley and Sir George Carteret. This tract was called NEW JERSEY, in compliment to Sir George, who had been Governor of the island of Jersey, and had held it for the king in his contest with the parliament. The two proprietors formed a constitution for the colony, securing equal privileges and liberty of conscience to all, and appointed Philip Carteret governor, to whom, on his arrival in 1665, Nichols reluctantly surrendered the government. Carteret fixed the seat of government at Elizabeth Town, purchased land of the Indians, and sent agents into New England to invite settlers from that quarter. Recommended by the salubrity of its climate, in addition to many other advantages,* it is not surprising that New Jersey was soon considered a very desirable residence. The proprietaries, still buoyed up with the hope of revenue from their province, used every exertion to circulate the intelligence of its advantages, both in Europe and America, and vessels from England were freighted with settlers and stores to reinforce the numbers and supply the necessities of the colony. But the period to which they had looked for the fulfilment of their hopes only demonstrated their fallacy. The first demand of the quit-rents excited general disgust among the colonists, who refused to acknowledge the title of the proprietaries, and, in opposition to it, set up titles which they had obtained for themselves from the Indians. For two years the governor maintained an ineffectual struggle to enforce the claims of the proprietaries, till at length the popular discontent broke forth in an insurrection; and he was compelled to return to England, stripped of his functions, which the colonists forthwith conferred on a natural son of Sir George Carteret, by whom their pretensions had been abetted. It was impossible for the proprietaries to impute blame to their governor, or to hesitate to replace him. This measure, however, was retarded by the unexpected events of the following year, when New York for a short period reverted to the dominion of Holland, and New Jersey was re-united to the province of New Netherlands.

* Chalmers says, "It was in those days accounted by men of peculiar dispositions as worthy of the name of paradise, because it

When the treaty of London re-established the authority of England in New Jersey, the duke of York appointed Andros his lieutenant over his territories, extending from the western bank of the Connecticut to the farther shore of the Delaware, because he deemed his former grant of New Jersey annulled by the conquest. Andros took possession of his charge in November, 1674; confirming the late proceedings of the Dutch, because the law of nations had already declared them in force, and continuing the taxes imposed by the conquerors, because they supported his power. Lord Berkeley, dissatisfied with an estate which brought him neither profit nor honour, assigned his pretensions to William Penn and his three associates, who, perceiving the disadvantage of a joint proprietorship, divided the province with Carteret, and thus the country became partitioned into East and West Jersey. The former was released in July, 1676, by the assignees of Lord Berkeley, to Carteret, and he in return conveyed to them the latter, the government of which the duke retained as a dependency of New York, while that of the first was resigned to Carteret. These arrangements created a confusion of jurisdiction, and an uncertainty of property, which long distracted the people, and at length ended in the annihilation of the rule of the proprietors.

Philip Carteret returned to East Jersey in the beginning of 1675, and was now kindly received by the inhabitants, because they had felt the rigours of conquest, which had not been softened by Andros. Having postponed the payment of quit-rents to a future day, and published new concessions with regard to the tenure of lands, tranquillity was perfectly restored. Desirous to promote the commercial interests of the colony, because he perceived its neighbour growing great and rich by trade, Carteret began, in 1676, to clear out vessels from East Jersey; but he was steadily opposed by Andros, who claimed jurisdiction over the Jerseys, insisting that conquest by the Dutch divested the proprietors of all their rights. He forcibly seized, transported to New York, and there imprisoned, those magistrates who refused to acknowledge his authority. He imposed a duty upon all goods imported, and upon the property of all who came to settle in the country.

The inhabitants made repeated and energetic complaints of this injustice to the duke of York; and at length, wearied with their continual importunity, this prince consented to refer the matter to commissioners, who ultimately agreed to adhere to the opinion of Sir William Jones.

had no lawyers, or physicians, or parsons."—Political Annals p. 616.

The document containing the arguments in support of the views of the colonists, was drawn up by the celebrated William Penn and others, chiefly quakers, and is a fine specimen of the combined mildness and firmness in the pursuit of liberty, which characterize the proceedings of that sect and their associates. "To all prudent men," says the remonstrance, "the government of any place is more inviting than the soil. For what is good land without good laws? the better the worse. And if we could not assure people of an easy, and free, and safe government, both with respect to their spiritual and worldly property, — that is, an uninterrupted liberty of conscience, and an inviolable possession of their civil rights and freedoms, by a just and wise government, — a mere wilderness would be no encouragement; for it were a madness to leave a free, good, and improved country, to plant in a wilderness, and there adventure many thousands of pounds to give an absolute title to another person to tax us at will and pleasure. We humbly say, that we have lost none of our liberty by leaving our country; that the duty imposed upon us is without precedent or parallel; that, had we foreseen it, we should have preferred any other plantation in America. Besides, there is no limit to this power: since we are, by this precedent, taxed without any law, and thereby excluded from our English right of assenting to taxes, what security have we of any thing we possess? We can call nothing our own, but are tenants at will, not only for the soil, but for our personal estates. Such conduct has destroyed governments, but never raised one to any true greatness."

The commissioners pronounced their judgment, in conformity with the opinion of Sir W. Jones, "that as the grant to Berkeley and Carteret had reserved no profit or jurisdiction, the legality of the taxes could not be defended." In consequence of this adjudication, the duke resigned all his claims on West Jersey, and confirmed the province itself in the amplest terms to its new proprietaries; and soon after granted a similar release in favour of the representatives of Sir George Carteret in East Jersey. The whole of New Jersey thus rose to the rank of an almost independent state, maintaining only a federal connexion with the British crown.

The accession of numerous companies of settlers now rapidly promoted the population and prosperity of West Jersey. In the year 1681, the first representative assembly was held; and during its session were enacted the "Fundamental Constitutions," and other laws for the preservation of property, and the punishment of criminals.

Frequent disputes arising between the proprietary government of East Jersey and the colonists, the trustees of Sir George Carteret, apprehending they should derive little emolument from retaining the government under their control, offered their rights in the province for sale, and accepted the proposals of William Penn, to whom, and his associates, East Jersey was conveyed.* Among the new proprietors was the author of the well-known "Apology;" and his colleagues, by a unanimous vote, conferred on him the office of governor for life, with the extraordinary permission to appoint a deputy instead of his residing at the scene of his authority.

The number of proprietors, and the frequent transfers and subdivisions of shares, introduced such confusion in titles to land, and such uncertainty as to the rights of government, that, for twenty years afterwards, both Jerseys were frequently in a state of disturbance and disorder. In 1702, the proprietors, weary of contending with each other, and with the people, surrendered the right of government to the crown. Queen Anne reunited the two divisions, and appointed Lord Cornbury governor over the provinces of New Jersey and New York. From the period of his appointment till his deprivation of office, the history of New Jersey consists of little else than a detail of his contests with the colonial assemblies; and exhibits the resolution with which they opposed his arbitrary conduct, his partial distribution of justice, and his fraudulent misapplication of the public money. After repeated complaints, the queen yielded to the universal indignation; and he was superseded, in 1709, by Lord Lovelace.

These provinces continued, for several years, to be ruled by the same governor, but each chose a separate assembly. In 1738, the inhabitants, by petition to the king, desired that they might, in future, have a separate governor; and their request was granted.

The distance of New Jersey from Canada, the source of most of the Indian wars which afflicted the northern colonies, gave it a complete exemption from those direful calamities, while the Indian tribes in the neighbourhood, which were far from numerous, were almost always willing to cultivate a friendly relation with the Europeans. The gravity, simplicity, and courtesy of quaker manners, seem to have been particularly acceptable to these savages; and,

* Though Penn thus became a proprietary of East Jersey, his connexion both with its concerns, and with those of West Jersey, was henceforward almost merely nominal. He had now acquired added to the careful observation of the principles of equity in the proceedings of the colonists, established an amicable intercourse to the manifest advantage both of themselves and of the natives.

CHAPTER IX.

PENNSYLVANIA AND DELAWARE.

DURING a considerable period the colony of Delaware was attached to that of Pennsylvania, without even a separate assembly; and after it acquired that privilege, it remained for some time longer under the same governor: its history requires, therefore, to be blended with that of Pennsylvania, although it was settled at a much earlier period.

It does not appear that the date of the first European plantation on South River, or the Delaware, can now be ascertained with any precision; some authorities, however, assert, that a Swedish colony settled at Cape Henlopen as early as the year 1627; although Chalmers is of opinion that, "though various Europeans may have trafficked in Delaware, their plantations had not yet embellished her margin, probably in the year 1632." Shortly after that time, however, it is evident that a Swedish factory existed near the confluence of the Delaware on the eastern bank; for we find a governor of the Dutch colony of New Netherlands making a remonstrance on the subject, in which he declares "that the whole South River had been in the Dutch possession many years, above and below beset with forts, and sealed with their blood."* The Swedes, however, did not regard either the assertions or threats of their rivals, but continued their operations, which, through the limited extent of their means, did not extend beyond the purchase of some comparatively small tracts of land of the Indians. Being frequently molested by the Dutch, who claimed a right to the country, they built forts at Christina, Lewiston, and Tinicum. The last was their seat of government, and there John Printz, their governor, erected a mansion, which he named after himself.

The Dutch, jealous of the progress of the Swedes, in the year 1651 built a fort at New Castle. Printz considering this place to be within the territories of his government, formally protested against the proceeding. Risingh, his successor, made a visit, under the guise of friendship, to the commander of the fort, and being accompanied by thirty men, treacherously took possession of it while enjoying his hospitality. Peter Stuyvesant, the Dutch governor of New York, was not of a temper to permit an injury, thus committed, to pass unavenged. Accompanied by an armament, a part of which was furnished for the occasion by the city of Amsterdam, in Holland, he, in 1655, returned the visit of the Swedes. He first reduced the fort at New Castle; then that at Christina creek, where Risingh commanded; and afterwards the others. Some of the Swedes, on taking the oath of allegiance to Holland, were permitted to remain; the rest were sent to Europe. The settlements on the Delaware continued under the control of the Dutch, until 1664, when the New Netherlands were conquered by the English. They were considered as a part of New York, till, in the year 1682, William Penn purchased of the duke of York the town of New Castle, and the country twelve miles around it; and, by a subsequent purchase, obtained the land lying upon the Delaware, and between New Castle and Cape Henlopen. These tracts, which constitute the present state of Delaware, were called the "Territories," and were, for twenty years, governed as a part of Pennsylvania.

The colony which forms the chief subject of this chapter, was founded, in the year 1681, by the celebrated William Penn. A slight sketch of the early history of this remarkable man, will enable the reader more justly to appreciate his subsequent exertions. He was the son of Sir William Penn, a British admiral, who, under the protectorate of Cromwell, effected the conquest of the important island of Jamaica, and annexed it to the British empire. After the restoration of Charles II. he enjoyed high favour at court, and naturally entertained ambitious hopes of the advancement of his son, whom he had entered as a gentleman commoner at Oxford. He was, however, doomed to experience a bitter disappointment. Young Penn imbibed a strong predilection for quaker sentiments, which he had heard extolled by some itinerating member of that society. He espoused the cause with so much warmth, that, with several others, he was expelled the university. His father, having in vain endeavoured to prevail upon him to abandon his principles, at length devised a method of sapping what he could not overthrow; and for this purpose, sent his son to travel, with some young men of quality, in France. Quakerism and Christianity were checked alike, for a time, in the mind of Penn; but after his return, having repaired to Ireland to inspect an estate that belonged to his father, he met with the same itinerant preacher who had impressed his mind so powerfully ten years before. His quaker sentiments were now revived with increased zeal, and quickly produced a public and resolute expression of his attachment to the tenets of that sect. He could not even be persuaded to take off his hat in the presence of the king, or of his parent. For this inflexibility he was abandoned and denounced by his father. He then commenced itinerant preacher, and gained many proselytes. Though sometimes imprisoned, he still persevered; and such was his integrity and patience, that his father became reconciled to him. In 1668, he published a book, entitled, The Sandy Foundation Shaken, for which he was imprisoned seven months. In 1670, he was apprehended for preaching in the street, and was tried at the Old Bailey, where he pleaded his own cause with the magnanimity of a hero. The jury returned a verdict of not guilty. On the death of his father he received a plentiful estate, but he continued to preach, to write, and to be imprisoned as before; and it was chiefly owing to his exertions, in conjunction with those of Barclay and Keith, that the fraternity of the Friends was formed into order.

The attention of Penn to colonization was attracted by his connexion with New Jersey, which has been referred to in a former chapter. While he was engaged in the government of that territory, he received information of the country situate to the westward of the Delaware, which induced in his mind the desire of acquiring an estate in that quarter. He therefore presented a petition to Charles II., urging his claim for a debt incurred by the crown to his father, and soliciting a grant of land to the northward of Maryland, and westward of the Delaware. After a conference with the duke of York and Lord Baltimore, to ascertain that the grant would not interfere with any prior claims of theirs, a charter, making conveyance of that territory, was signed and sealed by the king. It constituted William Penn and his heirs true and absolute proprietaries of the province of Pennsylvania, saving to the crown their allegiance and the sovereignty. It gave him, his heirs, and their deputies, power to make laws, by advice of the freemen, and to erect courts of justice for the execution of those laws, provided they be not repugnant to the laws of England.*

* The following account of the origin of the name Pennsylvania, given by its founder, in a letter dated January 5, 1681, is curious and interesting. "This day," says Penn, "after many waitings, watchings, solicitings, and disputes, in council, my country was confirmed to me under the great seal of England, with large powers and privileges, by the name of Pennsylvania—a name the king would give it in honour of my father. I chose New Wales, being a hilly country; and when the secretary, a Welshman, refused to call it New Wales, I proposed Sylvania, and they added Penn to it; though I much opposed it, and went to the king to have it

The charter being thus obtained, Penn invited purchasers by public advertisement. Many single persons, and some families, chiefly of the denomination of quakers, were induced to think of a removal; and a number of merchants and others, forming themselves into a company, purchased twenty thousand acres of this land, which was sold at the rate of twenty pounds for every thousand acres. In May he despatched Markham, a relative, with a few associates, to take possession of the newly granted territory; and in the autumn three ships, with a considerable number of emigrants, sailed for the same destination. The philanthropic proprietor sent a letter to the Indians, informing them that "the great God had been pleased to make him concerned in their part of the world, and that the king of the country where he lived had given him a great province therein; but that he did not desire to enjoy it without their consent; that he was a man of peace, and that the people whom he sent were of the same disposition; and if any difference should happen between them, it might be adjusted by an equal number of men chosen on both sides." The position selected by these emigrants for their abode, was immediately above the confluence of the Schuylkill and the Delaware.

In the following April, Penn published "the frame of government for Pennsylvania." The chief intention of this famous charter was declared to be, "for the support of power in reverence with the people, and to secure the people from the abuse of power. For, liberty without obedience is confusion, and obedience without liberty is slavery." In prosecution of these salutary objects, the chief aim of the proprietary was to establish the supreme power, legislative and executive, upon proper principles. The assembly, therefore, was directed to consist at first of the whole of the freemen, afterwards of two hundred, but never to exceed five. A provincial council was established, consisting of seventy-two members, to be chosen by the freemen; of these counsellors there was to be an annual succession of twenty-four new ones, the same number annually going out; and the governor was to preside, invested with a treble vote. Thus composed, the council was not only invested with the whole executive powers, but, as in the Carolinian con-struck out. He said 'twas past, and he would take it upon him; nor could twenty guineas move the under-secretary to vary the name; for I feared it should be looked on as a vanity in me, and not as a respect in the king to my father, as it really was. Thou mayest communicate my grant to my friends, and expect shortly my proposals. 'Tis a dear and just thing, and my God, that has given it me through many difficulties, will, I believe, bless and make it the seed of a nation. I shall have a tender care to the government, that it be well laid at first."

stitutions, with the authority of preparing such bills as ought to be presented to the assembly. As a supplement to the frame of government, a body of laws, agreed upon in England by the adventurers, was published in May, which was intended as a great charter;* and Chalmers allows that "it does great honour to their wisdom as statesmen, to their morals as men, to their spirit as colonists."†

Of all the evidences of superior wisdom, none can be more decisive than entertaining ideas of moral truth, or devising plans of practical utility, which, though rejected in the times in which the individual lives, receive the sanction of future ages. This is eminently the case with Bacon and with Locke; and that it is no less so with the founder of Pennsylvania, the almost universal approbation of the principles on which his penal code was formed, fully attests. That system of laws justly claims for him the praise of original excellence and enlightened humanity; its regulations have been productive of lasting benefit to mankind. Only two capital crimes, treason and murder, were recognized by this code; and, in all other cases, the reformation of the offender was esteemed a duty not less imperative than the punishment of the offence. To this end it was enacted, that all prisons should be workhouses, where offenders might be reclaimed, by discipline and instruction, to habits of industry and morality, and political benefit deduced from the performance of Christian duty. The institutions that resulted from this benevolent enterprise, in legislation, have reflected honour on Pennsylvania, and diffused their advantages extensively in America and Europe. It is deeply to be regretted, however, that no civilized nation has been more slow in its mitigation of the cruel and bloody character of a penal code derived from a barbarous age, than our own.

To prevent all future pretence of claim to the province by the duke of York, or his heirs, Penn obtained of the duke his deed of release for it; and, as an additional territory, he procured of him also his right and interest in that tract of land, which was at first called the territories of Pennsylvania, afterwards "The three lower counties on Delaware."

Having completed these arrangements by the month of August, Penn embarked for America, accompanied by a considerable number of passengers, chiefly of his own religious sentiments. He landed at New Castle on the 24th of October; and the very next day the people were summoned to the court house, where, after possession of the country had been legally given him, he made a speech to the magistrates and the people, acquainting them with the design of his coming, and the nature and end of the government he came to establish; assuring them of liberty of conscience and civil freedom, and recommending them to live in sobriety and peace. He then proceeded to Upland, afterwards called Chester, and there called an assembly on the 4th of December. This assembly passed an act of union, annexing the three lower counties to the province;‡ and an act of settlement, in reference to the frame of government. The Dutch, Swedes, and other foreigners, were then naturalized; and all laws agreed on in England were passed in form. He selected the site, and marked out the plan, of an ex-

* "Among other regulations propounded in it, it was declared, that the character of freemen of the province should belong to all purchasers or renters of a hundred acres of land; to all servants or bondsmen who, at the expiring of their engagements, should cultivate the quota of land (fifty acres) allotted to them by law, and to all artificers and other inhabitants or residents who should pay scot and lot to the government; that no public tax should be levied from the people 'but by a law for that purpose made,' and that whoever should collect or pay taxes not so sanctioned, should be held a public enemy of the province, and a betrayer of its liberties; 'that all prisons shall be workhouses;' that a thief should restore twice the value of his theft, and, in default of other means adequate to such restitution, should work as a bondsman in prison for the benefit of the party injured; that the lands, as well as the personal property, of a debtor, should be responsible for his obligations, except in the case of his having lawful children, for whose use two thirds of the landed estate were appointed to be reserved; that all factors and correspondents in the province wronging their employers, should, in addition to complete restitution, pay a surplus amounting to a third of the sum they had unjustly detained; that all dramatic entertainments, games of hazard, sports of cruelty, and whatever else might contribute to promote ferocity of temper or habits of dissipation and irreligion, should be discouraged and punished; and 'that all children within this province, of the age of twelve years, shall be taught some useful trade or skill, to the end none may be idle, but the poor may work to live, and the rich, if they become poor, may not want.' This regulation, so congenial to primitive quaker sentiment, and to republican spirit and simplicity, was admirably calculated not less to promote fellow feeling than to secure independence. It contributed to preserve a sense of the natural equality of mankind, by recalling to every man's remembrance his original destination to labor; and while it tended thus to abate the pride and insolence of wealth, it operated no less beneficially to remedy the decay of fortune, peculiarly incident to wealthy settlers in a country where the dearness of all kinds of labour rendered idleness a much more expensive condition than in Europe. It was further declared, that no persons should be permitted to hold any office, or to exercise the functions of freemen, but 'such as profess faith in Jesus Christ, and are not convicted of ill fame, or unsober and dishonest conversation;' and that all persons acknowledging the one almighty and eternal God to be the creator, upholder, and ruler of the world, and professing to be conscientiously engaged to live peaceably and justly in society, should be wholly exempted from molestation for their more particular opinions and practices, and should never at any time be compelled to frequent or maintain any religious place, ministry, or worship whatever."—Grahame, vol. ii. p. 402—404.

‡ Until this union with Pennsylvania, these counties, from the year 1667, had been holden as an appendage to the government of New York. Encyclop. Brit. vol. v. p. 719. The want of the royal authority for this act, with the operation of other causes, produced difficulties, which afterwards rendered this union void; and the three lower counties had a separate assembly, though under the same governor. Belknap, Biog. vol. ii. p. 412. Franklin, p. 16.

tensive city, to which he gave the name of Philadelphia, or the city of love. Before the end of the year it contained eighty dwellings.

The colonies in general merit little praise for their wisdom and discretion in their conduct with the Indians. They were too prone to look on the wild man as an inferior being, and set themselves up as lords over his rights and property, without remembering that they were intruders on his soil, or condescending to meet him, even in the land of his fathers, on equal and amicable terms. But the memorable interview of Penn with the Indians, on the banks of the Delaware, exhibited a different scene;* the even scales of justice, and the mild persuasion of Christian love, were the powerful engines with which he swayed the barbarian mind, and taught the savage to confide in the sincerity of the white man; and the first page in the annals of Pennsylvania is one of the brightest in the history of mankind, recording an event not more to the credit of the wise and benevolent legislator through whose agency it happened, than honourable to humanity itself. At a spot which is now the site of one of the suburbs of Philadelphia, the Indian sachems, at the head of their assembled warriors, awaited in arms the approach of the quaker deputation. Penn, distinguished from his followers only by a sash of blue silk, and holding in his hand a roll of parchment that contained the confirmation of the treaty, arrived, at the head of an unarmed train, carrying various articles of merchandise, which, on their approach to the sachems, were spread on the ground. He addressed the natives through an interpreter, assuring them of his friendly and peaceable intentions; and certainly the absence of all warlike weapons was a better attestation of his sincerity than a thousand oaths. The conditions of the proposed purchase were then read; and he delivered to the sachems not only the stipulated price, but a handsome present of the merchandise which he had spread before them. He concluded by presenting the parchment to the sachems, and requesting that they would carefully preserve it for three generations. The Indians cordially acceded to his propositions, and solemnly pledged themselves to live in love with William Penn and his children as long as the sun and moon should endure.†

The prudence with which Penn conducted himself was strictly consistent with a sincere attachment to his own opinions. He evidently appreciated more correctly the rights of his fellow-men than his northern neighbours, the puritan colonists. He believed, and acted on the belief, that the Indians had as much right to hold the peculiarities of their creed, as he had to hold his own religious tenets; and he never gave them unnecessary offence by treating their sentiments with bitterness, or, what is more keenly felt, by contempt.‡ This prudent conduct, together with a still more extraordinary reliance upon the protection of Providence in refusing to maintain any armed force, although surrounded with the warlike aborigines, was attended by a no less singular exemption from evils arising to every other European colony without exception, from the neighbourhood of the Indian tribes. Whatever animosity the Indians might conceive against the European neighbours of the Pennsylvanians, or even against Pennsylvanian colonists who did not belong to the quaker society, they never failed to discriminate the followers of Penn, as persons whom it was impossible for them to include within the pale of legitimate hostility. This unique and interesting fact has, doubtless, availed more than all arguments in support of the alleged immorality of all kinds of resistance which can result in the deprivation of human life.

Irrespective of the peculiar talents and character of the founder, none of the colonies commenced under such favorable auspices as that of Pennsylvania. The experience of half a century had disclosed the evils to be avoided, and pointed out the course to be pursued. The soil being fertile, the climate temperate, and the game abundant, the first emigrants escaped most of the calamities which afflicted the more northern and southern provinces, and the increase of population exceeded all former example.

A second assembly was held at Philadelphia, in March, 1683. During this session, Penn created a second frame of government, to which he readily

* Tradition tells us, that the treaty of 1682 was held at Shackamaxon, under the wide-spread branches of the great elm-tree which grew near the margin of the Delaware, and which was prostrated during a storm in the year 1810. The trunk measured twenty-four feet in circumference, and its age was ascertained to be two hundred and eighty-three years, having been a hundred and fifty-five years old at the time of the treaty. This tree Mr. West has introduced into his celebrated picture representing the treaty. The first deed of the Indians is dated June 23, 1683.—Memoirs of Pennsylvania Historical Society, vol. i. pp. 65, 82, 96, 97.

† Penn's letter, containing an account of the climate, products, and native inhabitants of the country, though too long to insert in this work, will well repay the perusal of the curious. It is to be found in Proud's History of Pennsylvania, vol. ii. ch. v.

‡ "The following adventure, indicative of his extreme caution of giving offence, was communicated by Penn himself to Oldmixon. He was visiting an Indian sachem, and had retired for the night, when a young woman, the sachem's daughter, approaching his bed, lay down beside him. Penn was much shocked; but, unwilling to offend by rejecting an intended compliment, he lay still without taking any notice of her, till she thought proper to return to her own couch. Vol. i. p. 398, second edition. A New England pa-

procured the assent of the assembly. This frame diminished the number of the council and assembly, and was in other respects different from the first. It was ordained, "that to prevent lawsuits, three arbitrators, to be called peace-makers, should be chosen by the county courts, to hear and determine small differences between man and man; that children should be taught some useful trade, to the end that none might be idle, that the poor might work to live, and the rich if they should become poor; that factors wronging their employers should make satisfaction, and one third over; that every thing which excites the people to rudeness, cruelty, and irreligion, should be discouraged, and severely punished; * that no one, acknowledging one God, and living peaceably in society, should be molested for his opinions or his practice, or compelled to frequent or maintain any ministry whatever." This assembly also established various salutary regulations. Abrogating the common law with regard to the descent of land, which had been introduced by the charter, it enacted, "that the estate of the intestate shall be disposed of, one third of the personal property absolutely, and one third of the lands during life, to the widow, two thirds of both among the children, the eldest son having a double share." However consonant it might have been to feudal principles to give the lands of the feudary undiminished to him who was first able to defend them, this policy was extremely unsuitable to colonists who had a wilderness to cultivate; evidently, by giving property to every one, the exertions of all were invigorated. By the promulgation of such laws, the growing prosperity of the province was promoted; and to their salutary influence must be attributed the qualities of diligence, order, and economy, for which the Pennsylvanians are so justly celebrated. Within four years from the date of the grant to Penn, the province contained twenty settlements, and Philadelphia two thousand inhabitants.

Having received information from his agent that his presence was necessary in England, Penn departed from America in August, 1684, leaving his province in profound peace, under the administration of five commissioners chosen from the provincial council. The unfortunate James II. ascended the throne soon after Penn's arrival. "As he has," said Penn, "been my friend, and my father's friend, I feel bound in justice to be a friend to him." He adhered to him while seated on the throne; and for two years after he was expelled from his kingdom, the government of the province was administered in his name. By this display of attachment to the exiled monarch, he incurred the displeasure of William III. On vague suspicion and unfounded charges, he was four times imprisoned. The king took the government of Pennsylvania into his own hands; and Colonel Fletcher was appointed governor of this province, as well as of New York. On the arrival of Colonel Fletcher at Philadelphia, the persons in the administration appear to have surrendered the government to him, without any notice or order to them, either from the crown or the proprietary. By the severest scrutiny, however, it was rendered apparent, that Penn had not suffered personal gratitude to lead him to any serious dereliction of duty, and he consequently regained the good opinion of King William; and being permitted to resume and exercise his rights, he appointed William Markham to be his deputy-governor.

In the year 1696, the assembly having presented a remonstrance to Governor Markham, complaining of the breach of their chartered privileges, a bill of settlement, prepared and passed by the assembly, was approved by the governor, forming the third frame of government in Pennsylvania. A bill for raising 300*l.*, professedly for the relief of the distressed Indians beyond Albany, but really in compliance with the demand of the governor of New York, to aid in the prosecution of the war, was passed by the same legislature.†

During several years the colony continued in a course of prosperity, without any occurrence requiring historical record. In the year 1699, Penn revisited his Pennsylvanian associates, accompanied by his family, with an intention of spending the remainder of his life amongst them. Several circumstances now existed, which occasioned differences of opinion between himself and the legislature; more particularly that prolific source of evil—negro slavery, and the frauds and abuses that disgraced the character of the colonists in their traffic with the Indians. With the view of providing a remedy for both these evils, he presented to the assembly three bills which he had himself prepared; the first, for regulating the morals and marriages of the negroes; the second, for regulating the trials and punishments of the negroes; and the third, for preventing abuses and frauds upon the triarch, in such circumstances, would probably have excited the enmity of the whole Indian tribe by his expressions of disgust and reprobation."—Grahame, vol. ii. p. 415.

* Some of these clauses, it will be perceived, were only re-enactments of the resolutions of the first assembly.

† Dr. Franklin mentions an instance some years after, of a requisition addressed to the assembly of Pennsylvania for a grant of 2000*l.* for the purchase of gunpowder; to which the assembly replied, that, consistently with quaker principles, they could not grant a farthing for such a purpose, but had voted 2000*l.* for the purchase of grain.

Indians. The assembly instantly negatived the first and last of these bills, acceding only to that which related to the trial and punishment of their slaves. Though disappointed of the more extensive influence, which, as a political legislator, he had hoped to exercise, he was yet able, in his ecclesiastical ministry among the quakers, to introduce into their discipline regulations and practices relative to the purposes of the rejected bills, the spirit of which, at least, was, by the example of this powerful sect, forcibly recommended to general imitation. But the progress of reform, by moral causes, is slow; the enactment of laws must follow up and sustain whatever is gained by persuasion. The memory is assisted by the written page, while we soon forget the voice of entreaty, however strong the argument.

Penn had now determined again to leave America and return to England, and he naturally desired to have some frame of government finally established before his departure. In 1701, he prepared and presented one to the assembly, which was accepted. It confirmed to them, in conformity with that of 1696, the right of originating bills, which, by the charters preceding that date, had been the right of the governor alone, and of mending or rejecting those which might be laid before them. To the governor it gave the right of rejecting bills passed by the assembly, of appointing his own council, and of exercising the whole executive power.

Immediately after his fourth frame was accepted, Penn returned to England; but he had scarcely arrived there, when the disputes between the province and the territories broke forth with greater bitterness than ever; and in the following year, the separate legislature of Delaware was permanently established at Newcastle. In addition to the tidings of these prolonged disagreements, and of the final rupture between the two settlements, Penn was harassed by complaints against the administration of Governor Evans; and having ascertained, by a deliberate examination of them, that they were too well founded, he appointed in his place Charles Gookin, a gentleman of ancient Irish family, who seemed qualified to give satisfaction to the people over whom he was sent to preside. Finding his people still in a discontented state, Penn, now in his sixty-sixth year, for the last time addressed the assembly, in a letter replete with calm solemnity and dignified concern. This letter is said to have produced a deep and powerful impression on the more considerate part of the assembly, who now began to feel for the father of his country, and to regard with tenderness his venerable age; to remember his long labours and to appreciate their own interest in his distinguished fame: but it is very doubtful if this change of sentiment was ever known to its illustrious object, who was attacked shortly afterwards by a succession of apoplectic fits, which impeded, in a great degree, the exercise of his memory and understanding, and ultimately terminated his life.

It would be injustice to suffer the great founder of the Pennsylvanian republic to pass from our view without glancing at the excellencies of his character. The keenness of foresight, the sagacity and penetration of judgment, the fertility in inventing, and clearness of discernment in applying resources, which the events of his life display, are no less remarkable than the pure spirit of universal benevolence, which seems to have been the governing principle of all his actions, as it was the leading tenet in his particular views of religion. By steadily adhering to the maxims of gospel charity in the establishment of his commonwealth, he secured it against many of those violent shocks, which at that time threatened the dissolution of some of the elder and more robust colonies, especially from the hostility of the savages, over whom, by pacific measures, kind treatment, probity, and equitable dealing, he gained an ascendancy far more complete than any exhibition of military force could have acquired. It is not strictly true, indeed, as asserted by some writers, that he was the first of the colonists to treat with the savages on an equal footing, and to obtain their lands by honourable purchase; for numerous instances occur in the history of other colonies, where the same respect was shown to the primeval lords of the soil: but although William Penn did not first set the example of this moderation, he and his followers alone persevered in the practice of it, and thus preserved the good will of their savage neighbours, while, in other parts of the country, a different course of conduct on the part of the colonists subjected them to a series of wasteful and vindictive wars, which ended only with the extermination of some of the most powerful among the aboriginal tribes. The same enlightened spirit of benevolence, which led Penn to consult his true interest in adopting peaceful means of avoiding the enmity of the savages, dictated the memorable clause in the code drawn up by him for the use of his colony, that "all persons living in the province, who confess and acknowledge the one almighty and eternal God to be the creator, upholder, and ruler of the world, and hold themselves obliged in conscience to live peaceably and justly in civil society, shall in no wise be molested for their religious persuasion or practice in matters of faith and worship." The constant assertion of this golden rule of civil society, and that too by one whose life and fortune were devoted to the task of gaining proselytes for that peculiar sect of which he was so illustrious a member, evinces a liberality of feeling rarely equalled in that or any other age.

The legislatures and governors continuing to act on the noble principles and example which their founder left for their imitation, the colony acquired, by well-conducted purchases from the Indians, a most extensive and unembarrassed territory, and proceeded rapidly in its prosperous course. The only circumstance which appears to have created any internal disunion worthy of notice, was a dispute between the governors and the assembly, on the question of exempting the land of the proprietaries from the general taxation—a claim which the inhabitants deemed very inequitable. In January, 1757, the assembly of Pennsylvania voted a bill for granting to his majesty the sum of 100,000*l.* by a tax on all the estates, real and personal, and taxables, within the province. On submitting it to Governor Denny for his sanction, he refused it. “The proprietaries,” he observed in his message, “are willing their estates should be taxed in the manner that appears to them to be reasonable, and agreeable to the land-tax acts of parliament in our mother country.” He stated, that “his majesty’s service, and the defence of this province, render it necessary to raise immediate supplies;” and earnestly recommended it to the assembly to frame such a bill as it was in his power to pass, “consistent with his honour, and his engagements to the proprietaries.” The message was regarded as an invasion of the rights of the colonists; and the assembly remonstrated with the governor. In that spirited document they say, “We have, in the due exercise of our just rights by the royal and provincial charters, and the laws of this province, and as an English representative body, framed this bill consistent with those rights.” Having assigned their reasons to sustain the remonstrance, they conclude it in these words: “We do therefore, in the name of our most gracious sovereign, and in behalf of the distressed people we represent, unanimously demand it of the governor as our right, that he give his assent to the bill we now present him, for granting to his majesty 100,000*l.* for the defence of this province, (and as it is a money-bill, without alteration or amendment, any instructions whatsoever from the proprietaries notwithstanding,) as he will answer to the crown for all the consequences of his refusal at his peril.” This declaration produced no other effect upon the governor, than that of confirming his refusal, and of drawing from him a laboured justification, “grounded upon parliamentary usage in England, and the supposed hardship of taxing the unimproved lands of the proprietaries.” The governors of Pennsylvania thus adhering to their instructions, not to assent to any tax bill that did not exempt the estates of the proprietaries, the assembly of that province deputed the celebrated Benjamin Franklin as an agent to London, to petition the king for redress. The subject was discussed before the privy council; and Mr. Franklin acceded to a proposal to enter into engagements that the assessments should be fair and equitable, a bill for levying a general tax, which had previously received the governor’s assent, though after the agent’s departure from the province, was stamped with the royal approbation. These disputes, by calling the energetic mind of Benjamin Franklin into a new field of exertion, enlarged the sphere of his observation, and fitted him for those extraordinary services in which he acquired his greatest glory by contributing to that of his country.

CHAPTER X.

MARYLAND.

THE founder of the state of Maryland was Cecil, Lord Baltimore. His father had been secretary of state to James I., and one of the original associates of the Virginia Company. He visited that colony in the year 1622, to ascertain if some portion of its rich territory could not be rendered subservient to the interests of his family, and at the same time afford a desirable retreat for persecuted professors of the Romish faith, to which he had become a convert. He subsequently prevailed on Charles I. to bestow on him the desired grant, and had made considerable preparations for carrying his design into effect, when death put an end to his projects, which were, however, adopted, and zealously prosecuted by his son. On his behalf, the king, in June, 1632, executed the charter which his father had solicited; and conferred on the new colony the title of Maryland, as a tribute of respect to Henrietta Maria, his queen. The new province was declared to be separated from Virginia, to which its territory had belonged, and subject only to the crown of England. Lord Baltimore was created the absolute proprietary of it, and was empowered, with the assent of the freemen, or their delegates, whom he was required to assemble for that purpose, to make laws for the province, and to administer them. The territory was erected into a palatinate; and the proprietary was invested with all the royal rights of the palace, as fully as any Bishop of Durham had ever enjoyed ; he was authorized to appoint officers, to repel invasions, and to suppress rebellions ; what is still more remarkable, the charter contained no obligation on the proprietary to transmit the acts of assembly for confirmation or disallowance by the king ; and it also possessed the peculiarity of being the first example of the dismemberment of a colony, and the creation of a new one within its limits, by the mere act of the crown.

Having obtained so favourable a charter, Lord Baltimore proceeded to carry its provisions into execution. He appointed his brother, Leonard Calvert, governor of the new province, and concurred with him in the equipment of vessels, which conveyed a numerous body of emigrants, chiefly Roman Catholics, and many of them gentlemen of rank and fortune. After a circuitous voyage, the governor arrived, accompanied by his brother George, at Point Comfort, in Virginia, in February, 1634. Early in March, he proceeded up the bay of Chesapeake to the northward, and entered the Potomack, up which he sailed twelve leagues, and came to an anchor under an island, which he named St. Clement. Here he erected a cross, and took possession "in the name of the Saviour of the world, and of the king of England." Thence he went fifteen leagues higher to the Indian town of Potomack on the Virginia side of the river, now called New Marlborough, where he was received in a friendly manner. Arriving at the town of Piscatawa, on the Maryland side, he found Henry Fleet, an Englishman, who had resided several years among the natives, and was held by them in great esteem, who was very serviceable as an interpreter. An interview having been procured with the werowance, or prince, Calvert asked him, whether he was willing that a settlement should be made in his country ; he replied, "I will not bid you go, neither will I bid you stay ; but you may use your own discretion." Having convinced the natives that his designs were honourable and pacific, the governor now sought a suitable station for commencing his colony. He visited a creek on the northern side of the Potomack, on which he found an Indian village. Here he acquainted the prince of the place with his intentions, and by presents to him and his principal men, conciliated his friendship so much as to obtain permission to reside in one part of the town until next harvest, when it was agreed that the natives should entirely quit the place. Both parties entered into a contract to live together in a friendly manner. After Calvert had given a satisfactory consideration, the Indians readily yielded a number of their houses, and retired to the others. Thus, on the 27th of March, 1634, the governor took peaceable possession of the country of Maryland, and gave to the town the name of St. Mary, and to the creek, on which it was situate, the name of St. George. The desire of rendering justice to the natives by giving them a reasonable compensation for their lands, is a trait in the character of the first planters, which will always do honour to their memory.

Circumstances favoured the rapid population of the colony. The charter granted more ample privileges than had ever been conceded to a subject ; the country was inviting ; the natives were friendly ; from the south churchmen drove puritans, from the north puritans drove churchmen, into her borders, where all were freely received, protected, and cherished. The colony was soon able to export Indian corn and other products to New England and Newfoundland, for which they received in return dried fish and other provisions. The Indians also killed many deer and turkies, which they sold to the English for knives, beads, and other small articles of traffic, while cattle, swine, and poultry, were procured from Virginia.

During the first years of the colony, when the freemen were few in number, each attended the general assembly in person, or authorized some other freeman to vote in his stead. The increase of population, however, soon rendered it necessary to adopt a different mode of legislation ; and in 1639 an act was passed, constituting a house of assembly, to be composed of such as should be chosen by the people, of such as should be summoned or appointed by the proprietor, and of the governor and secretary. These were to meet together, and the laws which they should frame were to possess the same validity as though the proprietors and all the people had concurred in enacting them. The colony was not entirely free from internal troubles. In the year 1631, Charles I. had granted a license to one William Cleyborne, who was described as one of the council, and secretary of state of Virginia, "to traffic in those parts of America for which there is already no patent granted for sole trade." Cleyborne and his associates, with the spirit of exclusion so common in those days, attempted to monopolize the trade of the Chesapeake ; and with this intent, they appear to have planted a small colony on the isle of Kent, which commands both the shores of Chesapeake Bay, where it washes Annapolis, the present capital of Maryland. The Virginians boasted that the colonists of Kent sent burgesses to their assembly, and were subjected to their jurisdiction before Maryland had a name, and the province found abundant cause to regret, that a people had taken up their abode within its limits, who paid unwilling obedience to its laws. Cleyborne continued to claim Kent Island, and to refuse submission to the jurisdiction of Maryland. Lord Baltimore, however, gave orders, in September, 1634, to seize the refractory trader, if he did not submit to his government; judging wisely, that subordination would cease, should an independent jurisdiction be established in the centre of his province. Still continuing to resist, and to excite rebellion in others, he was at length indicted, and found guilty of murder, piracy, and sedition; but he fled from justice, and his estate was seized, as forfeited to those laws which he had formerly contemned as invalid. The afflictions of this period are indicated by a statute of the assembly, which recites, "that the province had been wasted by a miserable dissension and unhappy war, which had been closed by the joyful restitution of a blessed peace." To promote the restoration of tranquillity and mutual confidence, an act of general pardon and oblivion was passed, from the benefits of which only a few leading characters were excepted; and all actions were discharged for wrongs that might have been perpetrated during the revolt. "By a singular reverse of fortune," says Chalmers, "Cleyborne lived to command in the province whence he was now driven with infamy, to feel the pangs of old age when accompanied with poverty, to apply to a prince for support, whose beneficence was not even extended to those who had suffered for his family and himself."*

It is a fact, which reflects the greatest credit on these early colonists, that fifteen years after they first landed, the general assembly of the people passed an act, entitled, "An Act concerning Religion," in which the great principles of religious toleration and liberty are so extensively recognised. The following is an extract from the act itself: "Whereas the enforcing of the conscience in matters of religion hath frequently fallen out to be of dangerous consequence in those commonwealths where it hath been practised; and for the more quiet and peaceable government of this province, and the better to preserve mutual love and unity among the inhabitants, no person or persons whatsoever, within this province, or the islands, ports, harbours, creeks, or havens thereunto belonging, professing to believe in Jesus Christ, shall from henceforth be any ways troubled, molested, or discountenanced, for, or in respect of, his or her religion, nor in the free exercise thereof, within this province, or the islands thereunto belonging, nor any way compelled to the belief or exercise of any religion against his or her consent, so that they be not unfaithful to the lord proprietary, or molest or conspire against the civil government established, or to be established, in this province, under him or his heirs."† This law was passed by an assembly composed entirely of Roman Catholics, and is the more remarkable, as being the first legislative act which is recorded to have been passed by any government, administered by members of the Romish hierarchy, in favour of the unlimited toleration of all Christian sects.

In 1650, the legislative body was divided into two branches—the delegates chosen by the people constituting the lower house, and the persons summoned by the proprietors, the upper house. An act of recognition of the undoubted right of Lord Baltimore to the proprietaryship of the province was passed in the same session. The assembly not only submitted to his authority, but obliged its constituents and their posterity for ever to defend him and his heirs in his royal rights, and besought him to accept this act as a testimony of gratitude for the manifold benefits which the colony had derived from him. In prosecution of its patriotic labours, the assembly also proceeded to enact laws for the relief of the poor, and the encouragement of agriculture and commerce; and a short season of prosperity preceded the calamities which the province was again to experience from the evil genius of Cleyborne, and the interposition of the parent state.

After the parliament had triumphed over the king, they appointed commissioners for reducing and governing the colonies within the bay of Chesapeake, among whom was Cleyborne. The proprietor of Maryland, on acknowledging the authority of the parliament, was permitted to retain his station, but was unable to preserve tranquillity. The distractions of England, finding their way into the colony, occasioned a civil war, which ended in the discomfiture of the Roman Catholics. The next assembly, which was entirely under the influence of Cleyborne and the victorious party, ordained that persons professing the catholic religion should not be considered within the protection of the laws; the catholics being thus ungratefully persecuted by men whom they had taken to their bosom, and in a colony which they had founded. Laws unfavourable to the quakers were also enacted; and here, as in England, the upper house was voted to be useless. At the restoration, in 1660, Philip Calvert was appointed governor, and the ancient order of things was restored. The recent usurpations were passed over in silence, and buried in a generous oblivion; toleration was re-established, and the inhabitants of Maryland once more experienced the blessings of a mild government and internal tranquillity.* General subordination had manifestly the effect of quickening the march of prosperity; industry, amply recompensed, was animated and cheerful, and closely connected with independence and improvement of condition was general respect. To such a degree did this arise, that it became common for ruined tradesmen and indigent labourers in England to repair to this colony for retrieving or improving their condition. No emigrants were more successful in bettering their condition than female servants; they invariably obtained an immediate and respectable establishment in marriage.†

In 1676, Cecil, Lord Baltimore, the father of the province, died. For more than forty years he had directed its affairs as proprietor, and displayed in all his conduct a benevolent heart and enlightened understanding. Although he lived in an age of bigotry, he was liberal in his opinions; and for all his exertions to contribute to the happiness of his fellow-beings, he desired no reward but their gratitude. This reward he received. The records of the Maryland assembly contain frequent memorials of the respect and affection of the people. He was succeeded, as proprietor, by his eldest son, Charles, who had for several years been governor of the colony, and displayed the same amiable qualities which had rendered his father respected and beloved. The closing years of the proprietary government were embittered by a circumstance similar to that which the institution of the colony of Maryland had inflicted on Virginia. The grant which had been made by Charles II. to the celebrated Penn included the territory of Delaware, which Lord Baltimore had always considered within the limits of his patent. On the arrival of William Penn in America, a meeting took place between him and Lord Baltimore, in the hope of effecting an amicable adjustment of the boundaries of their respective territorial grants. But the pretensions of the parties were so completely incompatible that it proved impossible at the time to adjust them in a manner satisfactory to both. Penn ultimately complained to the English government, and, by his interest at court, procured it to be adjudged that the debateable territory should be divided into two equal parts, one of which was appropriated to himself, and the other to Lord Baltimore. This adjudication was carried into effect; and the territory which now composes the state of Delaware was thus dismembered from the provincial limits of Maryland.

In the year following the revolution of 1688, the repose of Maryland was again disturbed. A rumour was artfully circulated, that the catholics had leagued with the Indians to destroy all the protestants in the province. An armed association was immediately formed, for the defence of the protestant religion, and for asserting the rights of King William and Queen Mary. The magistrates attempted to oppose this association by force; but, meeting with few supporters, they were compelled to abdicate the government. King William directed those who had assumed the supreme authority to exercise it in his name; and for twenty-seven years the crown retained the entire control of the province. In 1716, the proprietor was restored to his rights; and he and his descendants continued to enjoy them until the commencement of the revolution. The people then assumed the government, adopted a constitution, and refused to admit the claims of the representatives of Lord Baltimore either to jurisdiction or to property.

CHAPTER XI.

NORTH AND SOUTH CAROLINA.

THE interesting though calamitous attempts of the French protestants, under the brave Admiral Coligny, to colonize that part of North America which constitutes the subject of the present chapter, but which was then known under the general denomination of Florida, have already been related. Those which were made in the reign of Elizabeth by Raleigh and Gilbert, have been comprised in the history of Virginia, of which colony the territory which now constitutes the Carolinas then formed a part. It was not till the year 1630, that Sir Robert Heath, attorney-general of Charles I., obtained a grant of a territory stretching to the southward of Virginia from the 36th degree of north latitude, comprehending Louisiana, by the name of Carolina. He appears to have made no settlement, and, subsequently, his patent was declared void, the conditions on which it had been granted not having been fulfilled. Between the years 1640 and 1650, persons suffering from religious intolerance in Virginia fled beyond her limits, and, without authority from any quarter, occupied that portion of North Carolina north of Albemarle Sound. They found the winters mild, and the soil fertile; and as their cattle and swine procured their own support in the woods, and multiplied rapidly, with little labour they lived in the enjoyment of comparative abundance. Their number annually augmented: but they acknowledged no superior upon earth, and obeyed no laws but those of God and nature. Several families from Massachusetts also migrated to Carolina, and settled about Cape Fear; but as the lands where they fixed themselves were not equally productive with those they had relinquished, and as the waters did not afford the same advantages of fishery, they for some years experienced the complicated miseries of want; and the general court of Massachusetts, with an attention and humanity which do it honour, directed a general contribution for their relief.*

The final settlement of this country originated with the earl of Clarendon, and other courtiers of Charles II. On their application for a charter, he granted them all the lands lying between the 31st and 36th degrees of north latitude; and he constituted them absolute lords and proprietors of that tract of country, reserving to himself and his successors the sovereign dominion. The charter empowered them to enact and publish any laws which they should judge necessary, with the assent, advice, and approbation of the freemen of the colony; to erect courts of judicature, and appoint civil judges, magistrates, and officers; to erect forts, castles, cities, and towns; to make war, and, in cases of necessity, to exercise martial law; to build harbours, make ports, and enjoy customs and subsidies, imposed with the consent of the freemen, on goods loaded and unloaded. One of the provisions of this charter deserves particular notice. The king authorized the proprietors to allow the inhabitants of the province such indulgences and dispensations in religious affairs, as they, in their discretion, should think proper and reasonable: and no person, to whom such liberty should be granted, was to be molested, punished, or called in question, for any differences in speculative opinions with respect to religion, provided he disturbed not the civil order and peace of the community. The reason assigned in the charter for such a dispensing power is, "that it might happen that several of the inhabitants could not, in their private opinions, conform to the exercise of religion according to the liturgy and ceremonies of the church of England."† The privy council, considering the present condition of Carolina, decided that all former grants were now void, because they had never been executed.

Animated by this decision, the proprietors held their first meeting in May, 1663, to agree on measures for the transporting of colonists, and for the payment of various expenses; and they now published proposals to all who would plant in Carolina. Among other privileges, it was decided, that the emigrants present to the proprietaries thirteen persons, in order that they may appoint a governor and a council of six for three years; that an assembly, composed of the governor, the council, and the delegates of the freemen, should be called as soon as the circumstances of the colony would allow, with power to make laws, provided they were not contrary to the laws of England, nor of any validity after the publication of the dissent of the proprietaries; that every one should enjoy the most perfect freedom in religion; that, during five years, every freeman should be allowed one hundred acres of land, and fifty for every servant, paying one halfpenny only an acre; and that the same freedom from customs which had been allowed by the royal charter, should be allowed to every one. The settlers on Albemarle Sound were, on certain conditions, allowed to retain their lands. A government was organized over them, at the head of which a Mr. Drummond was placed. With the regulations imposed they were dissatisfied, and they revolted; but their grievances were redressed, and, in 1668, they returned to their allegiance. Notwithstanding the high professions of the proprietaries, not the slightest attempt was made to provide for the spiritual instruction of the colonists, or the conversion of the Indians; and the colony continued for a series of years without any form of public worship.

Having taken the command of the infant settlement at Albemarle, the proprietaries directed a survey of the coast to the southward, and projected the establishment of a new colony in Clarendon country, which had been recently abandoned by the emigrants from New England. In furtherance of this object, they conferred on John Yeamans, a respectable planter of Barbadoes, the appointment of commander-in-chief of Clarendon country. In the autumn, he conducted from Barbadoes a body of emigrants, who landed on the southern bank of Cape Fear. He cultivated the good will of the natives, and insured a seven years peace. The planters, in opening the forest to make room for the operations of tillage, "necessarily prepared timber for the uses of the cooper and builder, † Mem. de l'Amerique, vol. iv. p. 554—585, where is a copy of the charter, in English and French, dated March 24th, 1662—April 1th, 1663. The charter states, that the applicants, "excited by a laudable and pious zeal for the propagation of the gospel, beg a certain country in the parts of America not yet cultivated and planted, and only inhabited by some barbarous people, who have no knowledge of God." The applicants, besides the earl of Clarendon, were George duke of Albemarle, William Lord Craven, John Lord Berkeley, Anthony Lord Ashley, Sir George Carteret, Sir William Berkeley, and Sir John Colleton. The grant included the territories of what afterwards constituted North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia.

which they transmitted to the island whence they had emigrated, as the first subject of a feeble commerce, that kindled the spark of industry which soon gave animation to the whole.* Another settlement was also projected to the southward of Cape Remain, which received the name of Carteret, and was placed under a separate governor. "The policy which the proprietaries were thus pursuing, in the establishment of a variety of separate and independent colonies in Carolina, each of which had its own distinct assembly, customs, and laws, supplied them at a future period with ample cause of regret, and contributed to the prolonged feebleness and distractions by which this province was unhappily distinguished."†

By the surveys which had been made under their direction, the proprietors had now ascertained, that several tracts of land not included in the terms of their previous grant, would form a very desirable accession; they therefore solicited, and obtained from the king, a second charter. It recited and confirmed the former grant, with the additional territory. Carolina was declared independent of any other province, but subject immediately to the crown of England; and the inhabitants were never to be compelled to answer in other dominions of the crown, excepting within the realm. The limits of the territory are thus defined: "All that province, territory, or tract of ground, situate within our dominions of America, extending north and eastward as far as the north end of Carahtuke River, or gullet, upon a straight westerly line, to Wyanoake Creek, which lies within or about the degrees of 36 and 30 minutes northern latitude, and so west, in a direct line as far as the South Seas; and south and westward as far as the degrees of 29 inclusive northern latitude, and so west, in a direct line, as far as the South Seas, together with all and singular ports, harbours, bays, rivers, and islets, belonging to the province or territory aforesaid."‡ According to the limits fixed in this charter, St. Augustine, as well as the whole of what was afterwards Georgia, fell within the English dominions; but the Spaniards alleged, that this grant was an invasion of their rights, and never admitted the limits of this charter at any subsequent treaty.

Both the charters of Carolina were granted while Clarendon retained the chancellorship of Great Britain; and it is somewhat curious to observe this zealous advocate for the prerogatives of the crown making no hesitation to place the great seal to charters which transferred the very highest of them almost absolutely to himself and his associates. Not less instructive is it to contemplate this renowned champion and his colleagues recommending a line of ecclesiastical policy in their own colony diametrically opposite to that which, as the "confidential advisers" of his majesty, they adopted and promoted in the parent state. If bigotry must exist, it is more to be respected, though it be more injurious, when it does not bend to feelings of self-interest.

Agreeably to the powers with which the proprietors were invested by their charter, they began to frame a system of laws for the government of their colony; in which arduous task they availed themselves of the assistance of the illustrious John Locke. A model of government, consisting of no less than a hundred and twenty articles, was framed by this learned philosopher, which they agreed to establish, and to the careful observance of it, to bind themselves and their heirs for ever. As this constitution allies a name so justly celebrated with the history of Carolina, and is in itself a singular and ingenious piece of legislation, a brief abstract of it is both interesting and important. "The eldest of the eight proprietors was always to be palatine, and at his decease was to be succeeded by the eldest of the seven survivors. This palatine was to sit as president of the palatine's court, of which he and three more of the proprietors made a quorum, and had the management and execution of all the powers of their charter. This palatine's court was to stand in room of the king, and give their assent or dissent to all laws made by the legislature of the colony. The palatine was to have power to nominate and appoint the governor, who, after obtaining the royal approbation, became his representative in Carolina. Each of the seven proprietors was to have the privilege of appointing a deputy, to sit as his representative in parliament, and to act agreeably to his instructions. Besides a governor, two other branches, somewhat similar to the old Saxon constitution, were to be established, an upper and lower house of assembly, which three branches were to be called a parliament, and to constitute the legislature of the country. The parliament was to be chosen every two years. No act of the legislature was to have any force unless ratified in open parliament during the same session, and even then to continue no longer in force than the next biennial parliament, unless in the mean time it be ratified by the hands and seals of the palatine and three proprietors. The upper house was to consist of the seven deputies, seven of the oldest landgraves and caziques, and seven chosen by the assembly. As in the other provinces, the lower house was to be composed of the representatives from the different counties and towns. Several officers were also to be appointed, such as an admiral, a secretary, a chief-justice, a surveyor, a treasurer, a marshal, and register; and besides these, each county was to have a sheriff and four justices of the peace. Three classes of nobility were to be established, called barons, caziques, and landgraves; the first to possess twelve, the second twenty-four, and the third forty-eight thousand acres of land, and their possessions were to be unalienable. Military officers were also to be nominated, and all inhabitants from sixteen to sixty years of age, as in the times of feudal government, when summoned by the governor and grand council, were to appear under arms, and, in time of war, to take the field. With respect to religion, three terms of communion were fixed; first, to believe that there is a God; secondly, that he is to be worshipped; and thirdly, that it is lawful, and the duty of every man when called upon by those in authority, to bear witness to the truth: without acknowledging which, no man was to be permitted to be a freeman, or to have any estate or habitation in Carolina. But persecution for observing different modes and ways of worship was expressly forbid, and every man was to be left full liberty of conscience, and might worship God in that manner which he in his private judgment thought most conformable to the divine will and revealed word. Every freeman of Carolina was declared to possess absolute power and authority over his negro slaves, of what opinion or religion soever.*

It must be admitted, that Locke manifests his usual intellectual ability and energy in this composition; but his system proved in effect useless and impracticable.† Several attempts were afterwards made to amend these constitutions, but all to little purpose; the inhabitants, sensible how little they were applicable to their circumstances, never, either themselves or by their representatives in assembly, gave their assent to them as a whole, and therefore they failed to obtain the force of fundamental laws in the colony. What regulations the people found applicable and useful they adopted, at the request of their governors; but they observed them on account of their own propriety and necessity, rather than as a code imposed on them by British politicians.

It is obvious that the Carolinian constitution was an experiment in political science, an attempt to plant an aristocratic scion in the American soil. That such an attempt should have been made by men accustomed to set a high value on distinctions of rank, is not surprising; but it is still less surprising, that, under the circumstances of the case, it should have been utterly abortive. This result may be ascribed in part to the civil, rather than the military character of the North American settlements; in part to the degree of knowledge and civilization possessed by the colonists at the commencement of their social institutions; in part to the actual equality to which the condition of the transatlantic wilderness reduced the whole body of its occupants; and in part to the substantial independence acquired by the successful cultivators of the soil, who were, almost from the first, in a situation to deride, as they afterwards found themselves able effectually to resist, the pretensions of distant lords.

Notwithstanding these constitutions and legal preparations, several years elapsed before the proprietors of Carolina made any serious efforts towards its settlement. In 1667, they fitted out a ship, gave the command of it to Captain William Sayle, and sent him out to bring them some account of the coast. His report to his employers, as might naturally be expected, was favourable. He praised their possessions, and encouraged them to engage with vigour in the execution of their project. His observations respecting the Bahama islands, which he had visited, induced them to apply to the king for a grant of them, and Charles bestowed on them by patent all those

* The world has, since the days of Mr. Locke, been taught to exclaim with surprise, on reading his constitution for Carolina; but this surprise ceases, when we consider the age in which the philosopher lived. He truly had no precedent before him, to support him in making a republican government, which he is blamed for not making. Virginia then was a royal colony, and of course was not a model; and the settlements on the shores of the Atlantic, in New England, had not then risen to much notoriety in England. The pilgrims, who increased very slowly, had been in the country but forty-seven years, and those who settled the Province of Massachusetts Bay, but thirty-seven, when Locke drew up this form of government; therefore there was nothing to be derived from this country, at that time, to assist him. The ancient models of Greece and Rome were not suited to a people that he knew must necessarily be, for ages, widely scattered over the soil. The example of republican government, as it was called, under Cromwell, had not much in it to the taste of Mr. Locke, who saw no small degree of tyranny in the garb of freedom. Why do political writers dwell upon the absurdity of palatines, barons, &c. &c., provided for in the constitution from the pen of the profound metaphysician, and make no commentaries on the great and noble feature of this constitution, religious liberty?—a feature which had no prototype in the history of nations; a principle without which there can be no freedom. It is but a trifle to have the privilege of choosing men as rulers, if we cannot worship God as we please. Mr. Locke had seen the evils of a hierarchy on the one hand, and of a regular body of dissenters on the other. He, therefore, with a depth of philosophy wonderful in his age, or any age that had passed, struck one bold blow to sever church and state, or religious creeds from political employments.—AM. EDITOR.

islands lying between the 22d and 27th degrees of north latitude. Nothing then remained but to make preparations for sending a colony to Carolina. Two ships were procured, on board of which a number of adventurers embarked, with provisions, arms, and utensils requisite for building and cultivation. Sayle was appointed the first governor, and received a commission, bearing date July 26, 1669. The expenses of this first embarkation amounted to 12,000*l.*, a proof that the proprietors entertained no small hopes with respect to their palatinate. The number of men, however, must have been by no means adequate to the undertaking, especially considering the multitude of savages that ranged through that extensive wilderness. In what place Governor Sayle first landed is uncertain; but he was dissatisfied with his first situation, and, moving to the southward, took possession of a neck of land between Ashley and Cooper rivers, where he laid out a town, which, in honour of the king then reigning, he called Charleston; but dying soon after, Sir John Yeamans, who had for several years been governor at Clarendon, was appointed to succeed him. This new settlement attracted many inhabitants from that at Clarendon, and ultimately entirely exhausted it. Being at a great distance from Albemarle, the proprietors established a separate government over it, and hence arose the distinctive appellations of North and South Carolina. The distress which attended the first efforts of the colonists was aggravated by the intrigues and assaults of the Spaniards at Fort Augustine. They sent emissaries among the settlers at Ashley river, in the hope of moving them to revolt; they encouraged indentured servants to abandon their masters, and fly to the Spanish territory; and they laboured so successfully to instil into the savage tribes the most unfavourable notions of British heretics, that these deluded Indians took up arms to extirpate a race who had never injured them, but who desired to cultivate friendly relations with them. So much discontent and insubordination was produced by the calamities the colonies suffered, that it led to an insurrection, headed by Culpepper, one of the provincial officers; but it was easily suppressed by the governor. The Spanish garrison at Augustine receiving intelligence of their dissensions, a party advanced from that fortress under arms, as far as the island of St. Helena, to dislodge or destroy the settlers; but fifty volunteers, under the command of Colonel Godfrey, marching against them, they evacuated the island, and retreated to their fort. During the governorship of Sir John Yeamans, the colony received a considerable addition from the Dutch settlement of Nova Belgia. After its conquest by Sir

Robert Car, many of the Dutch colonists determined to remove. The proprietors of Carolina offered them lands and encouragement in their palatinate, and sent vessels to transport a number of their families to Charleston. Stephen Bull, surveyor-general of the colony, received instructions to mark out lands on the south-west side of Ashley River for their accommodation; and a town was commenced, which was called James Town. The industry of the settlers surmounted incredible hardships, and their success induced many of their countrymen to follow them to the western world, and extend themselves over the adjacent country.

The Carolinian colonists were for several years dependant on the proprietaries in England for considerable supplies of provisions and stores, and were by them liberally assisted to the extent of several thousand pounds; but the proprietaries finding, instead of any indications of repayment with a corresponding profit, only demands for further supplies, became disheartened and disgusted with a result so contrary to their sanguine expectations; and a mutual dissatisfaction commenced, which embittered all their future intercourse, although it afforded instruction to the colonists which was very beneficial, as it led them to depend solely on their own resources. The proprietaries ascribed their disappointment, in a great measure, to the mismanagement of Sir John Yeamans, who, early in this year, was compelled by the state of his health to resign his situation as governor, a relief that was ineffectual for the desired purpose, as he did not long survive. The factions and confusion in which the colony was shortly after involved, have rendered the annals of this period extremely perplexing, and have much obscured the connexion of events. When Yeamans abdicated his office, the council appointed Joseph West as his successor: and on this occasion the palatine thought proper to confirm the popular choice, which was amply justified by the prudence of his administration.

The affairs of the northern colony must now occupy a portion of our attention. The fundamental constitutions, which have already been described, were received by the colonists with disgust and disunion. Their promulgation produced no other effect than to excite the most inveterate jealousy of the designs of the proprietaries; till, in process of time, a refractory spirit took possession of the minds of the people, and was at length exasperated into sentiments as hostile to subordination, as the policy of the proprietaries was repugnant to liberty. From this period the history of the northern province, for a series of years, is involved in such confusion and contradiction, that it is impossible to render it interesting, and difficult to make it even intelligible. Miller, a person of some consideration, was accused of sedition ; but being acquitted, he proceeded to England to complain to the proprietaries of the treatment he had undergone. Eastchurch, a man whose address and abilities had raised him to the dignity of speaker of the assembly, was deputed to represent to the proprietaries the existing state of the province. The proprietaries, conceiving a favourable opinion of Eastchurch, appointed him governor of Albemarle ; and disapproving the treatment that Miller had received, gave him the office of secretary. The commissioners of the customs appointed Miller, at the same time, the first collector of these duties in the province. These officers departed to take possession of their respective offices ; but Eastchurch, finding an opportunity of making a wealthy marriage in the West Indies, thought it prudent to remain there till his object was accomplished, and despatched his companion with directions to govern the colony as president till he himself should arrive. He found the colony at Albemarle to consist of a few inconsiderable plantations, dispersed over the north-eastern bank of Albemarle River, and divided into four districts. In attempting to reform some abuses, he rendered himself obnoxious ; and an insurrection broke out at Albemarle in December. The insurgents, conducted chiefly by Culpepper, imprisoned the president and seven proprietary deputies ; seized the royal revenue ; established courts of justice ; appointed officers ; called a parliament ; and, for a considerable period, exercised all the authority of an independent state. After two years of successful revolt, the insurgents, apprehensive of an invasion from Virginia, despatched Culpepper and Holden to England, to offer submission to the proprietaries, on condition of their past proceedings being ratified. The unfortunate Miller and his associate, who had languished in imprisonment, having found means to escape, appeared in England at the same time, and filled the court with accusations against their persecutors. Culpepper was, however, protected by Lord Shaftesbury, and was about to return, when he was impeached, by the commissioners of the customs, of the crimes of acting as collector without their authority, and of embezzling the king's revenue. It was in vain for him to acknowledge the facts and to beg for mercy. His powerful accusers insisted that no favour might be shown him unless he refunded the duties which he had wrongfully seized, and he was tried in the court of king's-bench, on an indictment of high treason committed without the realm. Though five witnesses fully proved those circumstances which constituted the crime, yet Shaftesbury, who was then in the zenith of his popularity, appearing in his behalf, the jury acquitted him. The acquittal of Culpepper determined the proprietors to adopt an entirely conciliatory system ; and to govern, in future, according to that portion of obedience which the colonists should be disposed to yield them. In prosecution of this determination, the proprietaries resolved to send thither Seth Sothel, who had lately purchased Lord Clarendon's share of the province, that, by his authority, he might reduce the late distractions to order. They were, however, still doomed to disappointment—his conduct, far from restoring quiet and contentment, only increased the previous disorders. He proved one of the most corrupt and rapacious of colonial governors, plundering the innocent, and accepting bribes from felons. Six years the inhabitants endured his injustice and oppression ; they then seized him, with a view of sending him to England for trial : but, at his request, he was detained and tried by the assembly, who banished him from the colony.

To return to the affairs of the southern colony, now under the administration of Joseph West. The situation of Old Charleston being found inconvenient, the inhabitants, in 1680, removed to Oyster Point, where a new city was laid out, to which the name of the other was given. In the same year commenced a war with the Westoes, a powerful tribe of Indians, which threatened great injury to the colony ; peace, however, was soon restored. Governor West was superseded by Sir Richard KIRLE, an Irish gentleman, who died six months after his arrival in the country. After his decease, Colonel Robert QUARRY was chosen his successor. During the time of his government, a number of pirates put into Charleston, and purchased provisions with their Spanish gold and silver. Those public robbers, instead of being taken and tried by the laws of England, were treated with great civility and friendship, in violation of the laws of nations. Whether the governor was ignorant of the treaty made with Spain, by which England had withdrawn her former toleration from these plunderers of the Spanish dominions, or whether he was afraid to bring them to trial from the notorious courage of their companions in the West Indies, we have not sufficient authority to affirm ; but one thing is certain, that Charles II., for several years after the restoration, winked at their depredations, and many of them performed such valiant actions, as, in a good cause, would have justly merited honours and rewards ; he even knighted Henry Morgan, a Welshman, who had plundered Porto Bello and Panama, and carried off large treasures from them. For several years so formidable was this body of plunderers in the West Indies, that they struck a terror into every quarter of the Spanish dominions. Their gold and silver, which they lavishly spent in the colony, insured to them a kind reception among the Carolinians, who opened their ports to them freely, and furnished them with necessaries. They could purchase the favour of the governor, and the friendship of the people, for what they deemed a trifling consideration. Leaving their gold and silver behind them for clothes, arms, ammunition, and provisions, they embarked in quest of more. However, the proprietors, having intelligence of the encouragement given to pirates by Governor Quarry, dismissed him from the office he held; and, in 1685, Landgrave Joseph Morton was appointed to the government of the colony.

During the reign of King James II. the difficulty under which the people of Britain laboured, and the troubles which they apprehended, added much strength to the colonies. The unsuccessful or unfortunate part of mankind are easily induced to emigrate; while the oppressed and persecuted are driven from their country, however closely their affections may cleave to it. Such manifest attempts were made by this prince against what the nation highly revered, that many protestants deserted it, preferring the hardships of the first state of colonization abroad to oppression at home. America gained considerable and valuable accessions also from the revocation of the edict of Nantz, when the flames of persecution broke out in France, and drove many of its best subjects from that kingdom. Of the advantage which the colonies reaped from this impolitic measure of France, Carolina had a large share. Many of the protestant refugees, having purchased lands from the proprietors, embarked with their families for that colony, and proved some of its best and most industrious inhabitants.

Though Governor Morton was possessed of a considerable share of wisdom, and was connected with several respectable families in the colony, yet so inconsistent were his instructions from England with the prevailing views and interests of the people, that he was unable, without great difficulty, to execute the duties of his trust. Some of his council differed widely from him in opinion with respect to public measures, and claimed greater indulgences for the people than he had authority to grant. Hence two parties arose in the colony; one in support of the prerogative and authority of the proprietors, the other in defence of the liberties of the people. The former contended that the laws and regulations received from England respecting government ought to be strictly and implicitly observed: the latter kept in view their local circumstances, and maintained that the freemen of the colony were under obligations to observe them only so far as they were consistent with the interest of individuals and the prosperity of the settlement. In this situation of affairs, no governor could long support his power among a number of bold adventurers, who improved every hour for advancing their interest, and could bear no restraints which had the least tendency to defeat their favourite views and designs; whenever he attempted to interpose his feeble authority, they insulted his person and complained of his administration, till, at length, he was removed from office.

Finding it prudent to change their governor when he became obnoxious to the people, the proprietors appointed James Colleton to supersede Morton. To give him the greater weight, he was created a landgrave of the colony, to which dignity forty-eight thousand acres of land were unalienably annexed; but, to his mortification, he soon found, that the proprietary government had acquired but little firmness and stability; and, by his imprudence and rigour, it fell into still greater contempt. Having called an assembly of the representatives in the end of the year 1686, he proposed to make some new regulations respecting the government of the colony. After examining the fundamental constitutions, and finding the people disposed to make many objections to them, he thought proper to nominate a committee, to consider wherein they were improper or defective, and to make such alterations and amendments in them as they judged might be conducive to the welfare of the country. Accordingly, a new code of laws was framed, consisting of many articles differing considerably from the former, which they denominated standing laws, transmitting them to England for the approbation of the proprietors, who, however, rejected them, and insisted on the observance of the fundamental constitutions; while the people treated both with equal indifference and neglect.

At this early period a dissatisfaction with the proprietary government appeared, and began to gain ground among the people. A dispute having arisen between the governor and the house of assembly about the tenures of lands and the payment of quit-rents, Colleton determined to exert his authority, in compelling the people to pay up their arrears of quit-rents, which, though very trifling and inconsiderable, were burdensome, as not one acre out of a thousand of these lands for which quit-rents were demanding yielded them any profit. The interest of the proprietors and that of the people being thus placed in opposition to each other, the more rigorously the governor exerted his authority, the more turbulent and seditious the people became. At last they proceeded to avowed usurpation; they issued writs in their own name, and held assemblies in opposition to the governor and the authority of the proprietors, and the community was turned into a scene of confusion, every man acting as he thought proper, without any regard to legal authority, and in contempt of the governor and other officers of the proprietors. Colleton, mortified at the loss of power, and alarmed at the bold and seditious spirit of the people, was not a little perplexed what step to take in order to recall them to the obedience of legal authority. One expedient was suggested, which he and his council flattered themselves might be productive of the desired effect—to proclaim martial law, and try to maintain by force of arms the proprietary jurisdiction. Accordingly, without letting the people into his secret design, he caused the militia to be drawn up, as if some danger from the Spaniards or Indians had threatened the country, and publicly proclaimed martial law at their head. This served only to exasperate the people the more. The members of the assembly met, and taking this measure under their deliberation, resolved that it was an encroachment upon their liberties, and an unwarrantable exertion of power, at a time when the colony was in no danger from any foreign enemy. The governor, however, insisted on the articles of war, and tried to carry martial law into execution; but the disaffection was too general to admit of such a remedy. In the year 1690, at a meeting of the representatives, a bill was brought in and passed, for disabling Landgrave James Colleton from holding any office, or exercising any authority, civil or military, within the province; and he was informed, that, in a limited time, he must depart from the colony.

During these public commotions, Seth Sothel, one of the proprietors, having, as already stated, been driven from North Carolina, appeared suddenly at Charleston, and, aided by a powerful faction, assumed the reins of government. At first the people gladly acknowledged his authority, while the current of their enmity ran against Colleton; especially as he stood forth as an active and leading man in opposition to that governor, and ratified the law for his exclusion and banishment; but they afterwards found him void of every principle of honour, and even of honesty. Such was the insatiable avarice of this man, that every restraint of common justice and equity was trampled upon by him; and oppression, such as usually attends the exaltation of vulgar and ambitious scramblers for power, extended her rod of iron over the distracted colony. The fair traders from Barbadoes and Bermuda were seized as pirates by order of this popular governor, and confined until such fees as he was pleased to exact were paid him; bribes from felons and traitors were accepted to favour their escape from the hands of justice; and plantations were forcibly taken possession of, upon pretences the most frivolous and unjust. At length, the people, weary of his grievous impositions and extortions, agreed to take him by force, and ship him off for England. He then evinced the meanness of spirit generally associated with a disposition to tyranny, and humbly begged liberty to remain in the country, promising to submit his conduct to the trial of the assembly at their first meeting. When the assembly met, thirteen different charges were brought against him, and all supported by the strongest evidence; upon which, being found guilty, they compelled him to abjure the government and country for ever.

The revolution of 1688 excited little attention in either of the Carolinas, which were but slightly affected by the changes which the empire underwent. It was from the proprietaries alone that they could expect the interposition of a superior power to arrest or repair the misrule, oppression, and calamity, that had so long composed the chief part of the history, both of the northern and southern settlements. In the hope of accomplishing this desirable object, the proprietaries, on the deposition of Sothel, intrusted the government of the whole of their settlements to Colonel Philip Ludwell, a man of sense and humanity, who possessed considerable experience of colonial affairs. He commenced his administration in a manner that gave general satisfaction, and seemed to have completely allayed the prevailing ferments of the people. But this tranquillity was of short duration: the minds of men had been too long and too violently agitated to subside at once into a settled composure; and a circumstance that at first promised to produce the happiest effects on the prosperity of the province, proved the immediate occasion of the revival of public turbulence. The proprietors, having observed the good conduct of the French protestants, directed the governor to permit them to elect representatives, a privilege which they had never yet exercised. The English episcopalians, unwilling that any of their hereditary enemies, those, namely, who did not belong to their church, should be associated with themselves in the rights of freemen, were exasperated, and opposed the concession with great clamour and zeal.

Excited by a spirit of opposition, they proposed to enforce with respect to them the laws of England against foreigners, insisting that they could not legally possess any real estate in the colony. They also declared that their marriages, being solemnized by French ministers, were void, and that the children could not inherit the property of their fathers. By the display of a spirit so illiberal and unchristian, these strangers were alarmed and discouraged; but, being countenanced by the governor, they remained in the colony, and, for the present, withdrew their claim to the right of suffrage.

In the midst of these disputes, and with the hope of appeasing them, the proprietaries at length determined to surrender to the general dislike of the people the "fundamental constitutions." They accordingly enacted the following resolution: "That, as the people have declared they would rather be governed by the powers granted by the charter, without regard to the fundamental constitutions, it will be for their quiet, and the protection of the well-disposed, to grant their request." Thus perished the legislative labours of John Locke. Their abolition was unregretted by any party, for they had neither insured obedience to the government, nor afforded happiness to the people.

Ludwell had been superseded in his office by Thomas Smith, an eminent planter, and an upright and popular magistrate. His short administration was signalized by an occurrence that produced lasting and extensive effects on the prosperity of Carolina. A vessel from Madagascar, on her homeward voyage to Britain, happening to touch at Charleston, the captain presented the governor with a bag of seed rice, which he said he had seen growing in eastern countries, where it was deemed excellent food, and yielded a prodigious increase. The governor divided it between several of his friends, who found the result to exceed their most sanguine expectations. From this circumstance Carolina dates the rise of her staple commodity, the chief support of her people, and the main source of her opulence.

Notwithstanding the prudent administration of Smith, the colony still remained in a confused and turbulent state. Complaints from every quarter were made to the governor, who was neither able to quiet the minds of the people nor to afford them the relief they wanted. At length he wrote to the proprietors, and frankly told them, that he despaired of ever uniting the people in interest and affection; that he, and many more, weary of the fluctuating state of public affairs, had resolved to leave the province; and that he was convinced nothing would bring the settlers to a state of tranquillity and harmony, unless they sent out one of the proprietors with full power to redress grievances, and settle differences prevailing, and likely to prevail more, in their colony. The proprietors, astonished at the discontented spirit of the people, yet, anxious to prevent the settlement from being ruined, resolved to try the remedy Landgrave Smith had suggested; and they accordingly solicited John Archdale, a man of considerable knowledge and discretion, a quaker, and a proprietor, to accept the office. Great trust was reposed in him, and much was expected from his abilities. He succeeded in restoring order, but found the antipathy against the unfortunate French exiles too great to be encountered with any hope of success, until softened by time and their amiable deportment. These produced the effects which he anticipated; and subsequently they were admitted by the general assembly to all the rights of citizens and freemen. It was not the intention of Archdale to remain longer in Carolina than was necessary for the adjustment of the existing controversies; and having effected this object in a degree that had surpassed the expectations of all parties, he returned to England in the close of the year 1696, loaded with the grateful benedictions of a people to whose peace and prosperity he had been so highly instrumental.

To Archdale had been confided the power of nominating his successor; and he conferred the office on Joseph Blake, nephew of the English admiral, a man of virtue, prudence, and moderation, acceptable to the people, and a proprietary of the province, who governed the colony wisely and happily for a period of four years. He appears to have made the most laudable endeavours to promote the religious instruction of the people, and to facilitate the exercise of worship to all denominations of Christian professors. Though himself a dissenter, he caused a bill to be introduced into the assembly for settling a perpetual provision of 150*l.* a year, with a house and other advantages, on the episcopal minister of that city. The person who then occupied this ministerial situation having gained universal regard by his piety and prudence, and the dissenters in the house acquiescing in the measure from regard to this individual, the bill was passed into a law. "Those who think that the dissenters acted amiss," says Grahame, "and stretched their liberality beyond the proper confines of this virtue, in thus promoting the national establishment of a church from which they dissented, will regard the persecution they soon after sustained from the episcopal party as a merited retribution for their practical negation of dissenting principles. Those who judge more leniently an error (if it be such) which there is little reason to suppose will be ever frequent in the world, will regret and condemn the ungrateful return which the dissenters experienced from a party for whose advantage they had incurred so great a sacrifice.”*

Blake died in the year 1700, and with him ended the interval of tranquillity which had originated with the government of Archdale. Under the rule of his successor, James Moore, the colony was agitated by religious disputes. Lord Granville, one of the proprietors, a bigoted churchman, in conjunction with the governor, resolved to effect, if possible, the establishment of episcopacy. They were well aware that a majority of the people were dissenters, and that by art and intrigue only could their design be accomplished. Moore, who was avaricious and venal, became the tool of Granville. He interfered in the elections, and, by bribing the voters, succeeded in procuring a majority in the assembly who would be subservient to his wishes. A law was passed establishing the episcopal religion, and excluding dissenters from a seat in the assembly. It was laid before the proprietors, without whose sanction it could not possess permanent validity. Archdale, who had returned to England, opposed it with ability and spirit. He insisted that good faith, policy, interest, and even piety, concurred to dictate its rejection. But Lord Granville declared himself in favour of it, and it received confirmation. The dissenters thus saw themselves at once deprived of those privileges for which they had abandoned their native country, and encountered the dangers and hardships of the ocean and a wilderness. Some prepared to leave the colony and settle in Pennsylvania. Others proposed that a remonstrance against the law should first be presented to the house of lords, and this measure was adopted. The lords expressed, by a vote, their disapprobation of the law, and, upon their solicitation, Queen Anne declared it void. Soon after Lord Granville died, and, controlled by more liberal councils, the colony again enjoyed the blessings of domestic tranquillity.

In 1702, a rupture having taken place in Europe between England and Spain, the attention of the colony was directed to a different object, which afforded Governor Moore an opportunity of exercising his military talents, and a prospect of enriching himself by Spanish plunder or Indian captives. He proposed to the assembly an expedition against the Spanish settlement at Augustine. Many applauded the proposal, but men of cool reflection were averse from rushing into any hazardous enterprise. A great majority of the assembly, however, declared for the expedition, and a sum of two thousand pounds sterling was voted for the service of the war. Six hundred Indians were engaged, who, being fond of warlike exploits, gladly accepted of arms and ammunition offered them for their aid and assistance. Six hundred provincial militia were raised, and schooners and merchant ships were impressed for transports to carry the forces. Port Royal was fixed upon as the place of general rendezvous, and there, in September, the governor, at the head of his warriors, embarked in an expedition as rash and fool-hardy on one side, as it was unprovoked on the other. In the plan of operations, it had been agreed that Colonel Daniel, who was an officer of spirit, should go by the inland passage with a party of militia and Indians, and make a descent on the town from the land, while the governor with the main body should proceed by sea, and block up the harbour. Colonel Daniel lost no time, but advanced against the town, and entered and plundered it before the governor got forward to his assistance; but the Spaniards having laid up provisions for four months in the castle, on his approach they retired to it, with all their money and most valuable effects. Upon the arrival of Governor Moore, the place was invested with a force against which the Spaniards could not appear, and they therefore kept themselves shut up in their strong-hold. The governor finding it impossible to dislodge them without such artillery as are necessary to a siege, despatched a sloop to Jamaica, on purpose to bring cannon, bombs, and mortars, for attacking the castle; and Colonel Daniel embarked and sailed with the greatest expedition to bring them. During his absence two Spanish ships, the one of twenty-two guns and the other of sixteen, appeared off the mouth of the harbour, and struck such a panic into the governor, that he instantly raised the siege, abandoned his ships, and made a precipitate retreat to Carolina by land; in consequence of which, the Spaniards in the garrison were not only relieved, but the ships, provisions, and ammunition, belonging to the Carolinians, fell also into their hands. Colonel Daniel, on his return, standing in for the harbour of Augustine, to his surprise, found the siege raised, and made a narrow escape from the enemy.

Upon his return to Carolina, as might naturally have been expected, many severe reflections were thrown out against the governor. The expedition entailed a debt of six thousand pounds sterling on a poor colony, which, at that period, was a grievous burden. A bill was passed by the assembly for stamping bills of credit to answer the public expense, which were to be sunk in three years by a duty laid upon liquors, skins, and furs. This was the first paper money issued in Carolina, and, for five or six years after the emission, it passed in the country at the same value and rate with the sterling money of England; but as the quantity was subsequently augmented, the value decreased in proportion.

Governor Moore resolved to retrieve his character in a new field of enterprise. Exasperated by the insults and injuries which the Apalachian Indians were instigated by the Spaniards to commit, he determined by one vigorous effort to break their power. At the head of a strong detachment of the colonial militia, attended by a body of Indian allies, he marched into the hostile settlements, defeated the enemy with the loss of eight hundred men, and compelled the whole district of Apalachia to submit to the English government. To render his conquest permanent, he transplanted fourteen hundred of the Apalachian Indians to the territory which is now denominated Georgia; a measure which appears to have paved the way to the subsequent settlement of the English in that part of the country. In 1706, the Spaniards from Florida, aided also by the French, made an attack on Carolina. Nathaniel Johnson, who had succeeded Moore as governor, having received intimation of their approach, erected fortifications, and made arrangements to obtain, on short warning, the assistance of the militia. When the enemy's fleet appeared before Charleston, the whole strength of the colony was summoned to defend it; and these vigorous demonstrations insured its safety. Satisfied with the destruction of a few detached buildings, the enemy retired, leaving one of their ships, and ninety men, in possession of the Carolinians.

The northern colony continued to receive accessions to its strength from several of the European states. In 1707, a company of French protestants arrived, and seated themselves on the river Trent, a branch of the Neuse; and three years afterwards a large number of palatines, fleeing from religious persecution in Germany, sought refuge in the same part of the province. To each of these bodies of emigrants the proprietors granted a hundred acres of land. On their newly acquired possessions they were living in peace, in the enjoyment of liberty of conscience, and in the prospect of competence and ease, when suddenly a terrible calamity fell upon them. The Tuscarora and Coree Indians, smarting under recent aggressions, and dreading total extinction from the encroachment of these strangers, with characteristic secrecy, plotted their entire destruction. Sending their families to one of their fortified towns, twelve hundred bowmen sallied forth, and in the same night attacked, in separate parties, the nearest settlements of the palatines. Men, women, and children, were indiscriminately butchered. The savages, with the swiftness and ferocity of wolves, ran from village to village. Before them was the repose of innocence; behind, the sleep of death. A few escaping alarmed the settlements more remote, and hastened to South Carolina for assistance. Governor Craven immediately despatched to the aid of the sister colony nearly a thousand men, under the command of Colonel Barnwell. Hideous was the wilderness through which Colonel Barnwell had to march, and the utmost expedition was requisite. There was no road through the woods upon which either horses or carriages could pass; and his army had all manner of hardships and dangers to encounter, from the climate, the wilderness, and the enemy. In spite of every difficulty, however, Barnwell advanced against them, and being much better supplied with arms and ammunition than his enemy, he did great execution among them, killing in the first battle three hundred Indians, and taking about one hundred prisoners. The Tuscaroras then retreated to their town, fortified within a wooden breastwork; but there Barnwell surrounded them, and forced them to sue for peace; and some of his men being wounded, and others having suffered greatly by constant watching, and much hunger and fatigue, the savages the more easily obtained their request. After having killed, wounded, or captured nearly a thousand Tuscaroras, Barnwell returned to South Carolina. The peace was, however, of short duration, and upon the recommencement of hostilities, assistance was again solicited from the southern colony. Colonel James Moore, an active young officer, was immediately despatched, with forty white men and eight hundred friendly Indians. He found the enemy in a fort near Cotechny river; and after a siege, which continued more than a week, the fort was taken, and eight hundred Indians made prisoners. The Tuscaroras, disheartened by this defeat, migrated, in 1713, to the north, and joined the celebrated confederacy, denominated the Five Nations. The others sued for peace, and afterwards continued friendly.

The northern colony had scarcely recovered from the scourge of Indian war, when the southern was exposed to the same calamity. All the tribes from Florida to Cape Fear, had been for some time engaged in a conspiracy to extirpate the whites. On the day before the Yamassees began their bloody operations, Captain Nairn and some of the traders observing an uncommon gloom on their savage countenances, and apparently great agitations of spirit, which to them prognosticated approaching mischief, went to their chief men, begging to know the cause of their uneasiness, and promising if any injury had been done them, to give them satisfaction. The chiefs replied, they had no complaints to make against any one, but intended to go a-hunting early the next morning. Captain Nairn accordingly went to sleep, and the traders retired to their huts, and passed the night in seeming friendship and tranquillity. But next morning at day-break, the 15th day of April, all were alarmed with the cries of war. The leaders were all out under arms, calling upon their followers, and proclaiming aloud designs of vengeance. The young men, burning with fury and passion, flew to their arms, and in a few hours, massacred above ninety persons in Pocatoligo town and the neighbouring plantations; and many more must have fallen a sacrifice on Port Royal island, had they not providentially been warned of their danger. Mr. Burrows, a captain of the militia, after receiving two wounds, by swimming one mile and running ten, escaped to Port Royal, and alarmed the town. A vessel happening fortunately to be in the harbour, the inhabitants, in great hurry, repaired on board, and sailed for Charleston; a few families of planters on that island, not having timely notice, fell into the barbarous hands of the Indians, and of them some were murdered, and others made prisoners of war.

While the Yamassees, with whom the Creeks and Apalachians had joined, were advancing against the southern frontiers, and spreading desolation and slaughter through the province, the colonists on the northern borders also found the Indians among their settlements in formidable parties. The Carolinians had foolishly entertained hopes of the friendship of the Congarees, the Catawbias, and Cherokees; but they soon found that they had also joined in the conspiracy, and declared for war. It was computed that the southern division of the enemy consisted of above six thousand bowmen, and the northern of between six hundred and a thousand. In the muster-roll at Charleston, there were no more than one thousand two hundred men fit to bear arms, but as the town had several forts into which the inhabitants might retreat, Governor Craven resolved to march with this small force into the woods against the enemy. He proclaimed martial law, and laid an embargo on all ships, to prevent either men or provisions from leaving the country. He obtained an act of assembly, empowering him to impress men, and seize arms, ammunition, and stores, wherever they were to be found, to arm such trusty negroes as might be serviceable at a juncture so critical, and to prosecute the war with the utmost vigour. Being no stranger to the ferocious temper of his enemies, and their horrid cruelty to prisoners, the governor advanced against them by slow and cautious steps, always keeping the strictest guard round his army. He knew well under what advantages they fought among their native thickets, and the various wiles and stratagems they made use of in conducting their wars; and therefore he was watchful above all things against surprises, which might throw his followers into disorder, and defeat the end of his enterprise. The fate of the whole province depended on the success of his arms, and his men had no other alternative but to conquer or die a painful death. As he advanced, the straggling parties fled before him, until he reached Saltcatchers, where they had pitched their great camp. Here a sharp and bloody battle ensued from behind trees and bushes, the Indians whooping, hallooing, and giving way one while, and then again and again returning with double fury to the charge. But the governor, notwithstanding their superior number, and their terrible shrieks, kept the provincials close at their heels, and drove them before him like a flock of wolves. He expelled them from their settlement at Indian River, pursued them over the Savannah, and entirely freed the province of this formidable tribe of savages. What number of the army was killed does not appear; but in the whole war nearly four hundred unfortunate inhabitants of Carolina fell a prey to Indian cruelty, property of great value was destroyed, and a large debt contracted.

The proprietors, though earnestly solicited, refused to afford any relief, or to pay any portion of the debt. The assembly, therefore, determined to remunerate the colony, by disposing of the land from which the Indians had been driven. The terms offered were so favourable, that five hundred Irishmen immediately came over, and planted themselves on the frontiers. The proprietors, most unwisely as well as unjustly, refused to sanction the proceedings of the assembly, and deprived these emigrants of their lands. Reduced to extreme poverty, some perished from want, while others resorted to the northern colonies; and thus a strong barrier between the old settlements and the savages was removed, and the country again exposed to their incursions. The people were exasperated, and longed for a change of masters; and the corrupt and oppressive conduct of Trott, the chief justice, and Rhett, the receiver-general, increased the discontent. Of the former, the governor and council complained to the proprietors, and solicited his recall; but, instead of removing him, they thanked him for his services, and removed the governor and council. With the governor next appointed, though a man generally beloved, the assembly refused to have any concern or intercourse. They drew up articles of impeachment against Trott, accusing him of corruption and gross misconduct, and sent an agent to England, to maintain their accusation before the proprietors; but he was still continued in office.

The patience of the people now became exhausted, and they waited only for a favourable opportunity to throw off their oppressive yoke. In 1719, at a general review of the militia at Charleston, occasioned by a threatened invasion of the colony from Florida, the officers and soldiers bound themselves by a solemn compact, to support each other in resisting the tyranny of the proprietors; and the assembly, which was then in session, requested Governor Johnson to consent to administer the government in the name of the king; but he refused, and dissolved the assembly by proclamation. The members immediately met as a convention, and elected Colonel James Moore their governor.* He was a bold man, and exceedingly well qualified for a popular leader in a turbulent season. He accepted the appointment, and assisted by the convention, and supported by the people, administered the affairs of the colony. The representatives of the people took a dislike to the name of a convention, voted themselves an assembly, and assumed the power of appointing all public officers. In place of Trott, they made Richard Allein chief justice. Another person was appointed provincial secretary, in the room of Charles Hart. But Rhett, by becoming obsequious to the humours of the revolutionists, secured the same office he held from the proprietors. Colonel Barnwell was chosen agent for the province, and embarked for England, with instructions and orders to apply only to the king, to lay a statement of their public proceedings before him, praying him to take the province under his immediate care and protection. The fortifications at Charleston they ordered to be immediately repaired, and Rhett was nominated inspector-general of the repairs. To their new governor they voted two thousand five hundred pounds, and to their chief justice eight hundred pounds, current money, as yearly salaries. To their agent in England one thousand pounds sterling was transmitted; and to defray those and the other expenses of government, a law was passed for laying a tax on lands and negroes, to raise thirty thousand pounds, Carolina money, for the service of the current year. In short, this popular assembly imposed such burdens on their constituents, as under the proprietary government would have been deemed intolerable grievances. When, however, they began to levy those heavy taxes, Governor Johnson and some of his party refused to pay, giving for reason, that the act was not made by lawful authority. On account of his particular circumstances, Mr. Johnson was exempted; but they resolved to compel every other person to submit to their jurisdiction, and yield implicit obedience

* The declaration of this convention was as follows: "Whereas the proprietors of this province have of late assumed to themselves an arbitrary and illegal power, of repealing such laws as the general assembly of this settlement have thought fit to make for the preservation and defence thereof, and acted in many other things contrary to the laws of England, and the charter to them and us, freemen, granted; whereby we are deprived of those measures we had taken for the defence of the settlement, being the south-west frontier of his majesty's territories in America, and thereby left naked to the attacks of our inveterate enemies and next door neighbours, the Spaniards, from whom, through the Divine Providence, we have had a miraculous deliverance, and daily expect to be invaded by them, according to the repeated advices we have from time to time received from several places: and whereas, pursuant to the instructions and authorities to us given, and trust in us reposed by the inhabitants of this settlement, and in execution of the resolutions by us made, we did in due form apply ourselves in a whole body, by an address, to the Honourable Robert Johnson, appointed governor of this province by the lords proprietors, and desired him, in the name of the inhabitants of this province, to take upon him the government of the same, and in behalf of his majesty the king of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, until his majesty's pleasure had been known, which the said governor refusing to do, exclusive of the pretended power of the lords proprietors over the settlement, has put us under the necessity of applying to some other person, to take upon him, as governor, the administration of all the affairs, civil and military, within the settlement, in the name and for the service of his most sacred majesty, as well as making treaties, alliances, and leagues, with any nation of the Indians, until his majesty's pleasure herein be further known: and whereas James

Moore, a person well affected to his present majesty, and also zealous for the interest of the settlement, now in a sinking condition, has been prevailed with, pursuant to such our application, to take upon him, in the king's name, and for the king's service and safety of the settlement, the above-mentioned charge and trust: we therefore, whose names are hereunto subscribed, the representatives and delegates of his majesty's huge people, and free-born subjects of the said settlement, now met in convention at Charleston, in their names, and in behalf of his sacred majesty, George, by the grace of God, king of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, in consideration of his former and many great services, having great confidence in his firm loyalty to our most gracious king, George, as well as in his conduct, courage, and other great abilities, do hereby declare the said James Moore his majesty's governor of this settlement, invested with all the powers and authorities belonging and appertaining to any of his majesty's governors in America, till his majesty's pleasure herein shall be further known. And we do hereby, for ourselves, in the name and on the behalf of the inhabitants of the said settlement, as their representatives and delegates, promise and oblige ourselves most solemnly to obey, maintain, assist, and support the said James Moore, in the administration of all affairs, civil and military, within this settlement, as well as in the execution of all his functions aforesaid, as governor for his sacred majesty, King George. And further, we do expect and command, that all officers, both civil and military, within the settlement, do pay him all duty and obedience as his majesty's governor, as they shall answer to the contrary at their utmost peril. Given under our hand, at the convention, this 21st day of December, 1719."—History of South Carolina, vol. i. p. 276—278.

to their laws. They forcibly seized the effects or negroes of such as refused, sold them by public auction, and applied the money for the payment of their taxes. Thus, in spite of all opposition, they established themselves in the full possession of government, both in their legislative and executive capacities.

The agent for Carolina at length procured a hear-

* About this period an incident occurred, which, as it eminently illustrates the nature, extent, and folly of religious enthusiasm, (as distinct from the sincere fervour of a rational faith as it is from the cold formality of pharisaism, or the desolating mania of skepticism,) should not be passed unnoticed, especially as the spread of knowledge has not, in our own age, prevented similar disgraceful and blasphemous follies from procuring disciples and advocates. Perhaps some individuals, who have been accustomed to confound the yet too limited exertions of an evangelical benevolence with the folly of enthusiasm, may learn the immense breadth of a distinction, which it is not to the honour of their rational powers so long to have overlooked.

"The family of Dutartres, consisting of four sons and four daughters, were descendants of French refugees, who came into Carolina after the revocation of the edict of Nantz. They lived in Orange-quarter, and, though in low circumstances, always maintained an honest character, and were esteemed by their neighbours, persons of blameless and irreproachable lives. But at this time a strolling Moravian preacher happening to come to that quarter where they lived, insinuated himself into their family, and partly by conversation, and partly by the writings of Jacob Behmen, which he put into their hands, filled their heads with wild and fantastic ideas. Unhappily for the poor family, those strange notions gained ground on them, insomuch that in one year they began to withdraw themselves from the ordinances of public worship, and all conversation with the world around them, and strongly to imagine they were the only family upon earth who had the knowledge of the true God, and whom he vouchsafed to instruct, either by the immediate impulses of his Spirit, or by signs and tokens from heaven. At length it came to open visions and revelation. God raised up a prophet among them, like unto Moses, to whom he taught them to hearken. This prophet was Peter Rombert, who had married the eldest daughter of the family when a widow. To this man the Author and Governor of the world deigned to reveal, in the plainest manner, that the wickedness of man was again so great in the world, that, as in the days of Noah, he was determined to destroy all men from off the face of it, except one family whom he would save for raising up a godly seed upon earth. This revelation Peter Rombert was sure of, and felt it as plain as the wind blowing on his body, and the rest of the family, with equal confidence and presumption, firmly believed it.

"A few days after this, God was pleased to reveal himself a second time to the prophet, saying, Put away the woman whom thou hast for thy wife, and when I have destroyed this wicked generation, I will raise up her first husband from the dead, and they shall be man and wife as before, and go thou and take to wife her youngest sister, who is a virgin, so shall the chosen family be restored entire, and the holy seed preserved pure and undefiled in it. At first the father, when he heard of this revelation, was staggered at so extraordinary a command from heaven; but the prophet assured him that God would give him a sign, which accordingly happened; upon which the old man took his youngest daughter by the hand, and gave her to the wise prophet immediately for his wife. Thus, for some time, they continued in acts of incest and adultery, until that period which made the fatal discovery, and introduced the bloody scene of blind fanaticism and madness.

"Those deluded wretches were so far possessed with the false conceit of their own righteousness and holiness, and of the horrid wickedness of all others, that they refused obedience to the civil magistrate, and all laws and ordinances of men. Upon pretence that God commanded them to bear no arms, they not only refused to comply with the militia law, but also the laws for repairing the highways. After long forbearance, Mr. Simmons, a worthy magistrate, and the officer of the militia in that quarter, found it necessary to issue his warrants for levying the penalty of the laws upon them. But by this time Judith Dutartre, the wife of the prophet obtained by revelation, proving with child, another warrant was issued for bringing her before the justice to be examined, and bound over to the general sessions, in consequence of a law of the province, framed for preventing bastardy. The constable having received his warrants, and being jealous of meeting with no good usage in the execution of his office, prevailed on two or three of his neighbours to go along with him. The family observing the constable coming, and being apprised of his errand, consulted their prophet, who soon told them that God commanded them to arm and defend themselves against persecution, and their substance against the robberies of ungodly men, assuring them at the same time that no weapon formed against them should prosper. Accordingly they did so, and laying hold of their arms, fired on the constable and his followers, and drove them out of their plantation. Such behaviour was not to be tolerated, and therefore, Captain Simmons gathered a party of militia, and went to protect the constable in the execution of his office. When the deluded family saw the justice and his party approaching, they shut themselves up in their house, and firing from it like furies, shot Captain Simmons dead on the spot, and wounded several of his party. The militia returned the fire, killed one woman within the house, and afterwards forcibly entering it, took the rest prisoners, six in number, and brought them to Charleston. At the court of general sessions, held in September, 1724, three of them were brought to trial, found guilty, and condemned. Alas! miserable creatures, what amazing infatuation possessed them! They pretended they had the Spirit of God leading them to all truth, they knew it, and felt it; but this spirit, instead of influencing them to obedience, purity, and peace, commanded them to commit rebellion, incest, and murder. What is still more astonishing, the principal persons among them, I mean the prophet, the father of the family, and Michael Boneau, never were convinced of their delusion, but persisted in it until their last breath. During their trial, they appeared altogether unconcerned and secure, affirming that God was on their side, and therefore, they feared not what man could do unto them. They freely told the incestuous story in open court, in all its circumstances and aggravations, with a good countenance, and very readily confessed the facts respecting their rebellion and murder, with which they stood charged, but pleaded their authority from God in vindication of themselves, and insisted they had done nothing in either case but by his express command. As it is commonly the duty of clergymen to visit persons under sentence of death, both to convince them of their error and danger, and prepare them for death by bringing them to a penitent disposition, Alexander Garden, the episcopal minister of Charleston, to whom we are indebted for this account, attended these condemned persons with great diligence and concern. What they had affirmed in the court of justice, they repeated and confessed to him in like manner in the prison. When he began to reason with them, and to explain the heinous nature of their crimes, they treated him with disdain. Their motto was, Answer him not a word; who is he that shall presume to teach them, who had the Spirit of God speaking inwardly to their souls. In all they had done, they said they had obeyed the voice of God, and were now about to suffer martyrdom for his religion. But God had assured them, that he would either work a deliverance for them, or raise them up from the dead on the third day. These things the three men continued confidently to believe, and notwithstanding all the means used to convince them of their mistake, persisted

Several years afterwards, seven of the proprietors sold to the king their claim to the soil and rents, and all of them assigned to him their right of jurisdiction. The government of both Carolinas was subsequently administered in each colony by a governor and council appointed by the crown, and by assemblies chosen by the people.

After the purchase of the province, the first object of the royal concern was, to establish the peace of the colony on the most firm and permanent foundation; and to attain this object, treaties of union and alliance with Indian nations were deemed essentially necessary. For this purpose Sir Alexander Cumming was appointed, and sent out to conclude a treaty of alliance with the Cherokees, at this time a warlike and formidable nation of savages, occupying the lands about the river of Savannah, and extending to the Apalachian mountains. About the beginning of the year 1730, Sir Alexander arrived in Carolina, and made preparations for his journey to the distant hills. After a conference with the chiefs, they consented to acknowledge King George as their sovereign, and several of them repaired to England, as a deputation, to do homage to the British king. We shall not pretend to describe their feelings on beholding the metropolis of Great Britain, or their amaze-in the same belief until the moment they expired. At their execution they told the spectators, with seeming triumph, they should soon see them again, for they were certain they should rise from the dead on the third day. With respect to the other three, the daughter Judith being with child, was not tried, and the two sons, David and John Dutartre, about eighteen and twenty years of age, having been also tried and condemned, continued sullen and reserved, in hopes of seeing those that were executed rise from the dead, but being disappointed, they became, or at least seemed to become, sensible of their error, and were both pardoned. Yet, not long afterwards, one of them relapsed into the same snare, and murdered an innocent person, without either provocation or previous quarrel, and for no other reason, as he confessed, but that God had commanded him so to do. Being a second time brought to trial, he was found guilty of murder, and condemned. Mr. Garden attended him again under the second sentence, and, he acknowledged, with great appearance of success. No man could appear more deeply sensible of his error and delusion, or could die a more sincere and hearty penitent on account of his horrid crimes. With great attention he listened to Mr. Garden, while he explained to him the terms of pardon and salvation proposed in the gospel, and seemed to die in the humble hopes of mercy, through the all-sufficient merits of a Redeemer.

"Thus ended that tragical scene of fanaticism, in which seven persons lost their lives,—one was killed, two were murdered, and four executed for the murders. A signal and melancholy instance of the weakness and frailty of human nature, and to what giddy heights of extravagance and madness an inflamed imagination will carry unfortunate mortals."—History of Carolina, vol. i. p. 302—307.

* "This treaty, that it might be easier understood, was drawn up in language as similar as possible to that of the Indians, which at this time was very little known in England, and given to them, certified and approved by Sir Alexander Cumming. In answer to which, Skijagustah, in the name of the rest, made a speech to the following effect:—'We are come hither from a mountainous place, where nothing but darkness is to be found—but we are now in a ment at the extent of the city, the number of the people, and the splendour of the army and court. Being admitted into the presence of the king, they, in the name of their nation, promised to continue for ever his majesty's faithful and obedient subjects. A treaty was drawn up, and signed by the secretary to the lords commissioners of trade and plantations on one side, and by the six chiefs on the other.*

The Cherokees, however barbarous, were a free and independent people; and this method of obtaining a share of their lands by the general consent, was fair and honourable in itself, and most agreeable to the general principles of equity, and the English constitution. An agreement was made with them, in consequence of which the king could not only give a just title to Indian lands; but, by Indians becoming his voluntary subjects, the colonists obtained peaceable possession. The Cherokees held abundance of territory from nature, and could spare a share of it with little injury to themselves; but reason and justice required that it be obtained by their free consent. By such treaties mutual presents were made, mutual obligations were established, and, for the performance of the conditions required, the honour and faith of both parties were pledged. Even to men in a barbarous state, such policy was the most agreeable, as place where there is light.—There was a person in our country—he gave us a yellow token of warlike honour, which is left with Moytoy, of Telliquo—and as warriors we received it.—He came to us like a warrior from you.—A man he is;—his talk is upright—and the token he left preserves his memory among us.—We look upon you as if the great king were present;—we love you as representing the great king;—we shall die in the same way of thinking.—The crown of our nation is different from that which the great King George wears, and from that we saw in the tower.—But to us it is all one.—The chain of friendship shall be carried to our people.—We look upon the great King George as the sun, and as our father, and upon ourselves as his children.—For though we are red, and you are white, yet our hands and hearts are joined together.—When we shall have acquainted our people with what we have seen, our children from generation to generation will always remember it.—In war we shall always be one with you. The enemies of the great king shall be our enemies;—his people and ours shall be one, and shall die together.—We came hither naked and poor as the worms of the earth, but you have every thing,—and we that have nothing must love you, and will never break the chain of friendship which is between us.—Here stands the governor of Carolina, whom we know.—This small rope we show you is all that we have to bind our slaves with, and it may be broken.—But you have iron chains for yours.—However, if we catch your slaves, we will bind them as well as we can, and deliver them to our friends, and take no pay for it.—We have looked round for the person that was in our country—he is not here;—however, we must say he talked uprightly to us, and we shall never forget him.—Your white people may very safely build houses near us;—we shall hurt nothing that belongs to them, for we are children of one father, the great king, and shall live and die together.' Then laying down his feathers upon the table, he added, 'This is our way of talking, which is the same thing to us as your letters in the book are to you; and to you, beloved men, we deliver these feathers in confirmation of all we have said.'"—History of South Carolina, vol. ii. p. 9, 10.

will afterwards clearly appear ; for the Cherokees, in consequence of this treaty, for many years remained in a state of perfect friendship and peace with the colonists, who followed their various employments in the neighbourhood of those Indians without the least terror or molestation.

As a natural consequence of its domestic security, the credit of the province in England increased. The merchants of London, Bristol, and Liverpool, turned their eyes to Carolina, as a new and promising channel of trade, and established houses in Charleston for conducting their business with the greater ease and success. Hitherto, however, small progress in cultivation had been made, and the face of the country appeared like a desert, with little spots here and there cleared, scarcely discernible amidst the immense forest. Charleston, at this time, consisted of between five and six hundred houses, mostly built of timber, and neither well constructed nor comfortable ; but from this period the province improved in building as well as in agriculture ; many ingenious artificers and tradesmen of different kinds found encouragement in it, and introduced a taste for brick buildings, and more neat and pleasant habitations. In process of time, as the colony increased in numbers, the face of the country changed, and the planters made a rapid progress towards wealth and independence. At this period, for the relief of poor and indigent people of Great Britain and Ireland, and for the security of the southern frontier of Carolina, the settlement of a new colony between the rivers Alatomaha and Savannah was projected in England.

The Carolinas now attracted general attention, and their population was increased by accessions from several of the states of Europe. Encouraged by the assurances and the arrangements of their countryman, John Peter Pury, a native of Neufchatel, in Switzerland, one hundred and seventy persons emigrated with him to this province, and not long after they were joined by two hundred more. The governor, according to agreement, allotted forty thousand acres of land for the use of the Swiss settlement on the north-east side of Savannah river ; and a town was marked out for their accommodation, which he called Purisburgh, from the name of the principal promoter of the settlement. These settlers, however, felt very severely the change of climate, to which many of their lives fell a sacrifice ; and for some years the survivors deeply regretted the voluntary banishment to which they had subjected themselves. In the same year, according to a plan that had been recently adopted in England for the more speedy population and settlement of Carolina, eleven townships were marked out on the sides of rivers, in square plats, each consisting of twenty thousand acres. Two of these townships were laid out on the Alatomaha ; two on the Savannah ; two on the Santee ; one on the Pedee ; one on the Wacamaw ; one on the Wateree ; and one on Black River. The lands in these townships were divided into shares of fifty acres for each man, woman, and child, who should come over to occupy and improve them. In 1737, multitudes of labourers and husbandmen in Ireland, unable to procure a comfortable subsistence for their families in their native land, embarked for Carolina. The first colony of Irish, receiving a grant of lands near Santee River, formed a settlement, which was called Williamsburgh.

In 1738, an alarming insurrection of the negroes occurred in the southern colony. A number of them assembled at Stono, and surprised and killed two men who had charge of a warehouse, from which they took guns and ammunition. They then chose a captain, and, with drums beating and colours flying, marched south-westward. They burned every house on their way, killed all the whites they could find, and compelled other negroes to join them. Governor Bull, who was returning to Charleston from the southward, accidentally met them, hastened out of their way, and spread an alarm. The news soon reached Wiltown, where, fortunately, a large congregation were attending divine service. The men having, according to a law of the province, brought their arms to the place of worship, marched instantly in quest of the negroes, who, by this time, had become formidable, and spread terror and desolation around them, having killed about twenty of the whites. While, in an open field, they were carousing and dancing, with frantic exultation at their late success, they were suddenly attacked ; some were killed, and the remainder took to flight, but most of them were taken and tried. Those who had been compelled to join the conspirators were pardoned ; but the leaders and principal instigators suffered death. Under apprehensions resulting, probably, from this rebellion, the legislature of South Carolina passed an act, that whoever shall teach, or cause any slave or slaves to be taught to write, or shall use or employ any slave as a scribe in any manner of writing whatsoever, shall, for every such offence, forfeit the sum of one hundred pounds.*

From this period until the era of the revolution, no important event occurred in these colonies. They were sometimes distressed by Indian wars ; but the number of inhabitants, and the means of subsistence and comfort, were constantly increasing. Among other sources of wealth, the cultivation of the Indigo plant deserves particular notice. Some seed imported from the West Indies was sown as an experiment; and it was so entirely successful, that several planters turned their immediate attention to its culture, and studied the art of extracting the dye. At the port of Charleston, during the year 1744, two hundred and thirty vessels were loaded, and fifteen hundred seamen were employed in the trade of Carolina.

The Carolinas were frequently exposed to the injurious effects of war from the French and Spaniards, as well as from some of the Indian tribes; but after the treaty of Paris, the progress of these colonies was no longer retarded from that cause. The assembly of South Carolina, taking advantage of the peaceful state of the colony to encourage emigration, appropriated a large fund for bounties to foreign protestants, and such industrious poor people of Great Britain and Ireland as should resort to the province within three years, and settle on the inland parts. Two townships, each containing forty-eight thousand acres, were laid out; one on the river Savannah, called Mecklenburgh, and the other on the waters of Santee at Long Cane, called Londonderry. Not long after, the colony received a considerable accession from Germany, the occasion of which was peculiar. Between five and six hundred poor Germans, seduced into England by deceitful promises, were commiserated by the citizens of London, who provided for their relief. The king expressing a desire of transporting them to Carolina, two ships were furnished for their accommodation, and provisions for their voyage, and a hundred and fifty stand of arms were ordered from the Tower, and given them by the king. On their arrival, in April, at Charleston, the assembly of the province voted five hundred pounds sterling to be distributed among them; one of the two townships was allotted to them, and divided in the most equitable manner into small tracts, for the convenience of each family; and all possible assistance was given toward their speedy and comfortable settlement. Carolina also received at this time more than two hundred settlers from France. The province furnished them with the means of conveyance to Long Cane, where vacant lands were laid out for their use, to which they gave the name of New Bordeaux, after the capital of the province from which most of them had emigrated. Besides foreign protestants, several persons emigrated from England and Scotland, and great multitudes from Ireland, and settled in Carolina. An accession was also derived from the northern colonies, from which, in the space of one year, above a thousand families removed thither. To these adventurers, lands in small tracts were allotted on the frontiers, by which means the back settlements soon became the most populous part of the province, while the whole felt the important benefits resulting from such accessions to its population.

CHAPTER XII.

GEORGIA.

THE last of the colonies commenced previous to the war of independence was Georgia. It originated in the desire of the government to strengthen the southern frontier of the British dominions in America against the encroachments of the Spaniards; and at the same time to afford an opportunity for emigration to a number of families in indigent circumstances. With these views, a company of wealthy, influential, and benevolent persons, was formed in England, who did not hesitate to embark a considerable sum in the promotion of their humane design. Having obtained a patent from George II., conferring on them the requisite powers, they enacted, among other regulations, that the lands should neither be sold nor devised by the owners, but should descend to the male children only; they prohibited the use of rum in the colony, and strictly interdicted the importation of negroes: but none of these regulations remained long in force.

The trustees lost no time in the prosecution of their design. In November, James Oglethorpe, one of their number, embarked at Gravesend for Georgia, with one hundred and sixteen persons, destined for settlement in the country. In the following January he arrived at Charleston, where he was treated with hospitality and respect by the governor and council of South Carolina, and received great encouragement and assistance. Having explored the country, he fixed on a high spot of ground, in the vicinity of an Indian town on the Savannah, called Yamacraw, as the most convenient and healthy situation. The new town, after the Indian name of the river which ran by it, was called Savannah. A fort having been completed, and the colony put in a state of safety, the next object of Oglethorpe's attention was to treat with the Indians for a share of their possessions. The territory was principally occupied by the Upper and Lower Creeks, who were computed to amount to about twenty-five thousand, including women and children; and these tribes, according to a treaty formerly made with Governor Nicholson, laid claim to the lands lying south-west of Savannah river. The tribe of Indians at Yamacraw was inconsiderable. It appeared, therefore, of the highest consequence to procure the friendship, not of that tribe only, but of the more formidable Creeks. By the assistance of an Indian woman, who had married a trader from Carolina, and who could speak both the English and Creek languages, Oglethorpe summoned a general meeting of the chiefs to hold a congress with him at Savannah, in order to procure their consent to the peaceable settlement of his colony. Being assembled, he represented to them the great power, wisdom, and wealth of the English; and the advantages that would accrue to the Indian tribes from a connexion with this nation; and expressed his hope, that, as they had plenty of lands, they would freely resign a share of them to his people, who, for their benefit and instruction, had come to settle among them. After he had distributed presents among the Indians, an agreement was made; and Tomochichi, in the name of the Creek warriors, made a speech to him. Among other observations, he said, "Here is a little present," and then gave him a buffalo's skin, painted on the inside with the head and feathers of an eagle, and desired him to accept it, "because the eagle signified speed, and the buffalo, strength. The English," he proceeded, "are as swift as the bird, and as strong as the beast; since, like the first, they fly from the utmost parts of the earth over vast seas, and, like the second, nothing can withstand them. The feathers of the eagle are soft, and signify love; the buffalo's skin warm, and signifies protection; he hoped, therefore, that they would love and protect their little families."

Having concluded this treaty of friendship with the natives, and placed his colony in the best posture of defence, Oglethorpe returned to England, carrying with him Tomochichi, his queen, and several other Indians. On their arrival in London, these Indian chiefs were introduced to his majesty; and during the whole time they were in England, nothing was neglected that might serve to engage their affections, and fill them with just notions of the greatness and power of the British nation. The nobility, curious to see them, and observe their manners, entertained them magnificently at their tables. Wherever they went, multitudes flocked around them, shaking hands with the rude warriors of the forest, giving them little presents, and treating them with every mark of friendship and civility. Twenty pounds a-week were allowed them by the crown while they remained in England, and when they returned, it was computed they carried with them presents to the value of four hundred pounds. After staying four months, and seeing the grandeur of the English sovereign, they were carried to Gravesend in one of his majesty's carriages, where they embarked for Georgia, highly pleased with the generosity of the nation, and promising eternal fidelity to its interest. This generous and kind method of treating barbarians was better policy than overawing them by force, and was attended, as might have been expected, with the happiest consequences.

During the following year, five or six hundred poor persons arrived, and to each a portion of the wilderness was assigned. But it was soon found that these emigrants, who were the refuse of cities, and had been rendered poor by idleness, and irresolute by poverty, were not fitted to fell the mighty forests of Georgia. A race more hardy and enterprising was necessary. The trustees, therefore, offered to receive those who had not by persecution or poverty been rendered objects of compassion, and to grant to all who should repair to the colony fifty acres of land. In consequence of this offer, more than four hundred persons from Germany, Scotland, and Switzerland, embarked for the colony in the year 1735. To the Highlanders, a township was allotted on the river Alatomaha, which was then considered as the boundary between the British and Spanish territories. Here they built a fort, which they called Darien; and a town, which they called New Inverness. In February, 1736, Oglethorpe arrived with two ships, which had on board three hundred passengers. More than half of these were Germans, who, with others of their countrymen who followed them, settled a town on Savannah, which they called Ebenezer.

The celebrated John Wesley made a visit to Georgia during this year, for the purpose of preaching to the colonists, and converting the Indians. Among the former he made some friends, but, it would appear, more enemies. He was accused of diverting the people from labour, of fomenting divisions, of claiming and exercising high and unwarranted ecclesiastical authority. Thirteen indictments for alleged offences were preferred against him; but before the time of trial arrived he returned to England, where, as is well known, he pursued a successful and distinguished career of piety and usefulness.

It was about this time that Oglethorpe took effective measures to fortify the colony. A fort was erected on the banks of the Savannah river; another on an island near the mouth of the river Alatomaha, where a town, called Frederica, was regularly laid out and built; and ten miles nearer the sea, on Cumberland island, was raised a battery, commanding the entrance into Jekyl sound, through which all ships of force must pass to reach Frederica. The Spaniards, taking umbrage at these fortifications of the English, sent from Havannah a commissioner, who, in a conference with Oglethorpe, demanded that he and his people should immediately evacuate the territories to the southward of St. Helena sound, as belonging to the king of Spain. Oglethorpe having endeavoured in vain to convince the commissioner of the erroneousness of this claim, and the conference breaking up without any agreement, he embarked with all possible expedition for England.

On this occasion Oglethorpe was appointed general and commander-in-chief of all his majesty's forces in South Carolina and Georgia, and was sent out from England with a regiment of six hundred men for the protection of the southern frontiers of the British dominions in America. During his absence, the Spaniards had made several attempts to seduce the Creeks, who were much attached to Oglethorpe; and, at the time of his arrival, some of the Creek chiefs were at St. Augustine. When they returned, they found an invitation from General Oglethorpe to all the chieftains to meet him at Frederica. A number of the head warriors immediately set out to meet him at the place appointed; where the general thanked them for their fidelity, made them many valuable presents, and renewed with them the treaty of friendship and alliance. The Spaniards, however, hesitated at the employment of no means to prevent the establishment of British colonies on their northern frontier. Finding opportunity to corrupt an English soldier who had been in the Spanish service, a mutiny through his influence was excited in Oglethorpe's camp, and a daring attempt was made to assassinate the general; but his life was preserved in an extraordinary manner, and the principal conspirators were shot.

About this time the indefatigable George Whitefield arrived in the colony. He had already become conspicuous in England by his ardent piety, his extraordinary eloquence, and his active zeal. He came to Georgia for the benevolent purpose of establishing an orphan-house, where poor children might be fed, clothed, and educated in the knowledge of christianity. In the prosecution of this purpose he often crossed the Atlantic, and traversed Great Britain and America, soliciting aid from the pious and charitable. Wherever he went, he preached with sincerity and fervour, and with such success, as to found a sect, which soon became both numerous and respectable. His orphan-house did not flourish during his life, and after his death was entirely abandoned. Although his proceedings and character would form very interesting topics, they do not come properly within the sphere of this history; and their principal incidents, as connected, with America, have been noticed in a preceding chapter.

In the year 1740, the trustees rendered an account of their administration. At that time nearly two thousand five hundred emigrants had arrived in the colony; of whom more than fifteen hundred were indigent Englishmen, or persecuted protestants. The benefactions from government and from individuals had been nearly half a million of dollars; and it was computed that, for every person transported and maintained by the trustees, more than three hundred dollars had been expended. The hopes which the trustees had cherished, that the colony would be prosperous, and the objects of their benevolence happy, were far from realized. Such was the character of the greater part of the settlers and the nature of the restrictions imposed, that the plantations languished, and continued to require the contributions of the charitable. In the mean time events were preparing a rupture in Europe, and a war between England and Spain appeared inevitable. The plenipotentiaries, appointed for settling the boundaries between Georgia and Florida, and other differences and misunderstandings subsisting between the two crowns, had met at Pardo in convention, where preliminary articles were drawn up; but the conference ended to the satisfaction of neither party. The merchants had lost all patience under their sufferings, and became clamorous for letters of reprisal, which at length they obtained; all officers of the navy and army were ordered to their stations, and, with the unanimous voice of the nation, war was declared against Spain on the 23d of October, 1739. As soon as intelligence of the declaration of war reached Georgia, General Oglethorpe passed over to Florida with four hundred select men of his regiment, and a considerable party of Indians; and a few days after, he marched with his whole force, consisting of above two thousand men, regulars, provincials, and Indians, to Fort Moosa, within two miles of St. Augustine. The Spanish garrison, evacuating the fort on his approach, and retiring into the town, put themselves in a posture of defence; and the general, soon discovering that an attempt to take the castle by storm would be presumptuous, changed his plan of operations, and resolved, with the assistance of the ships of war which were lying at anchor off Augustine bar, to turn the siege into a blockade. Having made the necessary dispositions, he summoned the Spanish governor to a surrender; but, secure in his strong-hold, he sent him for answer, that he would be glad to shake hands with him in his castle. Indignant at this reply, the general opened his batteries against the castle, and at the same time threw a number of shells in the town. The fire was returned with equal spirit from the Spanish fort, and from six half-galleys in the harbour; but the distance was so great that the cannonade, though it continued several days, did little execution on either side. It appears that, notwithstanding the blockade, the Spanish garrison contrived to admit a reinforcement of seven hundred men, and a large supply of provisions. All prospect of starving the enemy being lost, the army began to despair of forcing the place to surrender. The Carolina troops, enfeebled by the heat of the climate, dispirited by sickness, and fatigued by fruitless efforts, marched away in large bodies. The naval commander, in consideration of the shortness of his provisions, and of the near approach of the usual season of hurricanes, judged it imprudent to hazard his fleet longer on that coast. The general himself was sick of a fever, and his regiment was worn out with fatigue, and disabled by sickness. These combined disasters rendered it necessary to abandon the enterprise; and Oglethorpe, with extreme sorrow and regret, returned to Frederica.

After a lapse of two years, the Spaniards prepared to retaliate by the invasion of Georgia, intending, if successful, to subjugate the Carolinas and Virginia. On receiving information of their approach, General Oglethorpe solicited assistance from South Carolina: but the inhabitants of that colony, entertaining a strong prejudice against him, and terrified by the danger which threatened themselves, determined to provide only for their own safety, though without avowing their intention. General Oglethorpe, however, made preparations for a vigorous defence. He assembled seven hundred men, exclusive of a body of Indians, fixed his head-quarters at Frederica, on the island of St. Simon, and, with this small band, determined to encounter whatever force might be brought against him. It was his utmost hope that he might be able to resist the enemy until a reinforcement should arrive from Carolina, which he daily and anxiously expected. On the last day of June, the Spanish fleet, consisting of thirty-two sail, and having on board more than three thousand men, came to anchor off St. Simon's Bay. Notwithstanding all the resistance which General Oglethorpe could oppose, they sailed up the river Alatamaha, landed upon the island, and there erected fortifications. Convinced that his small force, if divided, must be entirely inefficient, Oglethorpe assembled the whole of it at Frederica. One portion he employed in strengthening his fortifications; the Highlanders and Indians ranging night and day through the woods, often attacked the outposts of the enemy. The toil of the troops was incessant; and the long delay of the expected succours, still unexpectedly withheld by South Carolina, caused the most gloomy and depressing apprehensions. Oglethorpe, at length, learning, by an English prisoner who escaped from the Spanish camp, that a difference subsisted between the troops from Cuba and those from St. Augustine, so as to occasion a separate encampment, resolved to attack the enemy while thus divided. Taking advantage of his knowledge of the woods, he marched out in the night with three hundred chosen men, the Highland company, and some rangers, with the intention of surprising the enemy. Having advanced within two miles of the Spanish camp, he halted his troops, and went forward himself with a select corps to reconnoitre the enemy's situation. While he was endeavouring cautiously to conceal his approach, a French soldier of his party discharged his musket, and ran into the Spanish lines. Thus betrayed, he hastened his return to Frederica, and endeavoured to effect by stratagem what could not be achieved by surprise. Apprehensive that the deserter would discover to the enemy his weakness, he wrote to him a letter, desiring him to acquaint the Spaniards with the defenceless state of Frederica, and the ease with which his small garrison might be cut to pieces. He pressed him to bring forward the Spaniards to an attack; but, if he could not prevail thus far, to use all his art and influence to persuade them to stay at least three days more at Fort Simon; for within that time, according to advices he had just received from Carolina, he should have a reinforcement of two thousand land forces, with six British ships of war. The letter concluded with a caution to the deserter against dropping the least hint of Admiral Vernon's meditated attack upon St. Augustine, and with an assurance that for his service he should be amply rewarded by the British king. Oglethorpe gave it to a Spanish prisoner, who, for a small reward, together with his liberty, promised to deliver it to the French deserter. On his arrival at the Spanish camp, however, he gave the letter, as Oglethorpe expected, to the commander-in-chief, who instantly put the deserter in irons. This letter perplexed and confounded the Spaniards; some suspecting it to be a stratagem to prevent an attack on Frederica, and others believing it to contain serious instructions to direct the conduct of a spy. While the Spanish officers were deliberating what measures to adopt, an incident, not within the calculation of military skill, or the control of human power, decided their counsels. Three ships of force, which the governor of South Carolina had sent out to Oglethorpe's aid, appeared at this juncture off the coast. The agreement of this discovery with the contents of the letter convinced the Spanish commander of its real intention. The whole army, seized with an instant panic, set fire to the fort, and precipitately embarked, leaving several cannon, with a quantity of provisions and military stores; and thus, in the moment of threatened conquest, was the infant colony providentially saved.

Thus was Georgia, with trifling loss, delivered from the most imminent danger. General Oglethorpe not only retrieved, but established his reputation. From the Carolinians, grateful for their preservation, and from the governors of most of the northern colonies, he received cordial congratulations upon his address and good fortune. But, on an impeachment brought forward before this invasion, Oglethorpe still felt himself bound in honour to return to England, where, on trial, the charge was adjudged to be false, malicious, and groundless, and its author dismissed his majesty's service. The character of this able general now appeared in its true light; and his contemporaries acknowledged, what impartial history records, that

* "George Whitefield, an eloquent itinerant preacher, was born in Gloucester, England, December 16, 1714. After having made some progress in classical learning, he was obliged to assist his mother, who kept an inn, in her business; but at the age of eighteen, he entered one of the colleges at Oxford. Here he became acquainted with Messrs. John and Charles Wesley, whose piety was ardent and singular, like his own. From the strict rules and methods of life which these young men followed, they were called Methodists, and they were the founders of the sect thus denominated. Mr. Whitefield's benevolent zeal led him to visit the poor, and even to search out the miserable objects in the jails, not only to diminish their wants, but that he might impart to them the consolations and hopes of the gospel. He took orders, being ordained by the bishop, June 20, 1736, and preached his first sermon in the church at Gloucester. When a complaint was afterwards entered with the bishop, that by this sermon he drove fifteen persons mad, the worthy prelate only expressed a wish, that the madness might not be forgotten before the next Sunday. After preaching at various places, he was induced, by a letter from Mr. Wesley, who was in Georgia, to embark for America. He arrived at Savannah May 7, 1738. After labouring in this place with unwearied fidelity for several months to promote the interests of religion, he embarked for England on the sixth of September. He was ordained priest, at Oxford, by Bishop Benson, January 14, 1739. In November he again arrived in America, and he travelled through the middle and southern colonies, dispensing the gospel to immense multitudes. In September, 1740, he arrived at Rhode Island from Savannah, having been invited by the ministers of Boston, and he preached in different parts of New England. At the end of October, he went to New York, and he soon returned to Georgia. He was much occupied in the establishment of an orphan house near Savannah. In January, 1741, he sailed for England. He arrived again in America in October, 1744, and he now spent between three and four years in this country. In March, 1748, he went to the Bermudas, and in July he reached London. When he commenced his career in England, the religion of the heart was much neglected, in the care to defend the outworks of Christianity against the assaults of infidels. If these assailants were repulsed, still the ingenious disquisitions of the day carried no terror into the enemy's camp; and the over-anxious attempts to conciliate unhumiliated reason, rather than to reduce the unholy heart to the obedience of the cross, could not fail to encourage the opposers of the truth. Mr. Whitefield, while aware of the necessity of enlightening the mind, knew also that there was much theological learning which had little influence upon the life. He therefore chose to content himself with preaching the plain and important doctrines of the gospel. These he presented so distinctly to the view, and enforced by such awful considerations, and with such energy and unexampled eloquence, that, through the divine agency, (without which he knew that his

to him Carolina was indebted for her safety and repose, as well as Georgia for her existence and protection. After this period, General Oglethorpe never returned to the province of Georgia, but upon all occasions discovered in England an uncommon zeal for its prosperity and improvement. From its first settlement, the colony had hitherto been under a military government, executed by the general and such officers as he thought proper to nominate and appoint; but now the trustees established a kind of civil government, and committed the charge of it to a president and four assistants, who were to act agreeably to the instructions they should receive from them, and to be accountable to that corporation for their public conduct.

Great occasions bring forth great men. There was not one of the colonies that cannot claim several men of distinguished talents and virtues in their early history. They sometimes incurred the displeasure of those who were incapable of comprehending the extensive views of the pioneers in the great cause of freedom; but time has swept away the clouds which gathered around them, and left their reputations in the clearness of day. Not only Oglethorpe, but Whitefield* was a distinguished friend to labours would be utterly in vain,) he was the means of imparting the pure principles and the elevated hopes of religion to thousands, both in Great Britain and America. No preacher ever had such astonishing power over the passions of his auditory, or was attended by such multitudes as he sometimes addressed in the fields. In the early periods of his life, he was guilty, in some instances, of uncharitableness and indiscretion; but he afterwards had the magnanimity to confess his fault. He was, in reality, a man of a very liberal and catholic spirit, for he had little attachment to forms, and embraced all who loved the Lord Jesus in sincerity. His life was spent in most disinterested and benevolent exertion. The following lines will show the opinion which was formed of his character by the evangelical poet Cowper:—

'He loved the world, that hated him; the tear
That dropped upon his Bible was sincere:
Assailed by scandal and the tongue of strife,
His only answer was, a blameless life,—
And he that forged, and he that threw, the dart,
Had each a brother's interest in his heart.
Paul's love of Christ and steadiness unbribed,
Were copied close in him, and well transcribed:
He followed Paul—his zeal a kindred flame,
His apostolic charity the same;
Like him, crossed cheerfully tempestuous seas,
Forsaking country, kindred, friends, and ease;
Like him he laboured, and, like him, content
To bear it, suffered shame where'er he went.
Blush, Calumny! and write upon his tomb,
If honest Eulogy can spare thee room,
Thy deep repentance of thy thousand lies,
Which, aimed at him, have pierced th'offended skies
And say, Blot out my sin, confessed, deplored, Against thine image in thy saint, O Lord!'

"Mr. Whitefield's letters, sermons, and controversial and other tracts, with an account of his life, were published in seven volumes, 8vo 1771."

The eloquence of Whitefield was of a high order. His voice was strong, clear, and perfectly under command. His style was marked with great simplicity; yet he made, in the language of dramatic criticism, as many points as he could in his discourses, such as would secure the attention of his audience. He was figurative; but his images all reflected nature with such accuracy, that the humblest capacity caught his meaning, and felt the effects of his illustrations. It was not the humble alone, who were pleased with his preaching. Many of the learned became his followers, and united in blazoning his fame. He was incessant in his labours to enlighten and direct the Georgia. Whitefield, in his way, was as remarkable a personage as any of the founders of the colonies.

Oglethorpe, at the breaking out of the revolutionary war, was offered the command of the English army in America, after the return of General Gage. Oglethorpe was then a major-general in the service. He offered to accept the command, if he was authorized to assure the colonies that justice should be done them; but the command was given to Sir William Howe. General Oglethorpe died August, 1785, having seen the independence of the United States, at the great age of ninety-seven: probably at his death he was the oldest field officer in Europe. He enjoyed, while living, the reputation of being one of the most humane soldiers that ever bore arms.

In the year 1749, the colony was exposed to great danger from a quarter as unexpected as it was singulars of his hearers. Frequently he preached three sermons a day for weeks together, and this while he was labouring under an asthmatic affection. Franklin speaks of the wonderful effects of his voice while preaching in the open air. Of the effects of his eloquence, the late learned and pious Lt. Governor Samuel Phillips, of Andover, Massachusetts used to relate the following anecdote:—Mr. Phillips's grandfather was a rigid Presbyterian preacher, and opposed to Whitefield's course; but, wishing to know if there was any truth in the stories of the effects produced by his eloquence, sent his son and his grandson to hear the orator. They reached the assembly, who were listening to Whitefield, without any partialities for the preacher. The two critics, in the bustle of the crowd, had been separated; and each, looking around for the other, when the sermon grew pathetic, found that their eyes met streaming with tears.

If Whitefield had many enemies, he had more friends, some of them of the first order of intellect. On one of his excursions through New York, New Jersey, and New England, he was accompanied by the Rev. Aaron Burr, then, or soon afterwards, president of Nassau Hall, the college at Princeton, New Jersey. Mr. Burr was one of the most learned and eloquent men of the age, and deservedly popular with all classes of people. He was mild and gentle in his preaching, which formed a fine contrast to the whirlwind of Whitefield's eloquence. It was a common saying in New England, that "Whitefield should first break the stubborn heart, and Burr should follow to heal the anguish of the penitent sufferer!" Burr had a clear, sweet voice, and modulated it with great felicity; but it had not sufficient compass for field-preaching, which he never attempted; but Whitefield's voice was fitted for the open field by its volume and extent.

Much has been said against field-preaching in this country, and there can be no doubt that many evils flow from it, and Mr. Whitefield has been charged with having first set the example. It is a fact, that cannot be denied, that he was the first who commenced this Druidical form of worship in the open air in later times; but he was sustained by primitive examples. The apostles had but few other places to teach their religion. The temples of the heathen gods were shut against them. They were obliged to use mountains and vales as temples where to teach their doctrines; for they did not erect edifices for public worship for ages. The first temple dedicated to Christian worship, was built at Tyre, on the site where once stood a heathen temple. The forms and ceremonies used at this consecration, contained all, and more, than are used in such services at the present day. If field-preaching should be discouraged in populous places, there being a sufficient number of churches and public edifices for all religious purposes, it is not so in a new country. In thinly-populated places, it is of great advantage to the community to become acquainted with each other; and it is much better for them to meet under religious sanctions than political excitements. In political meetings there is often drinking, carousing, and gambling; but in these religious meetings, there is no such thing. These camp-meetings are generally conducted with decorum and modesty, and no evils take place, except now and then a trifling violation of the English language, which does but little injury, and gives but little offence. These assemblies are social and affectionate. As they are attended by both sexes, there is a softening of manners by this intercourse; and many judicious matches are made, which serve to bring distant settlers to be friends and kindred to each other. In the hours which are not devoted to spiritual concerns, the public welfare is discussed, particularly those branches

lar. During the whole of his administration, General Oglethorpe had, from motives of policy, treated an Indian, or rather half-breed woman, called Mary Musgrove, afterwards Mary Bosomworth, with particular kindness and generosity. Finding that she had great influence among the Creeks, and understood their language, he made use of her as an interpreter, in order the more easily to form treaties of alliance with them; allowing her, for her services, one hundred pounds sterling a year. Thomas Bosomworth, who was chaplain to Oglethorpe's regiment, had married this woman, accepted a tract of land from the crown, and settled in the province. Being unsuccessful in most of his speculations, he had recourse to one of an extraordinary kind. He persuaded his wife to assert herself to be the elder sister to Malaof it which relate to schools and religious societies—and all is done in a Christian temper, for the ground, in their view, on which they stand, is holy. I am no fanatic, but I do not hesitate to confess, that I have spent many pleasant and instructive days in frontier camp-meetings, and feel it an incumbent duty to disabuse those who know them only by unfavourable report, and have therefore condemned them; and have also been desirous of vindicating the fame of the great father of field-preaching in America. He has not done any injury to morals by his example.

It would be unfair to judge of Whitefield's mental strength or eloquence by the sermons that pass as his. They were taken by inexperienced reporters, in short-hand, and then moulded to suit some tasteless fanatic. No man could have produced such effects as he is known to have done, by such sentiments and language as are found in these spurious sermons. There are some splendid passages still lingering in the memory of the aged, that are entirely unlike the disconnected and tasteless style in which these sermons are published. It is a slander upon a great man's fame, to change the thoughts that breathe, and words that burn, to jejune and vulgar language, and to make him talk with crudity and ignorance, who shook the nations by his eloquence.

It is now more than sixty-four years since his death; yet there are those, in various parts of the United States, still living, who date their first serious impressions from his eloquent sermons, and who have now a very vivid recollection of his person, manner, and voice.—Mr. Whitefield died at Newburyport, in the county of Essex, and commonwealth of Massachusetts, in September, 1770, and was buried in a tomb under the pulpit of the first Presbyterian church in that town. The pastor of that church, the Reverend Jonathan Parsons, soon followed his friend to another life, and, by his request, was laid by his side. The Reverend Mr. Prince, an interesting, pious, blind preacher, when dying, made the same request, and his remains were deposited there also. The tomb was then closed with a wall of brick, the Reverend John Murray, the successor of Mr. Parsons, expressing his wish to be placed in a common burying-ground. Here the ashes of the great field orator slumbered, without any monument to bear his name or record his deeds, until a few years since, when an opulent individual of that town, William Bartlett, Esq., caused a beautiful marble monument to be erected in the church under which Whitefield was buried, sacred to the memory of the Christian orator and pious divine.

These monuments, cold philosophy may say, are nothing to the dead. If that be true, they still teach the living many useful lessons. It is from history that we draw the information that we possess, and the wisdom which is the guide of life; and what is history but the records of the deeds of men who have departed from this scene of action, having finished their labours? The wise, as well as the rustic, require memorials to quicken the heart, and to lead the mind to the contemplation of a future state. An elegant monument, with just inscriptions, proves the state of the arts and of letters at the time it was erected,—and with letters and the arts is connected, in no small degree, the happiness of man. In the excess of modern philanthropy, it is often said, that money expended in building monuments to the dead, had served a better purpose, had it been given to the poor. He serves man best, who honestly employs him most. The labour requisite to erect a monument, is diffused through a hundred hands, and benefits the industrious labourer, and cherishes the genius who plans and gives the finishing touches of art to the work.

Malatche, the Indian chief, and to have descended, by a maternal line, from an Indian king, who held from nature the whole territory of the Creeks; and therefore to possess a right to them, superior not only to that of the trustees, but also to that of the king. Accordingly, Mary assumed the title of an independent empress, disavowing all subjection or allegiance to the king of Great Britain, otherwise than by way of treaty or alliance, such as one independent sovereign might voluntarily enter into with another; a meeting of all the Creeks was summoned, to whom Mary made a long speech, in which she set forth the justice of her claim, and the great injury she and her beloved subjects had sustained by the loss of their territories, and urged them to a defence of their rights by force of arms. The Indians were fired with rage at the idea of such indignity, and to a man pledged themselves to stand by her to the last drop of their blood in defence of her royal person and their lands; in consequence of which, queen Mary, escorted by a large body of her savage subjects, set out for Savannah, to demand from the president and council a formal acknowledgment of her rights in the province. A messenger was despatched, to notify to the president the royal family's approach, to say that Mary had assumed her right and title of sovereignty over the whole territories of the upper and lower Creeks, and to demand that all the lands south of Savannah river should be relinquished without loss of time; adding, that she was the hereditary and rightful queen of both nations, and could command the whole force of her tribe, and, in case of refusal, she had determined to extirpate the whole settlement. President Stephens and his council, alarmed at her high pretensions and bold threats, and sensible of her influence with the Indians, from her having been made a woman of consequence as an interpreter, were not a little embarrassed what steps to take for the public safety; they thought it best to use soft and healing measures, until an opportunity might offer of privately laying hold of her and shipping her off to England.

* The speech of the president at one of these conferences gives a very clear statement of the affair:—"Friends and brothers: When Mr. Oglethorpe and his people first arrived in Georgia, they found Mary, then the wife of John Musgrove, living in a small hut at Yamacraw; he had a license from the governor of South Carolina to trade with the Indians; she then appeared to be in a poor ragged condition, and was neglected and despised by the Creeks; but General Oglethorpe, finding that she could speak both the English and Creek languages, employed her as an interpreter, richly clothed her, and made her a woman of the consequence she now appears; the people of Georgia always respected her, until she married Bosomworth, but from that time she has proved a liar and a deceiver. In fact, she was no relation of Malatche, but the daughter of an Indian woman of no note, by a white man: General Oglethorpe did not treat with her for the lands of Georgia, for

In the mean time, the militia were ordered to hold themselves in readiness to march to Savannah, at the shortest notice. The town was put in the best possible state of defence, but its whole force amounted to only one hundred and seventy men able to bear arms; a messenger was sent to Mary, while she was yet several miles distant from Savannah, at the head of her mighty host, to know whether she was serious in such wild pretensions, and to try the influence of persuasion to induce her to dismiss her followers, and drop her audacious design; but finding her inflexible and resolute, the president resolved to put on a bold countenance, and receive the savages with firmness. Several interviews between the magistrates and the Indian chiefs took place on this strange occurrence, and the president* and council were flattering themselves with the idea of an amicable compromise of all the existing difficulties, and rejoicing in the re-establishment of friendly intercourse with the Creeks, when Mary, excited with liquor, and disappointed in her royal views, rushed in amongst them like a fury, told the president that these were her people, that he had no business with them, and that he should soon be convinced of it to his cost. The president calmly advised her to retire to her lodgings, and forbear to poison the minds of the Indians, adding, that he would otherwise order her into close confinement; upon which, turning about to Malatche, in great rage, she repeated, with some ill-natured comments, what the president had said; Malatche started from his seat, laid hold of his arms, calling upon the rest to follow his example, and dared any man to touch the queen. The whole house was filled in a moment with tumult and uproar; every Indian having his tomahawk in his hand, the president and council expected nothing but instant death. During this confusion, Captain Jones, who commanded the guard, very seasonably interposed, and ordered the Indians immediately to surrender their arms, endeavouring, however, not merely to overawe them, but using prudence to avoid coming to extremities: with reluctance the

she had none; but with the old and wise leaders of the Creek nation, who voluntarily surrendered their territories to the king; the Indians at that time having much waste land, which was useless to themselves, parted with a share of it to their friends, and were glad that white people had settled among them, to supply their wants. He told them that the present discontents of the Creeks had been artfully infused into them by Mary, at the instigation of her husband; that he demanded a third part of the royal bounty, in order to rob the naked Indians of their rights; that he had quarrelled with the president and council of Georgia, for refusing to answer his exorbitant demands, and therefore had filled the heads of the Indians with wild fancies and groundless jealousies, in order to ferment mischief, and induce them to break their alliance with their best friends, who alone were able to supply their wants, and defend them against their enemies."

Indians submitted, and Mary was conveyed to a private room, where a guard was placed over her, and all further communication with the Indians denied her, during their stay in Savannah. Ultimately the soi-disant queen was compelled to abandon her pretensions, and the Indians were induced to depart, to the great joy of the inhabitants, who had been so long harassed by their turbulent visit.

The prosperity of the colony had been much retarded by the wars to which it had been subject, and by the mistaken though well-intentioned management of the trustees, who, embarrassing it by too much regulation, discouraged the emigrants, and checked its growth. Finding that the province languished under their care, and weary of the complaints of the people, in the year 1752 they surrendered their charter to the king, and it was made a royal government; in consequence of which, his majesty appointed John Reynolds, an officer of the navy, governor of the province, and a legislature similar to that of the other royal governments in America. Great had been the expense which the mother country had already incurred, besides private benefactions, for supporting this colony; and small had been the returns yet made by it. The vestiges of cultivation were scarcely perceptible in the forest, and in England all commerce with it was neglected and despised. At this time the whole exports of Georgia did not amount to ten thousand pounds per annum. Though the people were now favoured with the same liberties and privileges enjoyed by their neighbours under the royal care, yet several years more elapsed before the value of the lands in Georgia was known, and that spirit of industry broke out in it, which afterwards diffused its happy influence over the country.

CHAPTER I.

FRENCH AND INDIAN WARS, A. D. 1756—1763.

THE formation and progress of all the colonies which constituted the North American republic at the era of its independence, have now been traced up to the middle of the eighteenth century. From that period circumstances tended rapidly to promote that federation which eventually effected the independence of the colonies, and laid the basis of their future prosperity; indeed, in the prosecution of the French war, which commenced in 1756, the energies of the colonies were so united in the attainment of one common object, that the generalization of their political history from that period is not only rendered preferable, but almost inevitable.

Before entering on the narrative of the war which was commenced by the French with the intention of limiting the English colonies in America to the vicinity of the sea coast, but which terminated in the transfer of by far the most extensive and valuable of their colonies to their rival, it is desirable to give a brief outline of the rise of the Gallic settlements, and of the relative position of the territories of the two nations previous to the commencement of hostilities.

The early discoveries of Cartier had turned the eyes of France towards the St. Lawrence and the neighbouring territory, and established her claim to it, according to that peculiar code by which Europeans have deemed it proper to apportion among themselves the rest of mankind. Although Canada had scarcely any measure of the smiling and luxuriant aspect of Florida, or even of Virginia, yet it opened into regions of vast extent; and the tracing to distant fountains the sea-like abyss of its waters, presented more than common attraction to curiosity and adventure. The first who undertook to colonize these northern regions, was a Breton, named De la Roche. He obtained from Henry IV. a patent of the same extensive character as those granted in England to Gilbert and Raleigh. But so little sympathy did the nation exhibit in his views, that he was obliged to draw upon the jails for a great proportion of the sailors, and his effort proved an entire failure.

A more vigorous attempt was made by De Monts; but Champlain, his successor, must be regarded as the real founder of Canada, or New France. He built and fortified Quebec, and having brought the adjacent country into a tolerable state of cultivation, he proceeded to explore the vast wilderness by which he was surrounded. The southern bank, both of the river and lakes, was found occupied by two powerful people, the Algonquins and the Hurons, who were engaged in deadly and almost ceaseless warfare with the Iroquois, a still fiercer and more warlike tribe, occupying all the southern shore of the St. Lawrence, and of Lakes Erie and Ontario. To promote his subjects of discovery and of interior intercourse, Champlain determined to take an active part with the two former. The Iroquois allied themselves with the English, to whom they rendered most valuable, though sometimes fierce and revolting, assistance in their contest with their rivals. By arduous and persevering labours, Champlain was enabled to form an accurate idea of the extent and situation of Canada, which seemed to afford almost indefinite scope both for trade and settlement. The company under whose direction the affairs of Canada were placed, however, did not second the ardour of Champlain, and his interest at court procured the abrogation of their charter. From its ashes rose one on a much grander scale, and which aimed to convert New France into a colony of the first magnitude; but unfortunately for these projectors, the English, animated by that hostile feeling which was inspired by the persecution of the protestants, not only drove the French completely out of Acadia, but besieged and took Quebec, so that this boasted colony seemed for ever lost to the mother country ; but the court of London, strongly inclined for peace with France, agreed, on the 29th of March, 1632, to a convention, by which her sovereignty was reinstated both in Acadia and Quebec.

For fifty years the attention of government was rather directed to the consolidation and internal improvement of the colony, than to exploring the expanse of interior America. The Count de Frontignac was, however, possessed of a more enterprising spirit. He extended the range of settlement to the shores of Lake Ontario, built there the fort that bears his name, and opened an intercourse with the tribes who roam over the boundless plains westward of the Alleghany. Here he learned that afar along the western plain there rolled a river so mighty, that even the hitherto unequalled stream of the St. Lawrence could not come into competition with it. This river poured its stupendous current not in any of the directions hitherto recognised in the streams of America, but towards some distant ocean, that lay far in the south and the west. In the existing darkness as to the boundaries and details of the continent, it was concluded that this could only be the Mer Vermeio, or Gulf of California, by which it was hoped that the long-sought-for passage might be found to the golden regions of India. The strongest motives, therefore, impelled the count to strain every effort for its discovery. Frontignac found no want of bold and fitting instruments. M. Jolyet undertook, with two little Indian bark canoes, and three men in each, to explore these unknown secrets of the great interior America. The expedition proceeded first through the already explored lakes of Erie and Michigan, till they reached the north-western extremity of the latter. Two Miamis undertook to be their guides up the Fox River, and to see them embarked on the Wiscousan, which fell into the Mississippi. The voyage down the Wiscousan, was easy and prosperous, and they saw it with exultation opening into that grand stream of which they were in search, the broad Mississippi, descending from its distant northern fountains to the unknown southern sea in which it was to terminate. The enterprising voyagers prosecuted their journey, impeded only by occasional intercourse with the native tribes inhabiting the banks of the Mississippi, which were generally friendly ; in a few days they heard from the right a mighty roar of waters, and saw trees and floating islands rushing down into the channel. This was the influx of the great Missouri from its distant source in the Rocky or Chippewayan Mountains, after a longer course, and with a larger body of water than the Mississippi itself ; but it was a subject of regret that the channel, which before was clear and gentle, became now troubled, muddy, and rapid. At length they came to the Arkansas, at the mouth of the great river Arkansaw. Here they were informed, not with strict accuracy, that they were within five days' sail of the sea. On comparing this statement with their actual position, they became convinced that the Mississippi emptied itself into the gulf of Mexico, not as they had expected and hoped into the sea of California. Considering, therefore, that by proceeding downwards they might fall into the hands of Spaniards, they determined to return to Canada.

Subsequently La Salle, pursuing the same course, reached the Gulf of Mexico. He then returned to France, and procured the command of an expedition to effect a settlement at the mouths of the Mississippi ; but sailing too far westward, he missed his object, and while endeavouring to penetrate to the Mississippi by land, was basely assassinated by some of his own men ; and, of the whole colony, all perished except seven, who finally reached Canada. In 1699, a more successful attempt was made by Mr. D'Ibberville, who entered the Mississippi, and laid the foundation of the first French colony in Lower Louisiana. The place chosen for a settlement was near the mouth of the river Perdido, a very injudicious choice, from the unhealthiness of the climate and the barrenness of the soil. From these circumstances, together with the improper management of the royal governors, and the profligate character of many of the settlers, the progress of the colony was very slow. In the year 1717, the city of New Orleans was founded. The most romantic and extravagant accounts of the country were now published. It was represented as abounding in the precious metals, and as combining all the delights of the most favoured spots on earth. Thousands of emigrants were allured by these descriptions, most of whom perished miserably from sickness and want of food. Agriculture had made little progress, and the disposition of the majority of the settlers led them rather to assimilate their habits to those of the savages, than to pursue a regular course of industry. About the year 1730, its affairs began to wear a prosperous aspect ; the settlements were gradually extended up the Mississippi, and the productions of the country were exported to some profit.

Being in possession of the inland seas of Canada, as they are justly termed, and of the mouths of the grand receiver of most of the principal rivers of North America, the French conceived the bold idea of uniting their northern and southern possessions by a chain of forts along the banks of the Ohio and Mississippi; and by that means also to confine the English colonists to the eastern side of the Alleghanies. In their northern colonies their military strength was considerable; Quebec and Montreal were strongly fortified; and at other points, Louisburg, Cape Breton, and the forts of Lake Champlain, Niagara, Crown Point, Frontignac, Ticonderoga, and several others, defended the frontiers. They had also erected a considerable fort at the junction of the Alleghany with the Monongahela, then called Du Quesne, but now forming the site of Pittsburgh, the Birmingham of America. The various scenes of hostility which, with different success, were almost perpetually occurring between the rival colonists, have, in a previous chapter, been related to the period when, for a short time, they were terminated by the peace of Aix la Chapelle. It remains now to record the events of the war which terminated the dominion of France in the northern, and by far most valuable, portion of her territories in America.

The grants of territory from the English crown were many of them from the coast of the Atlantic, westward to the Pacific Ocean. It is evident, therefore, that the plans of the French, in extending their forts and their claims from north to south, directly crossed the path of the English colonists, and must be viewed by them with a spirit of opposition and a determination to resist. They naturally felt their vast superiority in point of numbers, their colonies containing at this time upwards of a million inhabitants, while the population of Canada, Louisiana, and all the intermediate stations, scarcely exceeded fifty thousand. The immediate occasion of the interruption of the peace, which had endured only five years, was the alleged intrusion of the Ohio company, an association of influential men from England and Virginia, who had obtained a grant of six hundred thousand acres of land in the vicinity of the river whose title they assumed, embracing a portion of territory the French deemed to be within the limits of their dominion. From these grants of lands to the Ohio company, the governor of Canada apprehended, that the English were pursuing a scheme which might deprive the French of the advantages arising from the trade with the Twightees, and cut off the communication between Canada and Louisiana.* He had written to the governors of New York and Pennsylvania, acquainting them that the English traders had encroached on the French territories by trading with their Indians, and that, if they did not desist, he should be obliged to seize them wherever found. This menace did not divert the Ohio company from prosecuting its design of surveying the country as far as the falls in Ohio River. While the survey was proceeding, a French party seized three British traders, and carried them to Presqu' Isle, on Lake Erie, where a strong fort was then erecting. The British, alarmed at this capture, retired to the Indian towns for shelter: and the Twightees, resenting the violence done to their allies, assembled, to the number of five or six hundred, scoured the woods, and finding three French traders, sent them to Pennsylvania. The French, determined to persist, built a second fort, about fifteen miles south of the former, on one of the branches of the Ohio; and another at the confluence of the Ohio and Wabash; and thus completed their long projected communication between the mouth of the Mississippi and the river St. Lawrence.

The Ohio company complaining loudly of these aggressions on the country which had been granted to them as part of the territory of Virginia, Robert Dinwiddie, lieutenant-governor of that colony, considering the encroachment as an invasion of his province, judged it his duty to demand, in the name of the king, that the French should desist from the prosecution of designs, which he considered as a violation of the treaties subsisting between the two crowns. This service, it was foreseen, would be rendered very fatiguing and hazardous, by the extensive tract of country, almost entirely unexplored, through which an envoy must pass, as well as by the hostile dispositions of some of the Indian inhabitants, and the doubtful attachment of others. Uninviting, however, and even formidable, as it was, George Washington, then in his twenty-second year, hesitated not to engage in it. Attended by one person only, he set out from Williamsburg on the 31st of October. The season was uncommonly severe, and the length of his journey was above four hundred miles, two hundred of which lay through a trackless desert, inhabited by Indians. On the 12th of December he arrived at a French fort, the head-quarters of M. Lagardier de St. Pierre, commanding officer on the Ohio, to whom he delivered the letter of Governor Dinwiddie. The chief officers retired to hold a council of war; and Washington seized that opportunity of taking the dimensions of the fort, and making every possible observation. The answer of St. Pierre stated, that he had taken possession of the country by direction of the governor-general of Canada; that he would transmit Governor Dinwiddie's letter to him; and that to his orders he should yield implicit obedience.

* M. Du Quesne, who succeeded M. de la Gallissiere in the government of Canada, having received instructions to take possession of the countries on the Ohio for the crown of France, in the beginning of 1753 ordered the Sieur de St. Pierre, with a detachment, to take post on the river Aux Bœufs, and there to remain until he received farther orders. St. Pierre took post there accordingly, and erected a fort for its security. Of this, Mr. Dinwiddie, lieutenant-governor of Virginia, had early intelligence.

This reply not being satisfactory to the governor, preparations were made in Virginia to maintain by force the rights of the British crown. Troops, constituting a regiment, were raised, the command of which, on the death of the colonel first appointed, was given to Mr. Washington. At the head of about four hundred men, he advanced early in the spring into the territory in dispute. On his route he met, attacked, and defeated, a French party, under the command of one Dijonville, who approached him in a manner indicating hostile intentions. He proceeded towards the fort Du Quesne, situate at the junction of the Alleghany and Monongahela. From this fort De Villier, at the head of nine hundred men, marched out to attack him. Hearing of the approach of this party, Colonel Washington halted, and hastily erected some imperfect works, by means of which he hoped to prolong his defence until the arrival of reinforcements. He was closely besieged by De Villier, but making an obstinate defence, was offered the most honourable terms of capitulation, which he accepted, and returned with his regiment to Virginia.

The proceedings of the French in America excited a strong interest in the minds of the British government; and deeming war inevitable, orders were sent to the governors of the several colonies to repel force by force, and to dislodge the French from their posts on the Ohio. These orders were accompanied with a recommendation to form a union of the colonies for more effective defence. Delegates had already been appointed to meet at Albany, for the purpose of conferring with the Five Nations; and Governor Shirley recommended that the subject of union should also be discussed at the convention. The commissioners from Massachusetts had ample powers to co-operate in the formation of a plan; those from Maryland were instructed to observe what others did; and those from New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, and New York, had no instructions at all on the subject. As soon, however, as the friendship of the Indians was thought to be secured by a distribution of presents, the delegates appointed a committee to devise some scheme for the proposed confederation; and the committee recommended the adoption of a government analogous to that of the individual colonies. There was to be a grand council, composed of deputies from the several provinces, and a president-general, appointed by the crown, with the power of negating the acts of the council. The Connecticut delegates, however, dissented from this plan, because it placed too preponderating a power in the hands of the crown. It was rejected by the British ministry for the very opposite reason; they suggested, however, that the several governors, with one or two of their counsellors, should meet and adopt such measures as the common safety might demand. But this scheme was defeated by a provision, that they might draw upon the British treasury for all necessary sums, which parliament would undertake to repay by imposing a general tax upon the colonies. The Massachusetts assembly sent special instructions to its agent in London to oppose most strenuously any measure which had for its object the establishment of taxes on the colonies, under whatever plea of utility; and Franklin, to whom the governor of Virginia had sent the proposition of the British minister, states most distinctly in his letter in reply, the reasons which would ever prevent the Americans from consenting to such a proposal. He observes, that it would inspire universal discontent among the Americans to attempt the imposition of taxes by a parliament where they were not represented, a point of which neither the colonies nor the British government ever lost sight, from this period till the contest it originated terminated in the entire separation of the former from its dependence on the British crown.

Early in the spring of 1755, the British government despatched General Braddock to America, with a respectable force to expel the French, and keep possession of the territory; and preparations having been made by France to despatch a reinforcement to her armies in Canada, Admiral Boscawen was ordered to endeavour to intercept the French fleet before it should enter the gulf of St. Lawrence. In April, General Braddock met the governors of the several provinces to confer upon the plan of the ensuing campaign. Three expeditions were resolved upon; one against Du Quesne, to be commanded by General Braddock; one against forts Niagara and Frontenac, to be commanded by Governor Shirley; and one against Crown Point, to be commanded by General Johnson. This last originated with Massachusetts, and was to be executed by colonial troops raised in New England and New York.

While preparations were making for these expeditions, another, which had been previously concerted, was carried on against the French forts in Nova Scotia. This province was settled by the French, but was ceded to the English by the treaty of Utrecht. Its boundaries not having been defined, the French continued to occupy a portion of the territory claimed by the English, and had built forts for their defence. To gain possession of these was the object of the expedition. About two thousand militia, commanded by Colonel Winslow, embarked at Boston; and being joined on their passage by three hundred regulars, arrived in April at the place of their destination. The forts were invested, the resistance made was trifling and ineffectual, and in a short time the English gained entire possession of the province, according to their own definition of its boundaries. Three only of their men were killed.

As soon as the convention of governors was dissolved, General Braddock proceeded to the post at Well's Creek, whence the army commenced its march about the middle of June. Their progress was very much retarded by the necessity of cutting a road; and, lest the enemy should have time to collect in great force, the general concluded to set forward with twelve hundred select men, while Colonel Dunbar should follow slowly in the rear, with the main body and the heavy baggage. Colonel Washington's regiment had been split into separate companies, and he had only joined the army as aid to the general. The roughness of the country prevented the advanced corps from reaching the Monongahela till the 8th of July. It was resolved to attack Du Quesne the very next day; and lieutenant-colonel Gage was sent in front with three hundred British regulars, while the general himself followed at some distance with the main body. He had been strongly cautioned by Colonel Washington to provide against an ambuscade, by sending forward some provincial companies to scour the woods; but he held the provincials and the enemy in equal contempt. The Monongahela was crossed the second time, about seven miles from Du Quesne; and the army was pressing forward in an open wood, through high and thick grass, when the front was suddenly thrown into disorder by a volley from small arms. The main body was formed three deep, and brought to its support: the commander-in-chief of the enemy fell; and a cessation of the fire led General Braddock to suppose that the assailants had fled; but he was soon attacked with redoubled fury. Concealed behind trees, logs, and rocks, the Indians poured upon the troops a deadly and incessant fire; officers and men fell thickly around, and the survivors knew not where to direct their aim to revenge their slaughtered comrades. The whole body was again thrown into confusion; but the general, obstinate and courageous, refused to retreat; and instead of withdrawing them beyond the reach of the enemy's muskets, where their ranks might easily have been formed anew, undertook to rally them on the very ground of attack, and in the midst of a most incessant and deadly fire. He persisted in these efforts until three horses had been shot under him, and every one of his officers on horseback, except Colonel Washington, was either killed or wounded. The general at length fell, and the rout became universal.* The troops fled precipitately until they met the division under Dunbar, then forty miles in the rear. Sixty-four officers out of eighty-five and about half of the privates were killed or wounded. General Braddock died in Dunbar's camp; and the whole army, which appears to have been panic struck, marched back to Philadelphia. The provincial troops, whom Braddock had so lightly esteemed, displayed during the battle the utmost calmness and courage. Though placed in the rear, they alone, led on by Washington, advanced against the Indians, and covered the retreat; and had they at first been permitted to engage the enemy in their own way, they would easily have defeated them.

The two northern expeditions, though not so disastrous, did not either of them succeed in attaining the object proposed. In that against Crown Point much delay was occasioned by the distracted councils of so many different governments; and it was not till the last of August, that General Johnson, with three thousand seven hundred men, arrived at the fort of Lake George, on his way to Ticonderoga. Meanwhile the French squadron had eluded Admiral Boscawen; and, as soon as it arrived at Quebec, Baron Dieskau, the commander, resolved to march against Oswego with his own twelve hundred regulars, and about six hundred Canadians and Indians. The news of General Johnson's movement determined Dieskau to change his plan, and to lead his forces directly against the American camp. General Johnson called for reinforcements: eight hundred troops, raised as a corps of reserve by

* Braddock was mortally wounded, and taken on sashes, at first, from the field, and then a litter was made for him, on which he was carried forty miles from the battle ground, where he expired on the evening of the fourth day after his defeat. Seven hundred of his men were killed, among whom were William Shirley, of the staff, and Col. Sir Peter Halket. Among the wounded were Robert Orme, Roger Morris, Sir John St. Clair, and several others of the staff, and Lieut. Cols. Button and Gage. Braddock was a brave and excellent officer. His mistake was in not studying the character of the enemy. Franklin advised him to proceed with the utmost caution; but the proud general thought the adviser was a much better philosopher than soldier.—Am. Ed.

Massachusetts, were immediately ordered to his assistance; and the same colony undertook to raise an additional number of two thousand men. Colonel Williams was sent forward with one thousand men to amuse and reconnoitre the enemy. He met them four miles from the camp, offered battle, and was defeated.* Another detachment shared the same fate; and the French were now within one hundred and fifty yards of the camp, when a halt for a short time enabled the Americans to recover their alarm, and to make good use of their artillery through the fallen trees, behind which they were posted. Dieskau advanced to the charge; but he was so firmly received, that the Indians and militia gave way and fled: he was obliged to order a retreat of the regulars; and, in the ardent pursuit which ensued, he was himself mortally wounded and made prisoner.† A scouting party had, in the mean time, taken the enemy's baggage; and when the retreating army came up, they attacked it so successfully from behind the trees, that the panic-struck soldiers dropped all their accoutrements, and fled in the utmost confusion for their posts on the lakes.‡ This victory revived the spirits of the colonists, depressed by the recent defeat of General Braddock, but the success was not improved in any proportion to their expectation. General Shirley, now the com-

* Hendrick, a Mohawk chief, was killed in this battle. He was the son of a Mohegan chief, by a Mohawk woman. He married into a Mohawk family, and became distinguished among the six nations. His fame extended to Massachusetts, for the commissioners, in 1751, consulted him on the great question of instructing certain youths of his nation. He was friendly to the English; and in this battle with Dieskau, he commanded three hundred Mohawks. He was grave and sententious in council, and brave in fight. Some of his aphorisms are as wise as those of Solon. When it was proposed to send a detachment to meet the enemy, and the number being mentioned, he replied: "If they are to fight, they are too few; if they are to be killed, they are too many." When it was proposed to send out the detachment in three parties, Hendrick took three sticks, and said, "put them together, and you can not break them; take them one by one, and you will break them easily." They followed the advice of the old warrior in this; and had they regarded the precautions he suggested, in scouring the field by a flank guard, Williams would not have fallen into the ambuscade. Hendrick is remembered among the friends of white men, who now and then have been found in the different ages of our history, among Indians.—Am. Ed.

† John Harmand Dieskau, baron, was a lieutenant general in the French army. In 1755, he left Montreal with twelve hundred regulars, and six hundred Canadians and Indians. General Johnson, with three thousand seven hundred men, arrived at the fort of Lake George, on his way to Ticonderoga. Baron Dieskau, hearing of this movement of General Johnson, instead of proceeding to Albany, as was his original intention, resolved to attack the American camp. A reinforcement of eight hundred troops was sent to General Johnson's assistance; and Colonel Williams, with one thousand men, was ordered to reconnoitre the enemy. He met the enemy, but was defeated, and left among the slain. The loss of the French was also considerable; M. St. Pierre, commander of the Indians, was mortally wounded. On the same day, the 8th of September, Baron Dieskau appeared in view of Colonel

mander-in-chief, urged an attempt on Ticonderoga; but a council of war judging it unadvisable, Johnson employed the remainder of the campaign in fortifying his camp. On a meeting of commissioners from Massachusetts, and Connecticut, with the governor and council of New York, in October, it was unanimously agreed, that the army under General Johnson should be discharged, excepting six hundred men, who should be engaged to garrison Fort Edward and Fort William Henry. The French still retained possession of Ticonderoga, and fortified it.

General Shirley,§ who was to conduct the expedition against Niagara and Fort Frontignac, experienced such delays, that he did not reach Oswego until the 21st of August. On his arrival, he made all necessary preparations for the expedition to Niagara; but, through the desertion of batteau men, the scarcity of wagons on the Mohawk River, and the desertion of sledgemen at the great carrying place, the conveyance of provisions and stores was so much retarded, that nearly four weeks elapsed before he could commence any further operations; and from a continued succession of adverse circumstances, in a council of war called on the 27th of September, it was unanimously resolved to defer the expedition to the succeeding year; to leave Colonel

Johnson's army, which was encamped on the banks of Lake George, defended on each side by a woody swamp. The Americans having recovered from the alarm which their first disaster had thrown them into, and being stationed behind some fallen trees, their superior situation enabled them to make good use of their artillery. Dieskau, encouraged by his previous success, advanced boldly to the charge; but his Indians, more accustomed to the tomahawk and scalping knife, than to the roar of cannon, fled in dismay. His auxiliary troops being so dispersed, he was obliged to order a retreat of the regulars. In the pursuit which followed, he was himself wounded. A soldier, seeking for plunder, found Dieskau alone, deserted by his troops, leaning on the stump of a tree, unable to move from a wound in his leg. While he was searching for his watch, to deliver to him, the soldier supposing he was seeking for a pistol, poured a charge through his hips. He was conveyed to New York, where he was attended by Dr. Jones. He never entirely recovered from the wound, which gradually impaired his constitution, and he died in consequence of it, at Surene, in France, September 8th, 1767. He was unquestionably a general of military skill.—Ibid.

‡ General Phineas Lyman was second in command in this battle. He was a brave man, of far superior abilities to Johnson; and when the commander in chief was wounded, General Lyman took the command, and fought out the battle most gallantly. Lyman was a man of first rate talents and education, a lawyer, and a statesman. He sustained himself for five hours, on that day, and gave his orders like a veteran soldier; but Johnson never mentioned his name in his account of the battle, from a most despicable feeling of jealousy. Lyman continued for several campaigns to command the Connecticut troops, and won laurels in every situation. The close of his life was dark and sad; but his honour was never tarnished.—Ibid.

§ Shirley was a good lawyer, and a brave officer. He was a man of literary taste and acquisitions. He published a tragedy, and some other dramatic works.—Ibid.

Mercer at Oswego, with a garrison of seven hundred men, and to build two additional forts for the security of the place; while the general should return with the rest of the army to Albany. Thus ended the campaign of 1755: it opened with the brightest prospects; immense preparations had been made, yet not one of the objects of the three principal expeditions had been attained; and by this failure the whole frontier was exposed to the ravages of the Indians, which were accompanied by their usual acts of barbarity.

The colonies, however, far from being discouraged by the misfortunes of the last campaign, determined to renew and increase their exertions. General Shirley, to whom the superintendence of all the military operations had been confided, assembled a council of war at New York to concert a plan for the ensuing year. The plan adopted by the council embraced expeditions against Du Quesne, Niagara, and Crown Point, and the despatching a body of troops by way of the rivers Kennebeck and Chaudiere, to create alarm for the safety of Quebec. Major-General Winslow* was appointed to lead the expedition against Crown Point. He was a popular officer, and the colonists felt a deep interest in the expedition; but, for want of an established financial system, (their only taxes were upon lands and polls,) the requisite funds were raised with difficulty, and the recruiting service made very slow progress. Only seven thousand men assembled at the posts on Lake George. General Winslow declared, that, without more forces, he could not undertake the expedition; and it would probably have been abandoned, had he not been reinforced by the timely arrival of some British troops. They came over with General Abercrombie, who had superseded General Shirley, and who soon after gave place to the Earl of Loudoun. These changes produced some unpleasant contests for priority of rank. General Winslow asserted frankly, that the provincials would never be commanded by British officers; and the Earl of Loudoun seriously propounded the question, whether the colonial troops, with his majesty's arms in their hands, would refuse obedience to his majesty's commanders? He was answered in the affirmative; and when he understood that the New England troops, in particular, had enlisted under the condition of being led by their own officers, he agreed to let those troops act separately.

While the English were adjusting these differences, and debating whether it would be expedient to attack Fort Niagara, or Fort Du Quesne, Montcalm, the successor of Dieskau, marched against Oswego with about five thousand French, Canadians, and Indians. His artillery played with such effect upon the fort, that it was soon declared untenable; and to avoid an assault, the garrison, who were sixteen hundred in number, and had stores for five months, surrendered themselves prisoners of war. The fort had been an object of considerable jealousy to the Five Nations; and Montcalm made a wise use of his conquest by demolishing it in their presence. The English and American army was now thrown upon the defensive. Instead of attacking Ticonderoga, General Winslow was ordered to fortify his own camp; Major-general Webb, with fourteen hundred regulars, took post near Wood Creek; and Sir William Johnson, with one thousand militia, was stationed at the German Flats. The colonists were now called upon for reinforcements; and, as parliament had distributed among them one hundred and fifteen thousand pounds for the last year's expenses, they were enabled to answer the call with perhaps more promptitude than was anticipated. The recruits were on their way to the camp, when intelligence of the small-pox at Albany frightened them home again. The other provincials were equally alarmed; and all, except a New York regiment, were dismissed. Thus terminated the second campaign. The expedition up the Kennebeck had been abandoned; that against Niagara was not commenced; and not even a preparation had been made for that against Du Quesne.

At the commencement of the following year a council was held at Boston, composed of Lord Loudoun, and the governors of the New England provinces and of Nova Scotia. At this council his lordship proposed that New England should raise four thousand men for the ensuing campaign; and that a proportionate number should be raised by New York and New Jersey. These requisitions were complied with; and in the spring his lordship found himself at the head of a very considerable army. Admiral Holbourn arriving in the beginning of July at Halifax with a powerful squadron, and a reinforcement of five thousand British troops, under George Viscount Howe, Lord Loudoun sailed from New York with six thousand regulars, to join those troops at the place of their arrival. Instead of the complex

* Winslow was a grandson of the second governor of Plymouth, of that name. He was engaged as a captain in the expedition to Cuba, in 1740; as a major-general in the expeditions to Kennebec, Nova Scotia, and Crown Point, in the Spanish wars. The bold operations undertaken in previous campaigns, his lordship limited his plan to a single object. Leaving the posts on the lakes strongly garrisoned, he resolved to direct his whole disposable force against Louisbourg; Halifax having been determined on as the place of rendezvous for the fleet and army destined for the expedition. Information was, however, soon received, that a French fleet had lately sailed from Brest; that Louisbourg was garrisoned by six thousand regulars, exclusive of provincials; and that it was also defended by seventeen line of battle ships, which were moored in the harbour. There being no hope of success against so formidable a force, the enterprise was deferred to the next year; the general and admiral on the last of August proceeded to New York; and the provincials were dismissed.

The Marquis de Montcalm, availing himself of the absence of the principal part of the British force, advanced with an army of nine thousand men, and laid siege to Fort William Henry. The garrison at this fort consisted of between two and three thousand regulars, and its fortifications were strong* and in very good order; and for the additional security of this important post, General Webb was stationed at Fort Edward with an army of four thousand men. The French commander, however, urged his approaches with such vigour, that, within six days after the investment of the fort, Colonel Monro, the commandant, having in vain solicited succour from General Webb, found it necessary to surrender by capitulation. The garrison was to be allowed the honours of war, and to be protected against the Indians until within the reach of Fort Edward; but the next morning, a great number of Indians having been permitted to enter the lines, began to plunder; and meeting with no opposition, they fell upon the sick and wounded, whom they immediately massacred. Their appetite for carnage being excited, the defenceless troops were attacked with fiend-like fury. Monro in vain implored Montcalm to provide the stipulated guard, and the massacre proceeded. All was turbulence and horror. On every side savages were butchering and scalping their wretched victims. Their hideous yells, the groans of the dying, and the frantic shrieks of others shrinking from the uplifted tomahawk, were heard by the French unmoved. The fury of the savages was permitted to rage without restraint until fifteen hundred were killed, or hurried captives into the wilderness. The day after this awful tragedy, Major Putnam was sent with his rangers to watch the motions of the enemy. When he came to the shore of the lake, their rear was hardly beyond the reach of musket shot. The prospect was horrible in the extreme; the fort demolished; the barracks and buildings yet burning; innumerable fragments of human carcasses still broiled in the decaying fires; and dead bodies, mangled with tomahawks and scalping knives, in all the wantonness of Indian barbarity, were every where scattered around. Who can forbear exclaiming with the poet,

"Man is to man the surest, sorest ill!"

Thus ended the third campaign† in America; happily forming the last series of disasters resulting from folly and mismanagement, rather than from want of means and military strength. The successes of the French left the colonies in a gloomy state. By the acquisition of Fort William Henry, they had obtained full possession of the lakes Champlain and

* This is a great mistake; the fort was built merely as a defence against Indians, and was entirely unfit for a siege, by a power who had the command of ordnance. The fort was not abandoned until the last shot they had was fired. The conduct of the brave and gallant Montcalm, is inexplicable. Could not such a general, with so many regular troops, have restrained the Indians? His reputation was without stain until that hour. Some of the disarmed and wretched troops were compelled to make resistance, and wrenched the arms from their assailants, and defended themselves with desperation. There are blood-stained pages in history we could wish were not there. This is one of them.—Am. Ed.

† While the army was in winter quarters, a circumstance occurred which exhibits the watchful jealousy the colonists ever exercised over their liberties. "The general court had provided barracks on Castle Island, for a regiment of Highlanders, which had been expected at Boston. Some recruiting officers soon afterwards arrived at Nova Scotia; and, protesting that their regiments would never be filled up if the men must be lodged in these barracks, they required the justices of the peace to furnish quarters, according to the act of parliament. The justices denied that the act of parliament extended to this country. Lord Loudoun wrote the court a letter, and asserted roundly that it did; that, moreover, he had 'used gentleness and patience' long enough; and that unless the requisitions were complied with in forty-eight hours from the receipt of his letter, he should be 'under the necessity' of ordering

'into Boston the three battalions from New York, Long Island, and Connecticut; and if more were wanting, he had two in the Jerseys at hand, besides those in Pennsylvania.' The general court now passed an act very similar to that of parliament, on the subject of recruits; but it did not fully answer Lord Loudoun's expectations, nor did he fail to let them know it in a second epistle. The answer of the general court was merely a reiteration of what we have so often heard from the same body. They asserted their rights as Englishmen; said they had conformed to the act of parliament as nearly as the case would admit; and declared that it was their misfortune, if a strict adherence to their duty should give offence to Lord Loudoun. He, in turn, applauded the zeal of the province in the service of his majesty, affected to rely on its compliance with his wishes, and countermanded his orders for the march of the troops. The general court sent his excellency a conciliatory message, in which they asserted that they were entirely dependent on parliament; that its acts were the rule of all their judicial proceedings; that its authority had never been questioned; and that if they had not made this avowal 'in times past, it was because there had been no occasion for it.' Judge Marshall seems to think that this language was sincere, but Mr. Minot attributes it to the desire of the court to keep friends with parliament till they were reimbursed for the expenses which they had incurred during the war. The truth is probably between the two opinions."—Sanford's Hist. of the United States, p. 145, 146.

George; and by the destruction of Oswego, they had acquired the dominion of those other lakes which connect the St. Lawrence with the waters of Mississippi. The first afforded the easiest admission from the northern colonies into Canada, or from Canada into those colonies; the last united Canada to Louisiana. By the continued possession of Fort Du Quesne, they preserved their ascendancy over the Indians, and held undisturbed control of all the country west of the Alleghany mountains. The British nation was alarmed and indignant, and the king found it necessary to change his councils. At the head of a new ministry, he placed the celebrated William Pitt, afterwards earl of Chatham, who was raised by his talents from the humble post of ensign in the guards to the control of the destinies of a mighty empire; under his administration public confidence revived, and the nation seemed inspired with new life and vigour.* He was equally popular in both hemispheres; and so promptly did the governors of the northern colonies obey the requisitions of his circular letter of 1757, that by May, in the following year, Massachusetts had seven thousand, Connecticut five thousand, and New Hampshire three thousand troops, prepared to take the field. The zeal of Massachusetts was particularly ardent. The people of Boston supported taxes which took away two thirds of the income on real estate; one half of the effective men in the province were on some sort of military duty; and the transports for carrying the troops to Halifax were ready to sail in fourteen days from the time of their engagement. The mother country was not less active. While her fleets blockaded or captured the French armaments, she despatched Admiral Boscawen to Halifax with a formidable squadron of ships, and an army of twelve thousand men. Lord Loudoun was replaced by General Abercrombie, who, early in the spring of 1758, was ready to enter upon the campaign at the head of fifty thousand men, the most powerful army ever seen in America.

Three points of attack were marked out for this campaign; the first, Louisbourg; the second, Ticonderoga and Crown Point; and the third, Fort Du Quesne. On the first expedition Admiral Boscawen sailed from Halifax on the 28th of May, with a fleet of twenty ships of the line and eighteen frigates, and an army of fourteen thousand men, under the command of General Amherst, and arrived before Louisbourg on the 2d of June. The garrison of that place, commanded by the Chevalier de Drucourt, an officer of courage and experience, was composed of two thousand five hundred regulars, aided by six hundred militia. The harbour being secured by five ships of the line, one fifty gun ship, and five frigates, three of which were sunk across the mouth of the basin, it was found necessary to land at some distance from

* "William Pitt, earl of Chatham, one of the most able and successful ministers that England ever possessed, was born November 15, 1708, and was the son of Robert Pitt, Esq., of Boconnock, in Cornwall. His education he received at Eton, and at Trinity College, Oxford. His entrance into public life was as a cornet of horse; and in 1735, through the influence of the duchess dowager of Marlborough, he was returned to parliament, as member for Old Sarum. He subsequently sat for Seaford, Aldborough, and Bath. As a senator, he soon rendered himself so obnoxious to Walpole, that the minister, with equal injustice and impolicy, deprived him of his commission. This unconstitutional act only enhanced his popularity, and sharpened his resentment. After having been ten years in opposition, he was, early in 1746, appointed joint-vice-treasurer of Ireland; and, in the same year, treasurer and paymaster general of the army, and a privy counsellor. During his treasurership, he invariably refused to benefit by the large balances of money which necessarily remained in his hands. In 1755, he was dismissed; in 1756, he obtained a brief reinstatement in power, as secretary of state, and was again dismissed; but, in 1757, defeat and disgrace having fallen on the country, the unanimous voice of the people compelled the sovereign to place him at the head of the administration. Under his auspices, Britain was, during four years, triumphant in every quarter of the globe. Thwarted in his measures, after the accession of George III., he resigned, in October, 1761, an office which he could no longer hold with honour to himself, or advantage to the nation. A pension was granted to him, and his wife was created a baroness. On the downfall of the Rockingham administration, Pitt was appointed lord privy seal, and was raised to the peerage, with the title of earl of Chatham. He acquired no glory as one of the new and ill-assorted ministry, and he withdrew from it in November, 1768. Though suffering severely from gout, he continued to speak in parliament upon all important questions. The American war, in particular, he opposed with all his wonted vigour and talent. On the 8th of April, 1778, while rising to speak in the house of lords, he fell into a convulsive fit, and he expired on the 11th of the following May. He was interred, and a monument raised to him, in Westminster Abbey, at the public expense; and a perpetual annuity of 4000*l.* was granted to his heirs. Some short poems, and a volume of letters to his nephew, have appeared in print. The character of Lord Chatham is thus ably summed up by Grattan: 'There was in this man something that could create, subvert, or reform; an understanding, a spirit, and an eloquence, to summon mankind to society, or to break the bonds of slavery asunder, and to rule the wilderness of free minds with unbounded authority; something that could establish or overwhelm empire, and strike a blow in the world that should resound through the universe.'

In America, his name was held in the highest estimation. Every patriot did him honour. Country signs bore his semblance, or something the people thought like his noble features. In the town of Dedham, in Massachusetts, Nathaniel Ames, the father of the great orator, Fisher Ames, a physician, philosopher, and mathematician, erected a granite column to his memory, and surmounted it by a bust of the great friend to liberty. It was thrown down by time, and suffered to lie in neglect for many years; but it has since been renovated, and stands now a monument to departed genius and patriotism. "His eloquence formed an era in our language;" and the fire he breathed into the soul of freedom, has not, and we trust never will, be extinguished. Genius, united to letters and patriotism, can never die. We forgive his last act; it was one of feeling and of national pride. Lord Chatham aided the projectors of canals with his whole soul, while politicians thought he had better have been doing almost any thing else; but his sagacity has been proved by the wonderful advantages which have resulted to the nation from canals. Grattan should have added, that he foresaw the resources of the nation, and commenced their development; if not so rhetorical, it would have been literally true; and even the beauty of prophecy is its fulfilment.—American Editor.

the town. This being effected, and the artillery and stores brought on shore, General Wolfe was detached with two thousand men to seize a post occupied by the enemy at the Lighthouse Point, from which the ships in the harbour, and the fortifications in the town, might be greatly annoyed. On the approach of that gallant officer, the post was abandoned by the enemy, and several very strong batteries were erected there by their opponents. Approaches were also made on the opposite side of the town, and the siege was pressed with resolution and vigour, though with great caution. A very heavy cannonade being kept up against the town and the vessels in the harbour, a bomb was at length set on fire and blew up one of the largest ships, and the flames were communicated to two others, which shared the same fate. The English admiral now sent six hundred men in boats into the harbour, to make an attempt on two ships of the line which still remained in the basin; one of which, being aground, was destroyed, the other was towed off in triumph. This gallant exploit, putting the English in complete possession of the harbour, and several breaches being made practicable in the works, the place was deemed no longer defensible, and the governor offered to capitulate. It was required that the garrison should surrender as prisoners of war. These humiliating terms, though at first rejected, were afterwards acceded to; and Louisbourg, with all its artillery, provisions, and military stores, as also Island Royal, St. John's, and their dependencies, were placed in the hands of the English, who, without farther difficulty, took possession of the island of Cape Breton. The conquerors found two hundred and twenty-one pieces of cannon, and eighteen mortars, with a very large quantity of stores and ammunition. The inhabitants of Cape Breton were sent to France in English ships; but the garrison, sea officers, sailors, and marines, amounting collectively to nearly six thousand men, were carried prisoners to England.

The armies destined to execute the plans against Ticonderoga and Fort Du Quesne were appointed to rendezvous respectively at Albany and Philadelphia. The first was commanded by General Abercrombie, and consisted of upwards of fifteen thousand men, attended by a formidable train of artillery. On the 5th of July, the general embarked his troops on Lake

George, on board of one hundred and twenty-five whale boats, and nine hundred batteaux, and commenced operations against Ticonderoga. After debarkation at the landing place in a cove on the west side of the lake, the troops were formed into four columns, the British in the centre, and the provincials on the flanks. In this order they marched toward the advanced guard of the French, which, consisting of one battalion only, posted in a logged camp, destroyed what was in their power, and made a precipitate retreat. While Abercrombie was continuing his march in the woods towards Ticonderoga, the columns were thrown into confusion, and in some degree entangled with each other. At this juncture, Lord Howe, at the head of the right centre column, fell in with a part of the advanced guard of the enemy which had been lost in the wood in retreating from Lake George, and immediately attacked and dispersed it, killing a considerable number and taking one hundred and forty-eight prisoners. This success was, however, dearly purchased, by the loss of the gallant nobelman who fell in leading the attack.* The English army, without further opposition, took possession of a post within two miles of Ticonderoga. Abercrombie, having learned from the prisoners the strength of the enemy at that fortress, and from an engineer the condition of their works, resolved on an immediate storm, and made instant disposition for an assault. The troops having received orders to march up briskly, rush upon the enemy's fire, and reserve their own till they had passed a breastwork, marched to the assault with great intrepidity. Unlooked for impediments, however, occurred. In front of the breastwork, to a considerable distance, trees had been felled with their branches outward, many of which were sharpened to a point, by means of which the assailants were not only retarded in their advance, but, becoming entangled among the boughs, were exposed to a very galling fire. Finding it impracticable to pass the breastwork, which was eight or nine feet high, and much stronger than had been represented, General Abercrombie, after a contest of near four hours, ordered a retreat, and the next day resumed his former camp on the south side of Lake George. In this brave but ill-judged assault nearly two thousand of the assailants were killed and wounded, while the loss of the enemy, who were covered

* George Howe, lord-viscount, was commander of 5000 British troops in America, and was the most popular of all the leaders of the British armies, in the conflicts with France. When Abercrombie made his attack on Ticonderoga, he led the van-guard, and fell at the first fire. He was admired by all the provincials. Old Stark, the hero of Bennington, who knew him well, feared that he should not have been a true whig, in the revolution, if Lord Howe had been alive. His death was mourned as a public calamity, and the Americans seemed to lose their spirit in his fall. The good people of Massachusetts caught the infection of grief from the soldiers, and erected a monument, by permission, for their admired general, in Westminster Abbey, at their own expense, of two hundred and fifty pounds sterling. It is still standing in Westminster Abbey.—Am. Ed.

during the whole action, was inconsiderable. General Abercrombie immediately re-crossed Lake George, and entirely abandoned the project of capturing Ticonderoga.*

The campaign was not destined, however, to close with such ill-success. Colonel Bradstreet proposed an expedition against Frontignac; a fort which, by being placed on the north side of the St. Lawrence, just where it issues from Lake Ontario, was the key to the communication between Canada and Louisiana. It served also to keep the Indians in subjection, and was the general repository of stores for the enemy's western and southern posts. Late in the evening of the 25th of August, Colonel Bradstreet landed within a mile of the place, with three thousand men, eight pieces of cannon, and three mortars. The French had not anticipated an attack at this point, and the garrison consisted of only one hundred and ten men, with a few Indian auxiliaries. It was impossible to hold out long. Colonel Bradstreet posted his mortars so near the fort, that every shell took effect; and the commander was very soon obliged to surrender at discretion. The booty consisted of sixty pieces of cannon, great numbers of small arms, provisions, military stores, goods to a large amount, and nine armed vessels of from eight to eighteen guns. Colonel Bradstreet destroyed the fort and vessels, re-crossed the Ontario, and returned to the army.

Had it not been for this fortunate enterprise, the unaccountable delay in preparing the expedition against Du Quesne would probably have left that fort a third time in possession of the enemy. It was not until June that the commander, General Forbes, set out from Philadelphia; it was September, before Colonel Washington, with the Virginia regulars, was ordered to join the main body at Ray's Town; and, owing to the difficulties of cutting a new road, it was as late as November, when the army appeared before Du Quesne. The garrison, deserted by the Indians, and without adequate means of defence, had escaped down the Ohio the evening before the arrival of the British, who had only to taken possession, therefore, in the king's name. The fort was supplied with a new garrison, and the name changed to Pittsburg. The Indians, as usual, joined the strongest side. A peace was concluded with all the tribes between the Ohio and the lakes; and the frontier inhabitants of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, were once more relieved from the terrors of fire and scalping knives.

The campaign of 1758 was highly honourable to the British arms, and the results of it very important. Of the three expeditions, two had completely succeeded, and the leader of the third had made an important conquest. To the commanding talents of Pitt, and the confidence which they inspired, this change of fortune must be chiefly attributed; and in no respect were these talents more strikingly displayed than in the choice of men to execute his plans. The advantages of this campaign had, however, been purchased by an expensive effort and corresponding exhaustion of provincial strength; and, when a circular letter from Mr. Pitt to the several governors induced the colonies to resolve upon making the most vigorous preparations for the next, they soon discovered that their resources were by no means commensurate with their zeal.

Notwithstanding these difficulties, it was resolved to signalize the year 1759 by the complete conquest of Canada. The plan of the campaign was, that three powerful armies should enter the French possessions by three different routes, and attack all their strong-holds, ^{at} nearly the same time. At the head of one division of the army, Brigadier-General Wolfe, a young officer who had signalized himself at the siege of Louisbourg, was to ascend the St. Lawrence and lay siege to Quebec, escorted by a strong fleet to co-operate with his troops. The central and main army, composed of British and provincials, was to be conducted against Ticonderoga and Crown Point by General Amherst, the new commander in

* Major Rogers, with his rangers, was in this battle, and asked permission to scour the woods before the regular troops were led on; but this was not granted. Major Robert Rogers was a native of Londonderry, or Dunbarton, in the state of New Hampshire. He was early known as a brave soldier, and was authorized by the British government to raise five companies of rangers, as they were called. They were kept on the frontiers for winter as well as summer service, to watch the hostile Indians, who often, in the most inclement season, made attacks upon the defenceless inhabitants of the frontiers. This body of troops was taken from the boldest and hardiest of the yeomanry of the land. They were doubly armed, and carried with them snow-shoes and skates for service. They generally made their head-quarters at the southern extremity of Lake George. Their snow-shoes put them on an equality with their foes, and with their skates they had greatly the advantage of the Indians. Stark, Putnam, and several others, who were distinguished afterward in the revolutionary war, were trained in this school. Some of the well authenticated exploits of this hardy band, seem like romance to us, in the present day. All along the borders of Lake George, spots are shown where the rangers fought desperate battles, in the winter season, sometimes with more than twice their numbers. This corps fought from 1755 to the fall of Quebec, in 1759. They were put foremost in battle by Abercrombie and Amherst, and some of them were sent to assist Wolfe. Rogers states in his journal of these campaigns, that their packs were generally of twice the weight of those commonly carried by soldiers. Many of this band perished in their frontier campaigns. For some particulars of the life of this singular man, see Allen's Biography.—Am. Ed.

chief, who, after making himself master of these places, was to proceed over Lake Champlain and by the way of Richelieu River to the St. Lawrence, and descending that river, form a junction with General Wolfe before the walls of Quebec. The third army, to be composed principally of provincials, reinforced by a strong body of friendly Indians, was to be commanded by General Prideaux, who was to lead this division first against Niagara, and, after the reduction of that place, to embark on Lake Ontario, and proceed down the St. Lawrence against Montreal. It has been observed by a recent author, "Had the elements been laid, and the enemy spell-bound, the whole of this brilliant plan could not have helped succeeding." This sentence, however, betrays a very limited view of a plan that was well worthy of the mind of Pitt. In this arrangement immediate advantage was not sacrificed; while the more remote results exhibited a prospect highly calculated to excite the ambition of the leaders, and to arouse all the energies of the troops. It is in thus affording motives which tend to bring physical force into most effective and persevering action, that intellectual superiority becomes manifest, confounding the calculations of ordinary minds.

Early in the winter, General Amherst commenced preparations for his part of the enterprise; but it was not till the last of May that his troops were assembled at Albany; and it was as late as the 22d of July, when he appeared before Ticonderoga. As the naval superiority of Great Britain had prevented France from sending out reinforcements, none of the posts in this quarter were able to withstand so great a force as that of General Amherst. Ticonderoga was immediately abandoned; the example was followed at Crown Point; and the only way in which the enemy seemed to think of preserving their province was by retarding the English army with shows of resistance till the season of operation should be past, or till, by the gradual concentration of their forces, they should become numerous enough to make an effectual stand. From Crown Point they retreated to Ile-aux-Noix, where General Amherst understood there was a body of between three and four thousand men, and a fleet of several armed vessels. The English made great exertions to secure a naval superiority; and had it not been for a succession of adverse storms upon the lake, they would most probably have accomplished the original design of forming a junction at Quebec, instead of being obliged to go into winter quarters at Crown Point. In prosecution of the enterprise against Niagara, General Prideaux had embarked with an army on Lake Ontario; and on the 6th of July landed without opposition within about three miles from the fort, which he invested in form. While directing the operations of the siege, he was killed by the bursting of a cohorn, and the command devolved on Sir William Johnson. That general, prosecuting with judgment and vigour the plan of his predecessor, pushed the attack of Niagara with an intrepidity that soon brought the besiegers within a hundred yards of the covered way. Meanwhile, the French, alarmed at the danger of losing a post which was a key to their interior empire in America, had collected a large body of regular troops from the neighbouring garrisons of Detroit, Venango, and Presqu' Isle, with which, and a party of Indians, they resolved, if possible, to raise the siege. Apprised of their intention to hazard a battle, General Johnson ordered his light infantry, supported by some grenadiers and regular foot, to take post between the cataract of Niagara and the fortress; placed the auxiliary Indians on his flanks; and, together with this preparation for an engagement, took effectual measures for securing his lines, and bridling the garrison. About nine in the morning of the 24th of July, the enemy appeared, and the horrible sound of the war whoop from the hostile Indians was the signal of battle. The French charged with great impetuosity, but were received with firmness; and in less than an hour were completely routed. This battle decided the fate of Niagara. Sir William Johnson the next morning opened negotiations with the French commandant; and in a few hours a capitulation was signed. The garrison, consisting of six hundred and seven men, were to march out with the honours of war, to be embarked on the lake, and carried to New York; and the women and children were to be carried to Montreal. The reduction of Niagara effectually cut off the communication between Canada and Louisiana.

The expedition against the capital of Canada was the most daring and important. Strong by nature, and still stronger by art, Quebec had obtained the appellation of the Gibraltar of America; and every attempt against it had failed. It was now commanded by Montcalm, an officer of distinguished reputation; and its capture must have appeared chimerical to any one but Pitt. He judged rightly, however, that the boldest and most dangerous enterprises are often the most successful, especially when committed to ardent minds, glowing with enthusiasm, and emulous of glory. Such a mind he had discovered in General Wolfe, whose conduct at Louisbourg had attracted his attention. He appointed him to conduct the expedition, and gave him for assistants Brigadier Generals Moncton, Townshend, and Murray; all, like himself, young and ardent. Early in the season he sailed from Halifax with eight thousand troops, and, near the last of June, landed the whole army on the island of Orleans, a few miles below Québec. From this position he could take a near and distinct view of the obstacles to be overcome. These were so great, that even the bold and sanguine Wolfe perceived more to fear than to hope. In a letter to Mr. Pitt, written before commencing operations, he declared that he saw but little prospect of reducing the place.

Québec stands on the north side of the St. Lawrence, and consists of an upper and lower town. The lower town lies between the river and a bold and lofty eminence, which runs parallel to it far to the westward. At the top of this eminence is a plain, upon which the upper town is situated. Below, or east of the city, is the river St. Charles, whose channel is rough, and whose banks are steep and broken. At a short distance farther down is the Montmorency; and between these two rivers, and reaching from one to the other, was encamped the French army, strongly entrenched, and at least equal in number to that of the English. General Wolfe took possession of Point Lévi, on the southern bank of the St. Lawrence, and there erected batteries against the town. The cannonade which was kept up, though it destroyed many houses, made but little impression on the works, which were too strong and too remote to be materially affected; their elevation, at the same time, placing them beyond the reach of the fleet. Convinced of the impossibility of reducing the place, unless he could erect batteries on the north side of the St. Lawrence, Wolfe soon decided on more daring measures. The northern shore of the St. Lawrence, to a considerable distance above Québec, is so bold and rocky as to render a landing in the face of an enemy impracticable. If an attempt were made below the town, the river Montmorency passed, and the French driven from their entrenchments, the St. Charles would present a new, and perhaps an insuperable barrier. With every obstacle fully in view, Wolfe, heroically observing that "a victorious army finds no difficulties," resolved to pass the Montmorency, and bring Montcalm to an engagement. In pursuance of this resolution, thirteen companies of English grenadiers, and part of the second battalion of royal Americans, were landed at the mouth of that river, while two divisions, under Generals Townshend and Murray, prepared to cross it higher up. Wolfe's plan was to attack first a redoubt, close to the water's edge, apparently beyond reach of the fire from the enemy's entrenchments, in the belief that the French, by attempting to support that fortification, would put it in his power to bring on a general engagement; or, if they should submit to the loss of the redoubt, that he could afterwards examine their situation with coolness, and advantageously regulate his future operations. On the approach of the British troops, the redoubt was evacuated; and the general, observing some confusion in the French camp, changed his original plan, and determined not to delay an attack. Orders were immediately despatched to the Generals Townshend and Murray to keep their divisions in readiness for fording the river; and the grenadiers and royal Americans were directed to form on the beach until they could be properly sustained. These troops, however, not waiting for support, rushed impetuously towards the enemy's entrenchments; but they were received with so strong and steady a fire from the French musketry, that they were instantly thrown into disorder, and obliged to seek shelter at the redoubt which the enemy had abandoned. Detained here awhile by a dreadful thunder storm, they were still within reach of a severe fire from the French; and many gallant officers, exposing their persons in attempting to form the troops, were killed, the whole loss amounting to nearly five hundred men. The plan of attack being effectually disconcerted, the English general gave orders for repassing the river, and returning to the isle of Orleans.

Compelled to abandon the attack on that side, Wolfe deemed that advantage might result from attempting to destroy the French fleet, and by distracting the attention of Montcalm with continual descents upon the northern shore. General Murray with twelve hundred men in transports, made two vigorous but abortive attempts to land; and though more successful in the third, he did nothing more than burn a magazine of warlike stores. The enemy's fleet was effectually secured against attacks, either by land or by water, and the commander in chief was again obliged to submit to the mortification of recalling his troops. At this juncture, intelligence arrived that Niagara was taken, that Ticonderoga and Crown Point had been abandoned, but that General Amherst, instead of pressing forward to their assistance, was preparing to attack the Ile-aux-Noix. While Wolfe rejoiced at the triumph of his brethren in arms, he could not avoid contrasting their success with his own disastrous efforts. His mind, alike lofty and susceptible, was deeply impressed by the disasters at Montmorency; and his extreme anxiety, preying upon his delicate frame, sensibly affected his health. He was observed frequently to sigh; and, as if life was only valuable while it added to his glory, he declared to his intimate friends, that he would not survive the disgrace which he imagined would attend the failure of his enterprise. Nothing, however, could shake the resolution of this valiant commander, or induce him to abandon the attempt. In a council of his principal officers, called on this critical occasion, it was resolved, that all the future operations should be above the town. The camp at the Isle of Orleans was accordingly abandoned; and the whole army having embarked on board the fleet, a part of it was landed at Point Levi, and a part higher up the river. Montcalm, apprehending from this movement that the invaders might make a distant descent, and come on the back of the city of Quebec, detached M. de Bougainville, with fifteen hundred men, to watch their motions, and prevent their landing.

Baffled and harassed in all his previous assaults, General Wolfe seems to have determined to finish the enterprise by a single bold and desperate effort. The admiral sailed several leagues up the river, making occasional demonstrations of a design to land troops; and, during the night, a strong detachment in flat-bottomed boats fell silently down with the stream, to a point about a mile above the city. The beach was shelving, the bank high and precipitous, and the only path by which it could be scaled, was now defended by a captain's guard and a battery of four guns. Colonel Howe, with the van, soon clambered up the rocks, drove away the guard, and seized upon the battery. The army landed about an hour before day, and by daybreak was marshalled on the heights of Abraham.

Montcalm could not at first believe the intelligence; but, as soon as he was assured of its truth, he made all prudent haste to decide a battle which it was no longer possible to avoid. Leaving his camp at Montmorency, he crossed the river St. Charles with the intention of attacking the English army. No sooner did Wolfe observe this movement, than he began to form his order of battle. His troops consisted of six battalions, and the Louisbourg grenadiers. The right wing was commanded by General Monckton, and the left by General Murray. The right flank was covered by the Louisbourg grenadiers, and the rear and left by Howe's light infantry. The form in which the French advanced indicating an intention to outflank the left of the English army, General Townshend was sent with the battalion of Amherst, and the two battalions of royal Americans, to that part of the line, and they were formed en potence, so as to present a double front to the enemy. The body of reserve consisted of one regiment, drawn up in eight divisions, with large intervals. The dispositions made by the French general were not less masterly. The right and left wings were composed about equally of European and colonial troops. The centre consisted of a column, formed of two battalions of regulars. Fifteen hundred Indians and Canadians, excellent marksmen, advancing in front, screened by surrounding thickets, began the battle. Their irregular fire proved fatal to many British officers, but it was soon silenced by the steady fire of the English. About nine in the morning the main body of the French advanced briskly to the charge, and the action soon became general. Montcalm having taken post on the left of the French army, and Wolfe on the right of the English, the two generals met each other where the battle was most severe. The English troops reserved their fire until the French had advanced within forty yards of their line, and then, by a general discharge, made terrible havoc among their ranks. The fire of the English was vigorously maintained, and the enemy every where yielded to it. General Wolfe, who, exposed in the front of his battalions, had been wounded in the wrist, betraying no symptom of pain, wrapped a handkerchief round his arm, and continued to encourage his men. Soon after, he received a shot in the groin; but, concealing the wound, he was pressing on at the head of his grenadiers with fixed bayonets, when a third ball pierced his breast.* The army, not disconcerted by his fall,

* On receiving his mortal wound, Wolfe was conveyed into the rear, where, careless about himself, he discovered, in the agonies of death, the most anxious solicitude concerning the fate of the day. From extreme faintness, he had reclined his head on the arm of an officer, but was soon aroused by the cry of "They fly, they fly!" "Who fly?" exclaimed the dying hero. "The French," answered his attendant. "Then," said he, "I die contented," and immediately expired. A death more full of military glory has seldom been recorded by the pen of the historian, or celebrated by the pencil of the painter. General Wolfe was only thirty-three years of age. He possessed those military talents, which, with the advantage of years and opportunity of action, "to moderate his ardour, expand his faculties, and give to his intuitive perception and scientific knowledge the correctness of judgment perfected by experience," would have "placed him on a level with the most celebrated generals of any age or nation."—Montcalm was every way worthy to be a competitor of Wolfe. He had the truest military genius of any officer whom the French had ever employed in America. After he had received his mortal wound, he was carried into the city; and when informed that it was mortal, his reply was, "I am glad of it." On being told that he could survive but a few hours, "So much the better," he replied, "I shall not then live to see the surrender of Quebec."

General Wolfe was eulogized in the following poem from the pen of T. Paine:—

"In a mouldering cave, where the wretched retreat, Britannia sat wasted with care;
She mourn'd for her Wolfe, and exclaim'd against fate,
And gave herself up to despair.

Beheld the disconsolate dame;
And mov'd with her tears, he sent Mercury down,

The French troops that served in Canada, being desirous of erecting a monument in honour of Montcalm, their general, who fell in the action at Quebec, where the brave Wolfe also fell, a French colonel wrote to the Academy of Belles Lettres for an epitaph to be placed over Montcalm's tomb, in a church in that city, which occasioned the following letter from M. De Bougainville, member of the Academy, to Mr. Pitt:

Sir—The honours paid under your ministry, to Mr. Wolfe, assure me that you will not disapprove of the grateful endeavours of the French troops, to perpetuate the memory of the Marquis De Montcalm. The body of this general, who was honoured by the regret of your nation, is interred in Quebec. I have the honour to send you an epitaph made for him by the Academy of Inscriptions. I beg the favour of you, sir, that you will be pleased to examine it, and, if not improper, obtain leave for me to send it to Quebec, engraved on marble, and to be placed on the Marquis De Montcalm's tomb. Should such leave be granted, may I presume to request, sir, that you will be so good as to inform me of it, and, at the same time, to send me a passport, that the marble, with the epitaph engraved on it, may be received into an English ship, and Mr. Murray, governor of Quebec, allow it to be placed in the Ursuline church. You will be pleased, sir, to pardon me for this intrusion on your important occupations; but endeavouring to immortalize illustrious men and eminent patriots, is doing honour to yourself.

I am, with respect, &c. DE BOUGAINVILLE.

Sir—It is a real satisfaction to me, to send you the king's consent on a subject so affecting, as the epitaph composed by the Academy of Inscriptions, at Paris, for the Marquis De Montcalm, and which, it is desired, may be sent to Quebec, engraved on marble, to be placed on the tomb of that illustrious soldier. It is perfectly beautiful; and the desire of the French troops, which served in Canada, to pay such a tribute to the memory of their general, whom they saw expire at their head, in a manner worthy of them and himself, is truly noble and praiseworthy.

I shall take a pleasure, sir, in facilitating, every way, such amiable intentions; and on notice of the measures taken for shipping this marble, I will not fail immediately to transmit you the passport you desire, and send directions to the governor of Quebec for its reception.

I will beg of you, sir, to be persuaded of my just sensibility of that so obliging part of the letter with which you have honoured me relating to myself; and to believe that I embrace as a happiness, the opportunity of manifesting the esteem and particular regard with which I have the honour to be, &c.

W. PITT.

London, April 10, 1761

Here lieth,
In either hemisphere to live for ever,
LEWIS JOSEPH DE MONTCALM GOZON,
Marquis of St. Veran, Baron of Gabriac, Commendator of the Order of St. Lewis,
Lieutenant-General of the French forces,
Both an excellent subject and soldier,
Whose memory will be immortalized both here and hereafter;
Coveting nothing but real glory;
Thoroughly conversant in all parts of polite literature,
Conducting himself through all military employment with unblemished honour;
Not unacquainted with all the arts of war, with dangers,
And knew how to improve advantages by every opportunity that offered;
An active General
In Italy, Bohemia, and Germany.
Always behaving himself with that magnanimity
That he might be put upon the same level with his ancestors;
Already eminent in dangers,
Being sent to defend the province of Canada,
He often repulsed the enemy's forces with a handful of men;
He made himself master of almost insurmountable fortifications, Defended by numerous garrisons,
And furnished with plenty of warlike stores.
He could endure cold, hunger, watchings, and fatigue,
To a degree almost incredible:
Ever solicitous for the safety of his soldiers,
He was regardless of his own;
A vigilant enemy, and accustomed to conquer;
He supplied the deficiencies of fortune by his bravery,
Want of soldiers, by experience and activity.
He supported the tottering fate of that colony four years,
By his prudence and fortitude.
At length, having a long time baffled the efforts of his enemies,
By manifold stratagems,
Being obliged to engage a large army,
Commanded by an active and courageous general,
And supported by a fleet equipped with every thing necessary for war;
Being mortally wounded at the head of his army,
In the first onset,
He died on the 14th of September, MDCCLIX.
In the forty-eighth year of his age,
Firmly relying on Divine Providence,
Whose precepts he had religiously observed,
Universally lamented by his own soldiers,
And even regretted by his enemies.
The mourning French have deposited the mortal remains Of this incomparable General,
In a grave,
Which an impetuous ball had previously dug,
And commended them to the generous protection

advancing with the troops under his direction, broke the centre of the French army. The Highlanders, drawing their broadswords, completed the confusion of the enemy; and after having lost their first and second in command, the right and centre of the French were entirely driven from the field; and the left was following the example, when Bougainville appeared in the rear, with the fifteen hundred men who had been sent to oppose the landing of the English. Two battalions and two pieces of artillery were detached to meet him; but he retired, and the British troops were left the undisputed masters of the field. The loss of the French was much greater than that of the English. The corps of French regulars was almost entirely annihilated. The killed and wounded of the English army did not amount to six hundred men. Although Quebec was still strongly defended by its fortifications, and might possibly be relieved by Bougainville, or from Montreal, yet General Townshend had scarcely finished a road in the bank to get up his heavy artillery for a siege, when the inhabitants capitulated, on condition that during the war they might still enjoy their own civil and religious rights. A garrison of five thousand men was left under General Murray, and the fleet sailed out of the St. Lawrence.

The fall of Quebec did not immediately produce the submission of Canada. The main body of the French army, which, after the battle on the plains of Abraham, retired to Montreal, and which still consisted of ten battalions of regulars, had been reinforced by six thousand Canadian militia, and a body of Indians. With these forces M. de Levi, who had succeeded the Marquis de Montcalm in the chief command, resolved to attempt the recovery of Quebec. He had hoped to carry the place by a coup de main during the winter; but, on reconnoitring, he found the outposts so well secured, and the governor so vigilant and active, that he postponed the enterprise until spring. In the month of April, when the upper part of the St. Lawrence was so open as to admit a transportation by water, his artillery, military stores, and heavy baggage, were embarked at Montreal, and fell down the river under convoy of six frigates; and M. de Levi, after a march of ten days, arrived with his army at Point au Tremble, within a few miles of Quebec. General Murray, to whom the care of maintaining the English conquest had been entrusted, had taken every precaution to preserve it; but his troops had suffered so much by the extreme cold of the winter, and by the want of vegetables and fresh provisions, that instead of five thousand, the original number of his garrison there were not at this time above three thousand men fit for service. With this small but valiant body he resolved to meet the enemy in the field; and on the 28th of April marched out to the heights of Abraham, where, near Sillery, he attacked the French under M. de Levi with great impetuosity. He was received with firmness; and after a fierce encounter, finding himself outflanked, and in danger of being surrounded by superior numbers, he called off his troops, and retired into the city. In this action the loss of the English was near a thousand men, and that of the French still greater. The French general lost no time in improving his victory. On the very evening of the battle he opened trenches before the town, but it was the 11th of May before he could mount his batteries, and bring his guns to bear on the fortifications. By that time General Murray, who had been indefatigable in his exertions, had completed some outworks, and planted so numerous an artillery on his ramparts, that his fire was very superior to that of the besiegers, and in a manner silenced their batteries. A British fleet most opportunely arriving a few days after, M. de Levi immediately raised the siege, and precipitately retired to Montreal. Here the Marquis de Vaudreuil, governor-general of Canada, had fixed his head quarters, and determined to make his last stand. For this purpose he called in all his detachments, and collected around him the whole force of the colony.

The English, on the other hand, were resolved upon the utter annihilation of the French power in Canada; and General Amherst prepared to overwhelm it with an irresistible superiority of numbers. Almost on the same day, the armies from Quebec, from Lake Ontario, and from Lake Champlain, were concentrated before Montreal: a capitulation was immediately signed; Detroit, Michilimackinac, and, indeed, all New France, surrendered to the English. The French troops were to be carried home; and the Canadians to retain their civil and religious privileges.

The history of modern Europe, with whose destiny that of the colonies was closely interwoven, may be designated as the annals of an interminable war. Her sovereigns, ever having the oily words of peace on their lips, have seldom had recourse to the olive branch but as the signal of a truce, the duration of which should be coeval with the reinvigoration of military strength. It was thus with France on the present occasion. Equally unsuccessful on both continents, and exhausted by her strenuous and continued efforts, she was at length induced to make overtures of peace; and every thing seemed to be in a fair train for adjustment, when the treaty was sud-donly broken off by an attempt of the court of Versailles to mingle the politics of Spain and of Germany with the disputes between France and Great Britain. A secret family compact between the Bourbons to support each other through evil and good, in peace and in war, had rendered Spain desirous of war, and induced France once more to try her fortune. As the interests of the two nations were now identified, it only remained for England to make a formal declaration of hostility against Spain. The colonies of New England being chiefly interested in the reduction of the West India Islands, furnished a considerable body of troops to carry on the war. A large fleet was despatched from England; the land forces amounted to sixteen thousand; and before the end of the second year, Great Britain had taken the important city of Havannah, the key of the Mexican Gulf, together with the French provinces of Martinique, Grenada, St. Lucia, St. Vincent, and the Caribbee Islands.

The progress of the British conquests, which threatened all the remaining colonial possessions of their opponents, was arrested by preliminary articles of peace, which, towards the close of 1762, were interchanged at Fontainebleau between the ministers of Great Britain, France, and Spain. On the 10th of February, in the following year, a definitive treaty of peace was signed at Paris, and soon after ratified.* France ceded to Great Britain all the conquests which the latter had made in North America; and it was stipulated between the two crowns, that the boundary-line of their respective dominions in the new hemi-

* "The acquisitions of Great Britain, both from France and Spain, on the continent of North-America, established by this treaty, whether they be considered in relation to the political or commercial interests of the parent country, or in relation to the entire interests of the American colonies, merit particular attention. Every article, therefore, which has respect to America, is subjoined in the words of the treaty. By the second article, France renounces and guarantees to Great Britain all Nova Scotia or Acadia, and likewise Canada, the isle of Cape Breton, and all other islands in the gulf and river of St. Lawrence. By the third article, it is stipulated, that the French shall have the liberty of fishing and drying on a part of the island of Newfoundland, as specified in the thirteenth article of the treaty of Utrecht; and the French may also fish in the gulf of St. Lawrence, so as they do not exercise the same but at the distance of three leagues from all the coasts belonging to Great Britain, as well those of the continent, as those of the islands in the said gulf. As to what relates to the fishery out of the said gulf, the French shall exercise the same, but at the distance of fifteen leagues from the coasts of the isle of Cape Breton. By the fourth article, Great Britain cedes to France, to serve as a shelter for the French fishermen, the islands of St. Peter and of Miquelon; and his most Christian Majesty absolutely engages not to fortify the said island, nor to erect any other buildings thereon, but merely for the convenience of the fishery; and to keep only a guard of fifty men for the police. By the sixth article it is stipulated, that the confines between the dominions of Great Britain and France, on the continent of North America, shall be irrevocably fixed, by a line drawn along the middle of the river Mississippi, from its source, as far as the river Iberville, and from thence by a line drawn along the middle of this river, and of the lakes Maurepas and Pontchartrain, to the sea; and to this purpose the most Christian King cedes in full right, and guarantees to his Britannic Majesty, the river and port of Mobile, and every thing that he possesses on the left side of the river Mississippi, except the town of New Orleans, and the island on which it is situated, which shall remain to France, provided that the navigation of the river shall be equally free to the subjects of Great Britain and France, in its whole breadth and length, from its source to the sea, and that part expressly which is between the said island of New Orleans and the right bank of that river, as well as the passage both in and out of its mouth; and the vessels belonging to the subjects of either nation shall not be stopped, visited, or subjected to the payment of any duty whatsoever. The stipulations in favour of the inhabitants of Canada, inserted in the second article, shall also take place with regard to the inhabitants of the countries ceded by this article; that is, that the French in Canada may freely profess the Roman Catholic religion, as far as the laws of Great Britain permit; that they may enjoy their civil rights, retire when they please, and may dispose of their estates to British subjects. By the seventh article, it is stipulated, that Britain shall restore to France the islands of Guadaloupe, Marigalante, Desirade, and Martinico, in the West Indies, and of Belleisle, on the coast of France, with their fortresses; provided that the term of eighteen months be granted to his Britannic Majesty's subjects, settled there, and in other places hereby restored to France, to sell their estates, recover their debts, and to transport themselves and effects, without being restrained on account of their religion, or any pretence, except for debts, or criminal prosecutions. By the eighth article, France cedes and guarantees to Great Britain the islands of Grenada and the Grenadines, with the same stipulations in favour of the inhabitants as are inserted in the second article for those of Canada; and the partition of the islands called neutral, is agreed and fixed, so that those of St. Vincent, Dominico, and Tobago, shall remain in full right to England, and that of St. Lucia shall be delivered to France in full right, the two crowns reciprocally guaranteeing to each other the partition so stipulated. By the sixteenth article, it is stipulated, that his Britannic Majesty shall cause all the fortifications to be demolished, which his subjects shall have erected in the bay of Honduras, and other places of the territory of Spain, in that part of the world. And his Catholic Majesty shall not, for the future, suffer the subjects of his Britannic Majesty, or their workmen, to be disturbed or molested under any pretence whatsoever, in their occupation of cutting, loading, and carrying away log-wood; and for this purpose they may build, without hinderance, and occupy, without interruption, the houses and magazines necessary for them, for their families, and for their effects; and his said Catholic Majesty assures to them, by this article, the entire enjoyment of what is above stipulated. By the seventeenth article, his Catholic Majesty desists from all pretensions which he may have formed to the right of fishing about the island of Newfoundland. By the eighteenth article, it is stipulated, that the king of Great Britain shall restore to Spain all that he has conquered in the island of Cuba, with the fortress of Havannah; and that fortress, as well as all the other fortresses of the said island, shall be restored in the same condition they were in when they were conquered by his Britannic Majesty's arms. By the twentieth article, his Catholic Majesty cedes and guarantees, in full right, to his Britannic Majesty, Florida, with the Fort St. Augustine, and the bay of Pensacola, as well as all that Spain possesses on the continent of North America, to the east, or to the southeast of the river Mississippi; and, in general, every thing that depends on the said countries and lands, with the sovereignty, property, and possession, and all rights acquired by treaties, or otherwise, which the Catholic king and the crown of Spain have had till now over the said countries."—Anderson, vol. iii. p. 339—433, where the preliminary articles of the treaty are inserted entire; and vol. iv. p. 1, 2, where the most material alterations or explanations of those articles, as settled by the definitive treaty, are inserted.—American Annals, vol. ii. p. 113—115.

sphere should run along the middle of the Mississippi, from its source as far as the Iberville, and along the middle of that river, and of Lakes Maurepas and Pontchartrain.

Thus terminated a war, which originated in an attempt on the part of the French to surround the English colonists, and chain them to a narrow strip of country along the coast of the Atlantic; and ended with their giving up the whole of what was then their only valuable territory in North America. The immediate advantage the colonies derived from the successful issue of the contest was great and apparent. Although, for a short period after the conquest of Canada had been effected, they were subject to attacks from the Indian tribes attached to the French, and also from the Cherokees on their south-western borders, they were soon enabled to visit their cruelties with severe retribution, and to procure a lasting repose, as the Indians had no forts to which to repair for protection or aid. But the indirect results, though almost unperceived at first, were far more important, and prepared the way for those momentous efforts which issued in the loss to Great Britain of the fairest portion of her colonies, and the establishment of her vassal as a rival. The colonists became inured to the habits and hardships of a military life, and skilled in the arts of European warfare; while the desire of revenge for the loss of Canada, which France did not fail to harbour, was preparing for them a most efficient friend, and making way for the anomalous exhibition of a despotic sovereign exerting all his power in the cause of liberty and independence.

CHAPTER II.

THE REVOLUTION.—FROM THE MOTION FOR WRITS OF ASSISTANCE TO THE REPEAL OF THE STAMP ACT.

No period of the world's history exhibits events more deeply fraught with interest, or more full of moral and political instruction, than the era of American independence. Duly to appreciate the character of the struggle, it is necessary to take a brief review of the circumstances in which the colonies originated, their progress for nearly a century and a half, and the nature of the connexion which existed between the colonies and the parent state.

A considerable variety of circumstances attended the establishment of the different colonies. In some cases large sums were advanced, either by associated or by individual proprietors who remained in England, expecting, though in vain, to derive a profitable return for the advance of their capital; while in others, and those the most eminent, the colonies were founded solely at the expense and by the talent and laborious exertion of the individuals who expatriated themselves, to obtain the uninterrupted enjoyment of rights which they sought in vain in their native land. In no instance can it be truly stated, that any American colony was established at the expense of the government or nation of Great Britain. The individuals who had thus voluntarily separated themselves from their native land by a distance of three thousand miles, still maintained some connexion with the parent state, both because the new soil was claimed as an appendage of the crown, and in order to place themselves under adequate protection against the hostile attempts of any of the other European states. By royal charter, however, each colony was allowed its legislative assembly, and with such slight restrictions, that the colonists might well be excused for entertaining the idea that they possessed their own parliament; and their history evinces that this sentiment was widely extended and deeply impressed on the minds of the Americans. In no case were the civil institutions of the colonies less free than those of the British constitution—in many instances they were far more so; while the simplicity and popular character of their ecclesiastical bodies, tended most powerfully to keep alive the spirit of civil freedom. The liberties they enjoyed were rendered still more valuable, in their esteem, from the recollection of the sacrifices they had made to obtain them. What labour—what fatigue—what peril had they not encountered in an unknown and savage land!—Exposed to the excessive rigour of the winter, and the overpowering heat of the summer, of an American climate, unmitigated by the protecting and consoling influences of civilization, an early death had been the fate of most of the first emigrants; while those who survived the miseries of their situation had to defend their new habitations against the assaults of a ferocious foe, who disputed their title to the possession of lands they had so long regarded as exclusively their own. Did the aristocracy or the legislature of Great Britain share in these toils? Did they dispense with any of their luxurious habits to relieve the wants, or sympathize in the difficulties or distresses of these brave and indefatigable men? Or did they not leave them unnoticed till they became sufficiently wealthy to afford a lucrative banishment to some of the basest scions of nobility, and a prospect of yielding a revenue which might facilitate the enlargement of the pension list?

After the difficulties inevitably attendant on first attempts at colonization were overcome, the progress of the colonists in changing the luxuriant wilderness into a cultivated and well-regulated state was very rapid; and to the abundance of nature, commerce soon added the accumulations of wealth. The secret of their prosperity undoubtedly is, that the colonies were left to themselves, without the officious intermeddling of the legislature of the parent state. The navigation acts form the only exception to this observation. These acts, it has already been observed,* prohibited both exportation and importation either in Britain or the colonies, except in English-built vessels manned by English sailors. These and other enactments were designed to secure to England a monopoly of all American productions, from which her merchants could derive a profit; and had they been carried into full effect, they would have prevented all direct intercourse between the British American colonies and those of Spanish America, as well as with Europe and Asia. Through the laxity of their administration, however, an important traffic had long been carried on with Spanish settlements, the returns of which were principally in gold and silver, an object of great moment to the interest of the English colonies, and indeed very advantageous to Great Britain herself.† A considerable trade was also carried on between New York and some other of the principal American seaports, and Lisbon, the returns of which were made chiefly in specie, and the remainder in wine. These and other sources of commercial profit were closed by the strict enforcement of the navigation laws, their systematic evasion having attracted the attention of the British ministry; and this measure was, in fact, one of the most powerful, though least avowed, incitements to revolutionary zeal. It must also be added, that for the aggrandizement of English manufactures, the colonists were prohibited from making some of the most simple and necessary articles, a measure which was, in the estimation of the Americans, as degrading as it was unjust and oppressive.

It must be evident to any impartial investigator, that for all purposes of internal government, in the New England colonies especially, the connexion between them and the British empire was little more than nominal; and that, under the form of allegiance, the reality of independence had long existed. "It was not easy to devise," says Governor Hutchinson, whose testimony on this point at least must be admitted to be of great weight, "a system of subordinate government less controlled by the supreme, than the governments in the colonies. Every colony had been left to frame their own laws, and adapt them to the genius of the people, and the local circumstances of the colony. Massachusetts, in particular, was governed by laws varying greatly from, though not repugnant to, the laws of England. Not only their penal laws, their forms of administering justice, the descent of estates, varied from the English constitution, and were settled to their own minds; but they had been allowed to establish a mode of religious worship, and a form of church government and discipline, which, at most, might be said to be only tolerated in England."‡ Possessed of their own legislature, the colonists imposed and appropriated their own imposts, and perpetually resisted the attempts of the crown to render the governors, judges, and other officers appointed by the sovereign, independent of the colonial legislatures, by refusing them. The repeated declarations of some of the representative assemblies, that no power could lawfully require the imposition of any tax without the assent of the colonial assembly, plainly indicated their opinion as to their independence of the British parliament in all matters of internal government; while their frequent resistance to the encroachments of the crown, in the conduct of the governors, proves equally their watchful jealousy to keep the sovereign power within the narrowest limits, and to dispute its exercises whenever it interfered with their real or imaginary rights.

The advocates of the liberties of America, preceding and during the period of contest, appear to have been fully aware of the real state of the question; that their views were just, is testified by the almost unanimous concurrence of all enlightened statesmen of the present day. When Charles Townshend, at the conclusion of one of his speeches in favour of the right of the British parliament to tax the colonies, exclaimed, "And now will these Americans, planted by our care, nourished up by our indulgence, until they are grown to a degree of strength and importance, and protected by our arms—will they grudge to contribute their mite to relieve us from the heavy burden we lie under?" Colonel Barre replied:—"They planted by your care! No, your oppression planted them in America. They fled from your tyranny, to a then uncultivated and inhospitable country, where they exposed themselves to almost all the hardships to which human nature is liable, and among others, to the cruelties of a savage foe—the most subtle, and I will take upon me to say, the most formidable, of any people upon the face of God's earth; and yet, actuated by principles of true English liberty, they met all hardships with pleasure, compared with those they suffered in their own country, from the hands of those who should have been their friends. They nourished by your indulgence! They grew by your neglect of them. As soon as you began to take care about them, that care was exercised in sending persons to rule them in one department and another, who were deputies of deputies to some members of this house, sent to prey upon them; men, whose behaviour on many occasions has caused the blood of those sons of liberty to recoil within them; men promoted to the highest seats of justice, some of whom, to my knowledge, were glad, by going to a foreign country, to escape being brought to a bar of justice in their own. They protected by your arms! They have nobly taken up arms in your defence, have exerted their valour, amidst their constant and laborious industry, for the defence of a country whose frontiers were drenched in blood, while its interior parts yielded all its little savings to your emolument. And believe me, that same spirit of freedom which actuated that people at first, will accompany them still.*

The immediate and exciting causes of the spirit of opposition to the government were two-fold; the rigorous execution of the navigation laws, which destroyed a most important and profitable, though contraband and illegal trade; and the assertion by the British parliament of its right to tax the colonies. The latter so speedily followed the former, and afforded so preferable a ground on which to make a stand, that the navigation laws were seldom exhibited as one of the chief grievances; although, had not the stamp act and other similar measures been brought forward, the laws affecting the trade of the colonies would inevitably have excited the same opposition.

The attempt to hold a people, circumstanced as were the American colonists, under the legislation of Great Britain, was as irrational as it was unjust. Financial embarrassments called forth the erroneous policy into action, which, as often happens in private life, deeply aggravated the evil it was designed to remedy; and the attempt to wring a few thousands per annum from the colonists, terminated in plunging Great Britain into debt, and in depriving her of an immense territory, which, under a just and liberal management, might still have continued one of the most illustrious appendages of the British crown.

Plans of laying internal taxes, and of drawing a revenue from the colonies, had been at various times suggested to the ministry, and particularly to Sir Robert Walpole. This statesman, however, was too wise and sagacious to adopt them. "I will leave the taxation of the Americans," Walpole answered, "for some of my successors, who may have more courage than I have, and be less friendly to commerce than I am. It has been a maxim with me," he added, "during my administration, to encourage the trade of the American colonies to the utmost latitude; nay, it has been necessary to pass over some irregularities in their trade with Europe; for, by encouraging them to an extensive and growing foreign commerce, if they gain five hundred thousand pounds, I am convinced that, in two years afterwards, full two hundred and fifty thousand of this gain will be in his majesty's exchequer by the labour and product of this kingdom, as immense quantities of every kind of our manufactures go thither; and as they increase in the foreign American trade, more of our produce will be wanted. This is taxing them more agreeably to their own constitution and laws."† The first Pitt, also, in his celebrated speech on the repeal of the stamp act, referring to the conduct of the several preceding administrations, says, "None of these thought, or even dreamed of, robbing the colonies of their constitutional rights. That was reserved to mark an era of the late administration; not that there were wanting some, when I had the honour to serve his majesty, to propose to me to burn my fingers with an American stamp act. With the enemy at their back, with our bayonets at their breasts, in the day of their distress, perhaps the Americans would have submitted to the imposition; but it would have been taking an ungenerous and unjust advantage."

Whatever might have been the views or wishes of any individual of the British cabinet, at any period, relative to drawing a revenue directly from the colonies, no one had been bold enough to make the attempt until after the reduction of the French power in America. This was deemed a favourable moment to call upon the Americans for taxes, to assist in the payment of a debt, incurred, as was alleged, in a great measure, for their protection against a powerful enemy, now no longer an object of their dread.‡ A British statesman should have reflected, that, if the Americans were relieved from the dread of their ancient enemy, they no longer required the protection of the parent country against that enemy; and that the strongest hold on their dependence was gone when Canada was gained.*

The conquest of Canada had scarcely been effected,† when rumours were extensively prevalent‡ that a different system of government was about to be adopted by the parent state; that the charters would be taken away, and the colonies reduced to royal governments. The officers of the customs began to enforce with strictness all the acts of parliament regulating the trade of the colonies, several of which had been suspended, or had become obsolete. Governor Bernard, of Massachusetts, who was always a supporter of the royal prerogative, appears to have entered fully into these views, and to have indicated, by his appointment of confidential advisers, that his object would be to extend the power of the government to any limits which the ministry might require. The first demonstration of the new course intended to be pursued, was the arrival of an order in council to carry into effect the acts of trade, and to apply to the supreme judicature of the province for writs of assistance, to be granted to the officers of the customs. According to the ordinary course of law, no searches or seizures can be made without a special warrant, issued upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation,

* "The disposition to tax the Americans, unless they would tax themselves equal to the wishes of the ministry, was undoubtedly strengthened by the reports of their gayety and luxury which reached the mother country: it was also said, that the planters lived like princes, while the inhabitants of Britain laboured hard for a tolerable subsistence. The officers lately returned represented them as rich, wealthy, and even overgrown in fortune. Their opinion might arise from observations made in the American cities and towns during the war, while large sums were spent in the country, for the support of fleets and armies. American productions were then in great demand, and trade flourished. The people, naturally generous and hospitable, having a number of strangers among them, indulged themselves in many uncommon expenses. When the war was terminated, and they had no further apprehension of danger, the power of the late enemy in the country being totally broken,—Canada, and the back lands to the very banks of the Mississippi, with the Floridas, being ceded to Great Britain,—it was thought they could not well make too much of those who had so contributed to their security. Partly to do honour to them, and partly, it is to be feared, to gratify their own pride, they added to their show of plate, by borrowing of neighbours, and made a great parade of riches in their several entertainments. The plenty and variety of provision and liquors enabled them to furnish out an elegant table, at a comparatively trifling expense."—Gordon's History, vol. i. p. 157, 158.

† It will be perceived, that the contest respecting the writs of assistance occurred nearly two years before the signature of the treaty of Paris; but it has been deemed preferable to make a slight chronological retrocession, than to dis sever this occurrence from those with which it is so strictly allied in its moral and political character.

‡ "Nothing excited a greater alarm in the breasts of those to whom it was communicated, than the following anecdote, viz. The Rev. Mr. Whitefield, ere he left Portsmouth, in New Hampshire, particularly designating the place to be searched and the goods to be seized. But the writ of assistance was to command all sheriffs and other civil officers to assist the person to whom it was granted, in breaking open and searching every place where he might suspect any prohibited or uncustomed goods to be concealed. It was a sort of commission, during pleasure, to ransack the dwellings of the citizens, for it was never to be returned, nor any account of the proceedings under it rendered to the court whence it issued. Such a weapon of oppression in the hands of the inferior officers of the customs, might well alarm even innocence, and confound the violators of the law.

The mercantile part of the community united in opposing the petition, and was in a state of great anxiety, as to the result of the question. The officers of the customs called upon Mr. Otis for his official assistance, as advocate-general, to argue their cause: but as he believed these writs to be illegal and tyrannical, he resigned the situation, though very lucrative, and if filled by a compliant spirit, leading to the highest favours of government. The merchants of Salem and Boston applied to Otis§ and Thacher, who engaged to make their defence. The trial took place in the council chamber of the Old Town House, in Boston. The judges were five in number, including Lieutenant-Governor Hutchinson, who presided as on Monday afternoon, the 2d of April, 1764, sent for Dr. Langdon and Mr. Haven, the congregational ministers of the town, and upon their coming and being alone with him, said, 'I can't in conscience leave the town without acquainting you with a secret. My heart bleeds for America. O poor New England! There is a deep-laid plot against both your civil and religious liberties, and they will be lost. Your golden days are at an end. You have nothing but trouble before you. My information comes from the best authority in Great Britain. I was allowed to speak of the affair in general, but enjoined not to mention particulars. Your liberties will be lost.'" Gordon, vol. i. p. 143. Considerable jealousy appears to have been justly entertained by the Americans of the well known Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts. The bishop of Llandaff observed, in a discourse on behalf of that institution, that the establishment of episcopacy being obtained, "the American church will go out of its infant state, be able to stand upon its own legs, and, without foreign help, support and spread itself, and then this society will be brought to the happy issue intended." Mr. Whitefield justly remarks, in a letter to Dr. Durell, "Supposing his lordship's assertions true, then I fear it will follow, that a society, which, since its first institution, hath been looked upon as a society for propagating the gospel, hath been all the while rather a society for propagating episcopacy in foreign parts."

§ Mr. Hutchinson insists that the opposition of Mr. Otis was originally excited by the governor's refusing the place of chief justice of the supreme court to his father; and speaking of his conduct on this occasion, says, "Mr. Otis's zeal in carrying on these causes was deemed as meritorious as if it had sprung from a sincere concern for the liberties of the people. His resentment against the governor was not charged upon him as the motive." Mr. Hutchinson may, however, be supposed at least as prejudiced against Mr. Otis, as his biographer or Mr. Adams may be in his favour. See Hutchinson's History of Massachusetts Bay, from 1749 to 1774. p. 90—95.

chief justice; and the room was filled with all the officers of government and the principal citizens, to hear the arguments in a cause that inspired the deepest solicitude. The case was opened by Mr. Gridley, who argued it with much learning, ingenuity, and dignity, urging every point and authority that could be found, after the most diligent search, in favour of the custom house petition; making all his reasoning depend on this consideration,—“if the parliament of Great Britain is the sovereign legislator of the British empire.” He was followed by Mr. Thatcher on the opposite side, whose reasoning was ingenious and able, delivered in a tone of great mildness and moderation. “But,” in the language of president Adams, “Otis was a flame of fire; with a promptitude of classical allusion, a depth of research, a rapid summary of historical events and dates, a profusion of legal authorities, a prophetic glance into futurity, and a rapid torrent of impetuous eloquence, he hurried away all before him. American independence was then and there born. The seeds of patriots and heroes to defend the Non sine Diis animosus infans,* to defend the vigorous youth, were then and there sown. Every man of an immense crowded audience appeared to me to go away as I did, ready to take arms against writs of assistance. Then and there was the first scene of the first act of opposition to the arbitrary claims of Great Britain. Then and there the child Independence was born. In fifteen years, i. e. in 1776, he grew up to manhood and declared himself free.”†

In consequence of this argument, it appears, the popularity of Otis was without bounds, and at the next election he was for the first time chosen a member of the house of representatives by an almost unanimous vote. Some idea of the state of public sentiment at that period may be derived from the following remarkable language of the governor, in his speech at the commencement of the session. “Let me recommend to you to give no attention to declamations tending to promote a suspicion of the civil rights of the people being in danger. Such harangues might suit well in the time of Charles and James, but in the times of the Georges they are groundless and unjust. Since the accession of the first George, there has been no instance of the legal privileges of any corporate body being attacked by any of the king’s ministers or servants, without public censure ensuing. His present majesty has given uncommon assurances how much he has at heart the preservation of the liberty, rights, and privileges of all his subjects. Can it be supposed that he can forfeit his word; or that he will suffer it to be forfeited by the acts of any servant of his with impunity? An insinuation so unreasonable and injurious I am sure will never be well received among you.”

In the following session, Governor Bernard informed the house of representatives that, during the recess of the legislature, he had appropriated a small sum towards fitting out the sloop Massachusetts to protect the fishery. The committee appointed to prepare an answer, reported to the house a message, in which, after desiring his excellency to restore the sloop to her former condition, they add—“Justice to ourselves and to our constituents obliges us to remonstrate against the method of making or increasing establishments by the governor and council. It is in effect taking from the house their most darling privilege, the right of originating all taxes. It is, in short, annihilating one branch of the legislature. And when once the representatives of a people give up this privilege, the government will very soon become arbitrary. No necessity, therefore, can be sufficient to justify a house of representatives in giving up such a privilege; for it would be of little consequence to the people whether they were subject to George or Louis, the king of Great Britain or the French king, if both were arbitrary, as both would be if both could levy taxes without parliament.” “Treason, treason!” cried one of the members, when these words were read; but the report was accepted, and the message sent unaltered to the governor. The same day he returned it, accompanied by a letter requesting that a part of it might be expunged, as disrespectful to the king. It was then proposed to insert an amendment in the message, expressive of loyalty; but a certain member crying “Rase them, rase them,” the obnoxious words, which had been underlined by the governor, were erased; “it being obvious that the remonstrance would be the same in effect with or without them.” The governor sent a vindication of his conduct to the house, and prorogued the assembly before there was time to answer it.

In the mean time, the laws of trade were enforced with increasing strictness, greatly to the embarrassment of American commerce, particularly that of the northern colonies, the whole of whose foreign trade seemed about to be ruined; an event which would leave them no means of making remittances to England for the purchase of manufactures, rendered so necessary by the severity of their climate, but direct exportations to that country; to which, the subjection of Canada having made that province the seat of the fur trade, they had nothing to send, but the growth of their forests and the produce of their whale fishery. The apprehension of this evil induced them to urge their agents and correspondents in Great Britain to make every effort to procure a repeal, or to prevent the perpetuity, of the most obnoxious statutes, particularly of the sugar and molasses act. Notwithstanding the approach of these evils, and the language of Mr. Otis in his argument on writs of assistance, the unconstitutional character of this and the other laws of trade does not appear to have been denied with a voice loud and general enough to excite attention in Great Britain, or even in the southern colonies; nor does the authority of parliament to enact them appear to have been yet openly contested by any deliberative body. The colonies were not ready to throw off by force restraints which they had been accustomed to wear from their infancy, and which had not till lately pressed severely upon them. They now began to find them galling; and perhaps the time when they would have grown up to such a size as to feel themselves cramped and shackled by them beyond endurance, was not far distant. The ministry, however, chose to anticipate it; and in December, 1763, orders were published in America for the vigilant and unsparing enforcement of the most odious of these laws, with the avowed purpose of raising a revenue.

The year 1764 was prolific in measures calculated to agitate and arouse the spirit of the Americans. Early in March an act was passed, which declared that the bills which had been issued by the several colonial governments, should no longer be regarded as legal currency; an enactment which, although in some cases it might have the beneficial effect of preventing an injurious excess of paper, was very prejudicial to the interests, as well as galling to the feelings, of the colonists. On the 10th of March, the house of commons passed eighteen resolutions for imposing taxes and duties on the colonies. The execution of that which declared that it might be proper to impose certain stamp duties on them, was deferred to the next session; but the others were immediately enforced by "An Act for granting certain Duties in America;" which, after stating that it was just and expedient to raise a revenue there, imposed duties on silks and coloured calicoes from Persia, India, or China, and on sugar, wines, coffee, and pimento, made the sugar and molasses act perpetual; reducing the duty on molasses from sixpence to three pence per gallon; and this for the express and sole purpose of raising a revenue. The same act increased the number of enumerated commodities, laid new and harsh restrictions on commerce, re-enacted many of the obsolete laws of trade, and provided that all penalties and forfeitures, accruing under any of them, might be sued for, at the election of the informer, in any court of record or of admiralty, or in that of vice-admiralty, to be established over all America. The declaration which was made, that all these duties should be devoted to the maintenance of an army for the defence of the colonies, was by no means satisfactory: it was, indeed, urged by the ministry, to prove to the Americans that the money which was raised from them would ultimately be spent again among their own inhabitants; but the colonists sagaciously conjectured, that now they had no other enemy than a few exhausted tribes of Indians, there must be some other design than that of defence in maintaining a standing army among them; and they could attribute the plan to no other source, than a desire on the part of the ministry to secure the destruction of their liberties by military force.

The direct assertion by the British parliament, of its right to tax the colonies, accompanied, as it evidently was, by a determination to carry the principle into almost immediate effect, excited the most extensive clamour and agitation, not only among individuals, but in the minds of the constituted authorities. "Taxation without representation is tyranny," was the universal watchword; the proposed exaction was every where the topic of conversation, and the subject of the severest animadversion. Every day beheld the affection of the Americans for the parent country sensibly diminish, while the disposition to resist by force was silently but effectually fostered. Several of the provincial assemblies sent instructions to their agents in London to employ every means to prevent the obnoxious measure being carried into effect.

The people of Boston, at their meeting in May, instructed their representatives to the general court on this important subject. In these instructions, (which were drawn up by Samuel Adams, one of the committee appointed for that purpose,) after commenting on the sugar and molasses act, they proceed to observe: "But our greatest apprehension is, that these proceedings may be preparatory to new taxes; for if our trade may be taxed, why not our lands? why not the products of our lands, and every thing we possess or use? This, we conceive, annihilates our charter rights to govern and tax ourselves. It strikes at our British privileges, which, as we have never forfeited, we hold in common with our fellow-subjects who are natives of Britain. If taxes are laid upon us, in any shape, without our having a legal representation where they are laid, we are reduced from the character of free subjects, to the state of tributary slaves. We, therefore, earnestly recommend it to you to use your utmost endeavours to obtain from the general court all necessary advice and instruction to our agent at this most critical juncture. We also desire you to use your endeavours that the other colonies, having the same interests and rights with us, may add their weight to that of this province; that by united application of all who are aggrieved, all may obtain redress.* This was the first public act in the colonies, in opposition to the ministerial plans of drawing a revenue directly from America; and it contained the first suggestion of the propriety of that mutual understanding and correspondence among the colonies, which laid the foundation of their future confederacy. The house of representatives of Massachusetts, in June following, declared, "That the sole right of giving and granting the money of the people of that province, was vested in them, or their representatives, and that the imposition of duties and taxes by the parliament of Great Britain upon a people not represented in the house of commons, is absolutely irreconcilable with their rights; that no man can justly take the property of another, without his consent; upon which original principles, the power of making laws for levying taxes, one of the main pillars of the British constitution, is evidently founded." The same sentiments are expressed, though in stronger language, in their letter of instructions to their agent. "If the colonists are to be taxed at pleasure," they say, "without any representatives in parliament, what will there be, to distinguish them, in point of liberty, from the subjects of the most absolute prince? If we are to be taxed at pleasure, without our consent, will it be any consolation to us, that we are to be assessed by a hundred instead of one? If we are not represented, we are slaves." The house, also, at the same time, appointed a committee, to sit during the recess of the court, to write to the other colonies, requesting them to join in applying for a repeal of the sugar act, and in endeavouring to prevent the passage of the act laying stamp duties, or any other act imposing taxes on the American provinces.

The assembly of Connecticut appointed a committee to assist the governor in drawing up reasons why the colonies should not be charged with internal taxes by authority of parliament. These reasons were drawn up principally by Mr. Fitch, an able jurist, then governor of Connecticut, and being reported to the assembly of that colony, were approved. In the course of the year, petitions to the king and both houses of parliament were prepared in many of the colonies, and sent to their agents. The general court of Massachusetts was prorogued until October. The house of representatives of that colony agreed upon a petition in accordance with their resolutions of June preceding. This being sent to the council for their concurrence, through the influence of Thomas Hutchinson, one of the joint committee to whom it was referred, was finally so altered and modified, as to place the objections of that colony to the stamp act on the ground of expediency rather than of right. The petitions of the other colonies, however, spoke a more bold and decisive language. The memorial of the assembly of Virginia to the house of commons declared, that "they conceived it essential to British liberty, that laws imposing taxes on the people ought not to be made without the consent of representatives chosen by themselves; who, at the same time that they are acquainted with the circumstances of their constituents, sustain a proportion of the burden laid on them. This privilege, inherent in the persons who discovered and settled these regions, could not," they observed, "be renounced, or forfeited, by their removal hither, not as vagabonds and fugitives, but licensed and encouraged by their prince, and animated with a laudable desire of enlarging the British dominions and extending its commerce; on the contrary, it was secured to them and their descendants, with all other rights and immunities of British subjects, by a royal charter, which hath been invariably recognised and confirmed by his majesty and his predecessors, in their commissions to the several governors, granting a power and prescribing a form of legislation, according to which laws for the administration of justice, and for the welfare and good government of the colony, have been enacted by the governor, council, and general assembly; and to them requisitions and applications for supplies have been directed by the crown."

The petitions of the assembly of New York were drawn with great ability, and breathed a spirit more bold and decided than those from any other colony. In that to the house of commons, after stating, that from the year 1683 there had been in that province three legislative branches, consisting of the governor and council, appointed by the crown, and the representatives chosen by the people, who had enjoyed the right of taxing the subject for the support of the government, and had always granted aid to the crown according to their abilities, they add, "But an exemption from the burden of ungranted and involuntary taxes must be the grand principle of every free state. Without such a right vested in themselves, exclusive of all others, there can be no liberty, no happiness, no security; it is inseparable from the very idea of property; for who can call that his own, which may be taken away at the pleasure of another? And so evidently does this appear to be the natural right of mankind, that even conquered tributary states, though subject to the payment of a fixed periodical tribute, never were reduced to so absolute and forlorn a condition, as to yield to all the burdens which their conquerors might, at any future time, think fit to impose. The tribute paid, the debt was discharged; and the remainder they would call their own. And if conquered vassals, upon the principle of mutual justice, may claim a freedom from assessments unbounded and unassented to, without which they would suffer the loss of every thing, and life itself become intolerable, with how much propriety and boldness may we proceed to inform the commons of Great Britain, who, to their distinguished honour, in all ages asserted the liberties of mankind, that the people of this colony nobly disdain the thought of claiming that exemption as a privilege. They found it on a basis more honourable, solid, and stable; they challenge it, and glory in it as their right. That right their ancestors enjoyed in Great Britain and Ireland; their descendants, returning to these kingdoms, enjoy it again; and that it may be exercised by his majesty's subjects at home, and justly denied to those who submitted to poverty, barbarian wars, loss of blood, loss of money, personal fatigues, and ten thousand unutterable hardships, to enlarge the trade, wealth, and dominion of the nation: or to speak with the most incontestable modesty, that when, as subjects, all have equal merits, a fatal, nay, the most odious discrimination should nevertheless be made between them, no sophistry can recommend to the sober impartial decision of common sense." While the assembly of New York acknowledged that parliament had a right to regulate the trade of the colonies, they declared, that in doing this they had not the right of imposing duties for the purpose of revenue.

In addition to the acts and declarations of the colonial legislatures, various individuals enlightened and animated the colonists by numerous publications both in the newspapers and by separate pamphlets. Among the latter, "The Rights of the Colonists asserted and proved," by Mr. Otis, and "The Sentiments of a British American," by Oxenbridge Thacher, were particularly distinguished. Mr. Otis, among other things, declared, "That the imposition of taxes, whether on trade or on land, on houses, or ships, on real or personal, fixed or floating property, in the colonies, is absolutely irreconcilable with the rights of the colonists, as British subjects and as men." On the subject of the sugar and molasses act, Mr. Thacher stated his objections, the first of which was, "That a tax was thereby laid on several commodities, to be raised and levied in the plantations, and to be remitted home to England. This is esteemed," he said, "a grievance, inasmuch as the same are laid without the consent of the representatives of the colonists. It is esteemed an essential British right, that no man shall be subject to any tax but what, in person or by his representative, he hath a voice in laying."*

In the winter of 1765, at the request of the other agents of the colonies, Dr. Franklin, Jared Ingersoll, Mr. Jackson, and Mr. Garth, had a conference with Mr. Grenville, on the subject of the stamp duty. Mr. Ingersoll was from Connecticut, and had been requested to assist Mr. Jackson in any matters relating to that colony; Mr. Garth was agent for South Carolina, and he and Mr. Jackson were members of parliament. These gentlemen, and particularly Dr. Franklin and Mr. Ingersoll, informed the minister of the great opposition to the proposed tax in America, and most earnestly entreated him, that if money must be drawn from the colonies by taxes, to leave it with the colonists to raise it among themselves, in such manner as they should think proper, and best adapted to their circumstances and abilities. Dr. Franklin informed the minister, that the legislature of Pennsylvania had, by a resolution, declared, "That as they always had, so they always should, think it their duty to grant aids to the crown, according to their abilities, whenever required of them in the usual constitutional way."

Neither the remonstrances of the colonists, however, nor the entreaties of their agents, were of any avail with the ministry or parliament. The bill for laying the stamp and other duties was soon brought before the house, and petitions from the colonies of Virginia, Connecticut, and South Carolina, were offered in opposition to it. The house, however, refused to receive them; in the first place, because they questioned or denied the right of parliament to pass the bill; and, in the second place, because it was contrary to an old standing rule of the house,—“that no petition should be received against a money bill." The majority against receiving the petitions was very large, and those from the other colonies were not offered. The petition from New York was expressed in such strong language, that no member of the house could be prevailed upon to present it. The admirable speech of Colonel Barre in reply to Charles Townshend, which has already been quoted, although it produced a profound impression, did not of course defeat the measure; and the colonial petitions and remonstrances, with the petition of the London merchants trading to America, were equally unavailing. In the house of commons there were about two hundred and fifty for, and only fifty against it. In the lords it passed without debate, with entire unanimity; and on the 22d of March it obtained the royal assent.

This enactment, which was to come into operation on the 1st of November, excited the most serious alarm throughout the colonies. It was viewed as a violation of the British constitution, and as destructive of the first principles of liberty; and combinations against its execution were every where formed. The house of burgesses in Virginia, which was in session when intelligence of the act was received, passed several spirited resolutions, asserting the colonial rights, and denying the claim of parliamentary taxation. The resolutions* were introduced into the Virginia assembly by the eloquent Patrick Henry, who, on the envelope of a copy of them in his own hand writing, has given the following interesting particulars: "They formed," says Mr. Henry, "the first opposition to the stamp act, and the scheme of taxing America by the British parliament. All the colonies, either through fear, or want of opportunity to form an opposition, or from influence of some kind or other, had remained silent.† I had been for the first time elected a burgess a few days before, was young, inexperienced, unacquainted with the forms of the house, and the members that composed it. Finding the men of weight averse to opposition, and the commencement of the tax at hand, and that no person was likely to step forth, I determined to venture; and alone, unadvised, and unassisted, on a blank leaf of an old law book wrote the within. Upon offering them to the house, violent debates ensued. Many threats were uttered, and much abuse cast on me, by the party for submission. After a long and warm contest, the resolutions passed by a very small majority, perhaps of one or two only. The alarm spread throughout America with astonishing quickness, and the ministerial party were overwhelmed. The great point of resistance to British taxation was universally established in the colonies. This brought on the war, which finally separated the two countries, and gave independence to ours. Whether this will prove a blessing or a curse, will depend upon the use our people make of the blessings which a gracious God hath bestowed on us. If they are wise they will be great and happy. If they are of a contrary character, they will be miserable. Righteousness alone can exalt them as a nation."

"It was in the midst of this magnificent debate," says his biographer, Mr. Wirt, "while he was descending on the tyranny of the obnoxious act, that he exclaimed in a voice of thunder, 'Cæsar had his Brutus—Charles the First his Cromwell—and George the Third'—('Treason,' cried the speaker; 'Treason, treason,' echoed from every part of the house: it was one of those trying moments which are decisive of character. Henry faltered not for an instant; but rising to a loftier attitude, and fixing on the speaker an eye of the most determined fire, he finished his sentence with the firmest emphasis,) may profit by their example. If this be treason, make 'the most of it.'"[†]

* They were as follows: "Resolved, That the first adventurers and settlers of this his majesty's colony and dominion, brought with them, and transmitted to their posterity, and all other his majesty's subjects since inhabiting in this his majesty's said colony, all the privileges, franchises, and immunities, that have at any time been held, enjoyed, and possessed by the people of Great Britain.

"Resolved, That by two royal charters, granted by King James I., the colonists aforesaid are declared entitled to all the privileges, liberties, and immunities, of denizens and natural born subjects, to all intents and purposes, as if they had been abiding and born within the realm of England.

"Resolved, That the taxation of the people by themselves, or by persons chosen by themselves to represent them, who can only know what taxes the people are able to bear, and the easiest mode of raising them, and are equally affected by such taxes themselves, is the distinguishing characteristic of British freedom, and without which the ancient constitution cannot subsist.

"Resolved, That his majesty's liege people of this most ancient colony, have uninterruptedly enjoyed the right of being thus governed by their own assembly in the article of their taxes and internal police, and that the same hath never been forfeited, or any other way given up, but hath been constantly recognised by the king and people of Great Britain.

"Resolved, therefore, That the general assembly of this colony have the sole right and power to lay taxes and impositions upon the inhabitants of this colony; and that every attempt to vest such power in any person or persons whatsoever, other than the general assembly aforesaid, has a manifest tendency to destroy British as well as American freedom."—Wirt's Life of Henry, p. 56, 57.

† Mr. Henry does not appear to have been fully informed of, or to have adequately estimated, the character of the proceedings in Massachusetts and other colonies, during the preceding year.

‡ We cannot refrain from giving another extract from Mr. Wirt's Life of Henry, although it is a specimen of an overcharged and vitiated style. Mr. W. has, however, received a just critique from that able work, to which England and America are both greatly indebted, the North American Review. "He had never before had a subject which entirely matched his genius, and was capable of drawing out all the powers of his mind. It was remarkable of him, throughout his life, that his talents never failed to rise with the occasion, and in proportion with the resistance which he had to encounter. The nicety of the vote on his last resolution, proves

In the province of Massachusetts dissatisfaction at the passing the stamp act was strongly manifested, and surprise was mingled with irritation, arising from the act having been adopted without any regard to the memorials and remonstrances forwarded from America on the subject. Feeling as freemen and as Englishmen, they saw a fatal blow aimed at their highly valued charter-liberties, and were justly apprehensive that, without a more resolute and united defence than had yet been made, their civil freedom would be laid prostrate at the feet of despotic power. Governor Bernard, in his speech to the legislature in May, merely glanced at the interesting subject by which the public mind was so deeply agitated; but urged entire submission to all acts of parliament, as it was the sanctuary of liberty and justice; and eulogized the character of the prince on the throne, "as one fully deserving the epithet of a patriot king." His speech had principal reference to other topics of a local nature. But the house of representatives, having referred to committees the several matters recommended by the governor, devoted themselves to the adoption of measures for preserving the rights of the province, which they saw directly and systematically assailed. On an early day of the session, "having considered the many difficulties to which the colonies were and must be reduced by the operation of the late acts of parliament," they voted to appoint a committee of nine of their body to report what measures were best to be taken thereon. This committee recommended "that there should be a meeting, as soon as convenient, of committees from the houses of representatives or burgesses in the several colonies on this continent, to consult together on their present circumstances, and the difficulties to which they are and must be reduced, by the late acts of parliament for levying duties and taxes on the colonies, and to consider of a general and humble address to his majesty and the parliament, imploring relief; that such meeting should be holden at New York, in October; that three persons be chosen from the house of representatives, on the part of this province, to attend the convention; that letters be prepared and transmitted to the respective speakers of the several houses of representatives, or burgesses, that this was not a time to hold in reserve any part of his forces. It was, indeed, an alpine passage, under circumstances even more unpropitious than those of Hannibal; for he had not only to fight, hand to hand, the powerful party who were already in possession of the heights, but at the same instant to cheer and animate the timid band of followers that were trembling, and fainting, and drawing back, below him. It was an occasion that called upon him to put forth all his strength, and he did put it forth, in such a manner as man never did before. The cords of argument, with which his adversaries frequently flattered themselves that they

in the colonies, advising them of the resolutions of the house, and inviting them to join by their committees for the purposes above expressed. And that a letter be also prepared and forwarded to the agent of the province in England on these matters."* This was a very important measure: an occasion was thus furnished for citizens from the different colonies to confer with one another, and to ascertain each other's opinions and feelings; and a precedent was established for a general meeting, in future to consult for the welfare of the whole. The effect of united consultation and petitions must also be much greater than an application or an expression of discontent from a single province; and the British administration might perceive that the dissatisfaction in the colonies was not, as represented, confined to a particular section of the country and to a few individuals, but was almost universal.

On the 7th of October, the convention, consisting of twenty-eight delegates from the assemblies of Massachusetts, Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, the Delaware counties, Maryland, and South Carolina, assembled in the city of New York, and Timothy Ruggles, of Massachusetts, was chosen president. The first measure of the congress was a declaration of the rights and grievances of the colonists. They were declared to be entitled to all the rights and liberties of natural-born subjects within the kingdom of Great Britain; among the most essential of which are, the exclusive power to tax themselves, and the privilege of trial by jury. The grievance chiefly complained of was the act granting certain stamp and other duties in the British colonies, which, by taxing the colonists without their consent, and by extending the jurisdiction of courts of admiralty, was declared to have a direct tendency to subvert their rights and liberties. A petition to the king, and a memorial to each house of parliament, were also agreed on; and it was recommended to the several colonies to appoint special agents, who should unite their utmost endeavours in soliciting redress of grievances. The assemblies of Virginia, North Carolina, and Georgia, were either not in session, or were prevented by their governors from sending representatives to the congress; but they forwarded petitions to England similar to those adopted by that body.

The populace in various parts of the colonies were unwilling to wait for the effect of the constitutional measures their representatives were adopting. One day in the month of August the effigy of Andrew Oliver, the proposed distributor of stamps in Massachusetts, was found hanging on a tree, afterwards well known by the name of Liberty Tree, in the main street of Boston. At night it was taken down, and carried on a bier, amidst the acclamations of an immense collection of people, through the court house, down King-street, to a small brick building, supposed to have been erected for the reception of the detested stamps. This building being soon levelled with the ground, the rioters next attacked Mr. Oliver's house, and having broken the windows, entered it, and destroyed part of the furniture. The next day, however, Mr. Oliver authorized several gentlemen to announce on the exchange, that he had declined having any concern with the office of stamp master; but in the evening a bonfire was made, and a repetition of this declaration exacted of him. On the 26th the tumults were renewed. The rioters assembled in King-street, and proceeded to the house of the deputy register of the court of admiralty, whose private papers, as well as the records and files of the court, were destroyed. The house of Benjamin Hallowell, jun., comptroller of the customs, was next entered; and elevated and emboldened by liquors found in his cellar, the mob, with inflamed rage, directed their course to the house of Lieutenant-governor Hutchinson, who, after vainly attempting resistance, was constrained to depart to save his life. By four in the morning one of the best houses in the province was completely in ruins, nothing remaining but the bare walls and floors. The plate, family pictures, most of the furniture, the wearing apparel, about nine hundred pounds sterling, and the manuscripts and books which Mr. Hutchinson had been thirty years collecting, besides many public papers in his custody, were either carried off or destroyed. The whole damage was estimated at two thousand five hundred pounds.* The town of Boston the next day voted unanimously, that the selectmen and magistrates be desired to use their utmost endeavours, agreeably to law, to suppress the like disorders for the future, and that the freeholders and other inhabitants would do every thing in their power to assist them. The officer appointed to receive the stamped paper, which was daily expected, having resigned his commission, the governor determined to receive the paper into his own charge at the castle; and, by advice of council, he ordered the enlistment of a number of men to strengthen the garrison. This caused great murmur among the people. To pacify them, he made a declaration in council, that he had no authority to open any of the packages, or to appoint a distributor of stamps; that his views in depositing the stamped paper in the castle, and in strengthening the garrison there, were to prevent imprudent people from offering an insult to the king; and to save the town, or province, as it might happen, from being held to answer for the value of the stamps, as they certainly would be if the papers should be taken away. This declaration the council desired him to publish, but it did not stop the clamour. He was forced to stop the enlistment, and to discharge such men as had been enlisted. The first day of November, on which the stamp act was to begin its operation, was ushered in at Boston by the tolling of bells; many shops and stores were shut; and effigies of the authors and friends of that act were carried about the streets, and afterwards torn in pieces by the populace.

Nor was Massachusetts alone;—the obnoxious act received similar, though less flagrant treatment in the other colonies. On the 24th of August a gazette extraordinary was published at Providence, with Vox Populi vox Dei, for a motto: effigies were exhibited, and in the evening cut down and burnt. Three days afterwards, the people of Newport conducted effigies of three obnoxious persons in a cart, with halters about their necks, to a gallows near the town house, where they were hung, and after a while cut down and burnt amidst the acclamations of thousands. On the last day of October, a body of people from the country approached the town of Portsmouth, (New Hampshire,) in the apprehension that the stamps would be distributed; but on receiving assurance that there was no such intention, they quietly returned. All the bells in Portsmouth, Newcastle, and Greenland, were tolled, to denote the decease of Liberty; and in the course of the day, notice was given to her friends to attend her funeral. A coffin, neatly ornamented, and inscribed with "LIBERTY, aged CXLV. years," was prepared for the funeral procession, which began from the state house, attended with two unbraced drums; minute guns were fired until the corpse arrived at the grave, when an oration was pronounced in honour of the deceased; but scarcely was the oration concluded, when, some remains of life having been discovered, the corpse was taken up; and the inscription on the lid of the coffin was immediately altered to "LIBERTY REVIVED;" the bells suddenly struck a cheerful sound, and joy appeared again in every countenance. In Connecticut, Mr. Ingersoll, the constituted distributor of stamps, was exhibited and burnt in effigy in the month of August; and the resentment at length became so general and alarming, that he resigned his office.

The spirit manifested by the citizens of New York produced a similar resignation; and the obnoxious act was contemptuously cried about the streets, labelled, "The Folly of England and Ruin of America." The stamp papers arriving toward the end of October, Lieutenant-Governor Colden took every precaution to secure them. On the 1st of November, many of the inhabitants of New York, offended at the conduct and disliking the political sentiments of the governor, having assembled in the evening, broke open his stable, and took out his coach; and after carrying it through the principal streets of the city, marched to the common, where a gallows was erected, on one end of which they suspended his effigy, with a stamped bill of lading in one hand, and a figure of the devil in the other. When the effigy had hung a considerable time, they carried it in procession suspended to the gallows, to the gate of the fort, whence it was removed to the bowling green, under the muzzle of the guns, and a bonfire made, in which the whole pageantry, including the coach, was consumed, amidst the acclamations of several thousand spectators. The next day, the people insisting upon having the stamps, it was agreed that they should be delivered to the corporation, and they were deposited in the city hall. Ten boxes of stamps, which arrived subsequently, were committed to the flames.

At Philadelphia, on the appearance of the ships having the stamps on board, all the vessels in the harbour hoisted their colours half-mast high, the bells were muffled, and continued to toll until evening. The body of quakers, with a part of the church of England and of the baptists, seemed inclined to submit to the stamp act; but great pains were taken to engage the Dutch and the lower class of people in the opposition, and Mr. Hughes, the stamp master, found it necessary at length to resign. In Maryland, Mr. Hood, the stamp distributor for that colony, to avoid resigning his office, fled to New York; but he was constrained by a number of freemen to sign a paper, declaring his absolute and final resignation. In Virginia, when the gentleman who had been appointed distributor of stamps arrived at Williamsburg, he was immediately urged to resign; and the next day he so handsomely declined acting in his office, that he received the acclamations of the people; at night the town was illuminated, the bells were rung, and festivity expressed the universal joy.

Associations had already been formed in the colonies, under the title of the Sons of Liberty, and were composed of some of the most respectable of their citizens. The association in New York held a meeting on the 7th of November, at which it was determined that they would risk their lives and fortunes to resist the stamp act. Notice of this being sent to the Sons of Liberty in Connecticut, a union of the two associations was soon after agreed upon, and a formal instrument drawn and signed; in which, after denouncing the stamp act as a flagrant outrage on the British constitution, they most solemnly pledged themselves to march with their whole force whenever required, at their own proper cost and expense, to the relief of all who should be in danger from the stamp act or its abettors; to be vigilant in watching for the introduction of stamped paper, to consider all who are caught in introducing it as betrayers of their country, and to bring them if possible to condign punishment, whatever may be their rank; to defend the liberty of the press in their respective colonies from all violations or impediments on account of the said act; to save all judges, attorneys, clerks, and others, from fines, penalties, or any molestation whatever, who shall proceed in their respective duties without regard to the stamp act; and lastly, to use their utmost endeavours to bring about a similar union with all the colonies on the continent. In pursuance of this plan, circular letters were addressed to the Sons of Liberty in Boston, New Hampshire, and as far as South Carolina, and the proposal was received with almost universal enthusiasm.

Societies were formed also in most of the colonies, including females, and those of the highest rank and fashion, of persons who resolved to forego all the luxuries of life, sooner than be indebted for them to the commerce of England, under the restrictions imposed upon it by parliament. These societies denied themselves the use of all foreign articles of clothing; carding, spinning, and weaving became the daily employment of ladies of fashion; sheep were forbidden to be used as food, lest there should not be found a sufficient supply of wool; and to be dressed in a suit of homespun was to possess the surest means of popular distinction. So true were these patriotic societies to their mutual compact, that the British merchants and manufacturers soon began to feel the necessity of uniting with the colonies in petitioning parliament for a repeal of the obnoxious law; and the table of the minister was loaded with petitions and remonstrances from most of the manufacturing and mercantile towns in the kingdom.

THE REVOLUTION—FROM THE REPEAL OF THE STAMP ACT TO THE PASSING THE BILL FOR CLOSING THE PORT OF BOSTON.

WHILE the colonies were thus brought into a state bordering on insurrection by the injudicious and unjust measures of the Grenville administration, the administration itself was rapidly hastening to its dissolution. George III. had ascended the throne not long after the capture of Quebec; and in the following October the patriot Pitt, who had devised and executed the grand scheme of expelling the French from North America, resigned the seals of office. Lord Bute, who appears to have been a personal friend of the new king, was appointed Mr. Pitt's successor; and under his brief administration the peace of Paris was concluded. He was succeeded by Mr. Grenville, whose name will always bear an unhappy notoriety as the author of the stamp act; and whose measures have formed the subject of the preceding chapter. However the king might approve his political sentiments, and the king was a decided tory, Grenville was not personally in favour with his majesty; and the result was, (after some unsuccessful negotiation with Mr. Pitt, who expressed his unwillingness to go to St. James's "without he could carry the constitution along with him,") the formation of the Rockingham administration.

The speech of the king at the opening of parliament in January, 1766, clearly evinced the difference of principle between the men who now formed his cabinet, and his former ministers. He declared "his firm confidence in the wisdom and zeal of parliament, which would, he doubted not, guide them to such sound and prudent resolutions as might tend at once to preserve the constitutional rights of the British legislature over the colonies; and to restore to them that harmony and tranquillity which have lately been interrupted by disorders of the most dangerous nature. He said he had nothing at heart but the assertion of legal authority, the preservation of the liberties of all his subjects, the equity and good order of his government, and the concord and prosperity of all parts of his dominions."—On the motion for an address to the king, the sentiments of the house on the measures of the late administration, and particularly on the stamp act, were given boldly and freely. Mr. Pitt was the first to offer his sentiments on the state affairs. "It is a long time, Mr. Speaker," said that able statesman and uncorruptible patriot, "since I have attended in parliament: when the resolution was taken in this house to tax America, I was ill in bed. If I could have endured to have been carried in my bed, so great was the agitation of my mind for the consequences, I would have solicited some kind hand to have laid me down on this floor to have borne my testimony against it. It is my opinion, that this kingdom has no right to lay a tax upon the colonies. At the same time, I assert the authority of this kingdom to be sovereign and supreme in every circumstance of government and legislature whatsoever. Taxation is no part of the governing or legislative power; the taxes are a voluntary gift and grant of the commons alone. The concurrence of the peers and of the crown is necessary only as a form of law. This house represents the commons of Great Britain. When in this house we give and grant, therefore, we give and grant what is our own, but can we give and grant the property of the commons of America? It is an absurdity in terms. There is an idea in some, that the colonies are virtually represented in this house. I would fain know by whom? The idea of virtual representation is the most contemptible that ever entered into the head of man: it does not deserve a serious refutation. The commons in America, represented in their several assemblies, have invariably exercised this constitutional right of giving and granting their own money; they would have been slaves if they had not enjoyed it. At the same time, this kingdom has ever professed the power of legislative and commercial control. The colonies acknowledge your authority in all things, with the sole exception, that you shall not take their money out of their pockets without their consent. Here would I draw the line—quam ultra citraque nequit consistere rectum." A profound silence succeeded the address of Mr. Pitt; no one appeared inclined to take the part of the late ministers. At length Mr. Grenville himself, the obstinate author of all the mischief which then so loudly threatened the peace and prosperity of the whole empire, rose in defence of the measures of his administration. "Protection and obedience," said the late minister, "are reciprocal; Great Britain protects America, America is therefore bound to yield obedience. If not, tell me, when were the Americans emancipated? The seditious spirit of the colonies owes its birth to the factions in this house. We were told we trod on tender ground, we were bid to expect disobedience: what is this but telling America to stand out against the law? to encourage their obstinacy with the expectation of support here? Ungrateful people of America! The nation has run itself into an immense debt to give them protection; bounties have been extended to them; in their favour the act of navigation, that palladium of British commerce, has been relaxed; and now that they are called upon to contribute a small share towards the public expense, they renounce your authority, insult your officers, and break out, I might almost say, into open rebellion."

In reply to the observations of Mr. Grenville, Mr. Pitt thus addressed himself to the speaker: "Sir, a charge is brought against gentlemen sitting in this house for giving birth to sedition in America. The freedom with which they have spoken their sentiments against this unhappy act is imputed to them as a crime; but the imputation shall not discourage me. It is a liberty which I hope no gentleman will be afraid to exercise; it is a liberty by which the gentleman who calumniates it might have profited. He ought to have desisted from his project. We are told America is obstinate—America is almost in open rebellion. Sir, I rejoice that America has resisted; three millions of people so dead to all the feelings of liberty, as voluntarily to submit to be slaves, would have been fit instruments to make slaves of all the rest. I came not here armed at all points with law cases and acts of parliament, with the statute book doubled down in dogsears to defend the cause of liberty;* but for the defence of liberty upon a general constitutional principle, it is a ground on which I dare meet any man. I will not debate points of law: but what, after all, do the cases of Chester and Durham prove, but that under the most arbitrary reigns, parliament were ashamed of taxing a people without their consent, and allowed them representatives? A higher and better example might have been taken from Wales; that principality was never taxed by parliament till it was incorporated with England. We are told of many classes of persons in this kingdom not represented in parliament; but are they not all virtually represented as Englishmen within the realm? Have they not the option, many of them at least, of becoming themselves electors? Every inhabitant of this kingdom is necessarily included in the general system of representation. It is a misfortune that more are not actually represented.† The honourable gentleman boasts of his bounties to America. Are not these bounties intended finally for the benefit of this kingdom? If they are not, he has misapplied the national treasures. I am no courtier of America—I maintain that parliament has a right to bind, to restrain America. Our legislative power over the colonies is sovereign and supreme. The honourable gentleman tells us, he understands not the difference between internal and external taxation; but surely there is a plain distinction between taxes levied for the purpose of raising a revenue, and duties imposed for the regulation of commerce. 'When,' said the honourable gentleman, 'were the colonies emancipated?' At what time, say I, in answer, were they made slaves? I speak from accurate knowledge when I say that the profits to Great Britain from the trade of the colonies, through all its branches, is two millions per annum. This is the fund which carried you triumphantly through the war; this is the price America pays you for her protection; and shall a miserable financier come with a boast that he can fetch a peppercorn into the exchequer at the loss of millions to the nation? I know the valour of your troops—I know the skill of your officers—I know the force of this country: but in such a cause your success would be hazardous. America, if she fell, would fall like the strong man: she would embrace the pillars of the state, and pull down the constitution with her. Is this your boasted peace? Not to sheathe the sword in the scabbard, but to sheathe it in the bowels of your countrymen? The Americans have been wronged—they have been driven to madness by injustice. Will you punish them for the madness you have occasioned? No, let this country be the first to resume its prudence and temper; I will pledge myself for the colonies, that, on their part, animosity and resentment will cease. Upon the whole, I will beg leave to tell the house in a few words what is really my opinion. It is, that the stamp act be repealed absolutely, totally, and immediately. At the same time, let the sovereign authority of this country over the colonies be asserted in as strong terms as can be devised, and be made to extend to every point of legislation whatsoever; that we may bind their trade, confine their manufactures, and exercise every power whatsoever, except that of taking their money out of their pockets without their consent."

The address of the commons having been voted, Mr. Grenville made an attempt to pledge the house to enforce the obnoxious enactment, but was successfully opposed by the new ministers, who were supported by a majority of one hundred and forty. The house made no delay in entering on the investigation of the papers relative to American affairs, which were laid before them by command of his majesty. The petition from the congress at New York was not allowed to be read, the parliament having denied their authority to assemble for the purpose alleged. Various other petitions, however, as well from the colonies as from the manufacturing and trading interests of the kingdom, all tending to the same point, received due and patient attention. In the course of this inquiry on American affairs, Dr. Franklin, whose political integrity and moral worth were alike duly estimated by the people of England, was called to the bar of the house, and freely questioned upon many important topics.* The answers which he gave fully confirmed the new ministers in the propriety and expediency of their intention to move for a repeal of the stamp act; and a bill for that purpose was, on the 22d of February, brought in by General Conway, who had so boldly denied the right of parliament to impose it in the first instance. The debate which ensued was warm, interesting, and long; but "the house, by an independent, noble-spirited, and unexpected majority, in the teeth of all the old mercenary Swiss of the state, in despite of all the speculators and augurs of political events, in defiance of the whole embattled legion of veteran pensioners and practised instruments of court, gave a total repeal to the stamp act, and if the scheme of taxing the colonies had been totally abandoned, a lasting peace to the whole empire."† The motion was carried by two hundred and seventy-five against one hundred and sixty-seven. During the debate, "the trading interest of the empire crammed into the lobbies of the house of commons with a trembling and anxious expectation, and waited, almost to a winter's return of light, their fate from the resolution of the house. When, at length, that had determined in their favour, and the doors thrown open showed them the figure of their deliverer in the well earned triumph of his important victory, from the whole of that grave multitude there arose an involuntary burst of gratitude and transport. They jump-

* Dr. Franklin's answers to the numerous questions put to him on this occasion, show at once his thorough knowledge of the merits of the cause, and of the views, principles, and spirit of his countrymen. To the question, "Do not you think the people of America would submit to the stamp duty if it was moderated?" he answered, "No, never, unless compelled by force of arms." To the question, "What was the temper of America towards Great Britain before the year 1763?" he replied, "The best in the world. They submitted willingly to the government of the crown, and paid, in their courts, obedience to acts of parliament. Numerous as the people are in the several old provinces, they cost you nothing in forts, citadels, garrisons, or armies, to keep them in subjection. They were governed by this country at the expense only of a little pen, ink, and paper; they were led by a thread. They had not only a respect, but an affection for Great Britain, for its laws, its customs, and manners, and even a fondness for its fashions, that greatly increased the commerce. Natives of Britain were always treated with ed upon him like children on a long absent father. They clung about him as captives about their redeemer. All England joined in his applause. Nor did he seem insensible to the best of all earthly rewards, the love and admiration of his fellow-citizens. Hope elevated and joy brightened his crest."‡ The bill having passed the house of commons, went up to the house of lords. Lords Bute and Strange publicly declared that his majesty's wish was not for a repeal. The Marquis of Rockingham and Lord Shelburne went together to the king, and told him what was reported. They were informed that his majesty had expressed his desire that it should be enforced; but if it could not be done peaceably and without bloodshed, it was his sincere desire and intention that it should be totally repealed. The dukes of York and Cumberland, the lords of the bedchamber, and the officers of the household, were for carrying fire and sword to America; and most of the bench of bishops concurred in those hostile sentiments. There were, in the lords, for the repeal one hundred and five, against it seventy-one.

On the 19th of March, his majesty went to the house of peers, and passed the bill for repealing the American stamp act, as also that for securing the dependency of the colonies on the British crown. On this occasion the American merchants made a most numerous appearance to express their gratitude and joy; ships in the river displayed their colours; the city was illuminated; and every method was adopted to demonstrate the sense entertained of the wisdom of parliament in conciliating the minds of the people on this critical occasion. In America, the intelligence was received with acclamations of the most sincere and heartfelt gratitude by all classes of people. Public thanksgivings were offered up in all the churches. The resolutions which had been passed on the subject of importations were rescinded, and their trade with the mother country was immediately renewed with increased vigour. The homespun dresses were particular regard; to be an Old England-man was, of itself, a character of some respect, and gave a kind of rank among us."—"And what is their temper now?" it was asked. "O, very much altered," he replied. "Did you ever hear the authority of parliament to make laws for America, questioned till lately?"—"The authority of parliament," said he, "was allowed to be valid in all laws, except such as should lay internal taxes. It was never disputed in laying duties to regulate commerce." To the question, "Can you name any act of assembly, or public act of any of your governments, that made such distinction?" he replied, "I do not know that there was any; I think there was never an occasion to make such an act, till now that you have attempted to tax us; that has occasioned resolutions of assembly, declaring the distinction, in which I think every assembly on the continent, and every member in every assembly, have been unanimous."

given to the poor, and once more the colonists appeared clad in the produce of British looms.

In his circular to the governors of the colonies, Secretary Conway informed them that the king and parliament "seemed disposed not only to forgive but to forget those most unjustifiable marks of an undutiful disposition, too frequent in the late transactions of these colonies;" but at the same time required them strongly to recommend to the assemblies to make full and ample compensation to those who had suffered "for their deference to the act of the British legislature." The transactions referred to in the secretary's letter were those which took place in Boston and New York, in the summer of 1765. In June, 1766, this letter of the British secretary was laid before the assembly of Massachusetts, by Governor Bernard. In communicating it to the assembly of that province, the governor says, "The justice and humanity of this requisition," as he called it, "is so forcible, that it cannot be controverted; the authority with which it is introduced should preclude all disputation about it." This language on the part of the royal governor was considered, by the house of representatives, as interfering with the freedom of deliberation in that body, and was one of the causes which produced delay in complying with the wishes of the king and parliament on this subject. In their answer to this communication, the house observed, "That it was conceived in much higher and stronger terms in the speech than in the letter of the secretary. Whether in thus exceeding, your excellency speaks by your own authority, or a higher, is not with us to determine. However, if this recommendation, which your excellency terms a requisition, be founded on so much justice and humanity that it cannot be controverted; if the authority with which it is introduced should preclude all disputation about complying with it, we should be glad to know what freedom we have in the case." Compensation was not made to the sufferers in Massachusetts until December, 1767; and then in a manner and on conditions highly displeasing to the British government; the act for that purpose also containing "free and general pardon, indemnity, and oblivion, to all offenders in the late times." The act was afterwards disallowed by the king and council, because the assembly had no power to pass a law of general pardon without the previous assent of the crown. The sufferers, however, received the compensation provided by the act, and the rioters were not prosecuted.

The government of Great Britain could not have found an agent less qualified to foster and preserve a spirit of reconciliation in the colonies, than his excellency Governor Bernard. He was haughty, morose, and tyrannical, and seemed to take delight in thwarting every measure of the assembly not proposed by his immediate friends and sub-agents. This conduct on the part of the governor, so far from subduing the spirits of what was called the American party, or the friends of liberty, irritated them to more open hostility, and brought continual accessions to their numbers. The town of Boston was at this time represented by James Otis, jun., Thomas Cushing, Samuel Adams, and John Hancock; men whose subsequent conduct proved that they were not to be driven into any surrender of privilege. It was probably in the power of the governor to have made them friends of the king; but he chose, by every petty act of opposition to their views, to alienate their respect and affection, and confirm them in the character of champions of freedom. At the meeting of the assembly, Mr. Otis was chosen speaker, but the governor refused to confirm the choice; he also refused to sanction the nomination of the council, because the crown officers had been left out. Hitherto the influence of the governor over the assembly had been greatly assisted by the secrecy with which the debates of that house had been carried on; but the friends of liberty were now so numerous there, that their doors were thrown open, and a gallery ordered to be erected for the accommodation of their fellow-citizens. From this moment the court party began to decline, and the cause of the people to acquire additional defenders.

In New York the legislature, by a voluntary act, granted compensation to those who had suffered a loss of property in their adherence to the stamp act; but they refused to carry into execution the act of parliament for quartering his majesty's troops upon them, on account of a clause which they declared involved the principle of taxation.

In the mean time a change took place in the British cabinet. The administration of the Marquis of Rockingham terminated in July, 1766, and a new ministry was formed, under the direction of Mr. Pitt, composed of men of different political principles and parties. The Duke of Grafton was placed at the head of the treasury; Lord Shelburne was joined with General Conway, as one of the secretaries of state; Charles Townshend was made chancellor of the exchequer; Camden lord chancellor; Pitt had the privy seal, and was made a peer, with the title of the Earl of Chatham; and Lord North and George Cooke were joint paymasters. Under this checkered administration, the scheme of taxing America was revived. In May, 1767, the new chancellor of the exchequer submitted a plan of this kind to parliament. Charles Townshend was a man of genius and talents, but of high passions, eccentric, and versatile. He had warmly supported Grenville in the passage of the stamp act, and had voted with the Marquis of Rockingham in its repeal. The ex-minister Grenville may indeed be considered the real author of the second plan for taxing the colonies, for he was ever urging the subject on the new ministers.*

The measure proposed by Townshend to the house was for imposing duties on glass, paper, pasteboard, white and red lead, painters' colours, and tea imported into the colonies. The preamble declared, "that it was expedient to raise a revenue in America, and to make a more certain and adequate provision for defraying the charge of the administration of justice and the support of the civil government in the provinces, and for defraying the expenses of defending, protecting, and securing them." The Earl of Chatham was then confined by sickness in the country, the bill passed both houses without much opposition, and on the 29th of June received the royal assent.

The conduct of the assemblies of Massachusetts and New York had given great dissatisfaction in Great Britain. The refusal of the assembly of the latter to comply with the requisitions of the mutiny act, in particular, had excited the indignation of the ministry and parliament to such a degree, that three days after the passage of the new tax bill an act was passed restraining the legislature of that province from passing any act whatever, until they had furnished the king's troops with all the articles required by the mutiny act. The ministry at the same time determined to establish a new board of custom-house officers in America. An act was therefore passed, enabling the king to put the customs and other duties in America, and the execution of the laws relating to trade there, under the management of commissioners to be appointed for that purpose, and to reside in the colonies. This, as the preamble declares, would "tend to the encouragement of commerce, and to better securing the rates and duties, and the more speedy and effectual collection thereof."

These three acts arrived in America about the same time. The imposition of new taxes, accompanied by the establishment of a board of custom-house officers, not only to enforce the collection of the new taxes, but the various ancient statutes relating to duties and the colonial trade, again excited great alarm among the colonists. It led them to a more thorough investigation of the nature of their political connexion with the parent country, and to a more strict inquiry into the extent of the power of parliament over them. The ablest heads were engaged in these investigations and inquiries, and the ablest pens employed in defence of American rights.† The legislature of New York were, indeed, frightened into immediate compliance, but a different effect was produced in the other colonies. They saw in it a bold and daring attack upon their chartered privileges; if the parliament of England felt so little scruple in abolishing the legislative power of a colony, they might, with equal indifference, attack some other rights guaranteed to them by their charter, and in the end adopt the advice which had been once given by Governor Bernard, and abolish the charter itself. The uneasiness occasioned by this prohibitory act was, indeed, particularly in Massachusetts, little less than that produced by the stamp act; and their fears were still further increased soon afterwards by the arrival of a body of British troops in Boston, which were hypocritically said to have been driven in by stress of weather. They arrived during the recess of the legislature, and the governor and his council undertook to provide for their support out of the public treasury. The conduct of the troops themselves was by no means calculated to appease the people; on the contrary, it tended to confirm the suspicions, that the alleged cause of their coming into Boston was an insidious fabrication. When the legislature met, they remonstrated, in their usual firmness and dignity of manner, against the appropriations of the public money by the governor; and the governor, with his usual virulence, wrote an exaggerated account of the affair to the ministers at home.‡ The new duties were considered by the Americans only as a new mode of drawing money from them by way of taxes; and the spirit manifested in the case of the stamp act again appeared, while they viewed the appointment of commissioners of the customs to reside in America as a dangerous innovation, and an unnecessary increase of the crown officers.

The appropriation of the new duties to the support of crown officers, and to the maintenance of troops in America, was a subject of serious complaint. It had long

* "Declaiming, as usual, one evening, on American affairs, he addressed himself particularly to the ministers. 'You are cowards,' he said; 'you are afraid of the Americans; you dare not tax America.' This he repeated in different language. Upon this, Townshend took fire, immediately rose, and said, 'Fear! fear! cowards! dare not tax America! I dare tax America.' Grenville stood silent for a moment, and then said, 'Dare you tax America? I wish to God I could see it.' Townshend replied, 'I will, I will.'—MSS. papers of Dr. Wm. S. Johnson, then in England as agent for Connecticut, quoted in Pitkin's History, vol. i. p. 217.

been a favourite object of the British cabinet to establish in the colonies a fund, from which the salaries of the governors, judges, and other officers of the crown should be paid, independent of the annual grants of the colonial legislatures. As these officers held their places during the pleasure of the king, the people of Massachusetts, it will be remembered, had uniformly resisted such establishment, though repeatedly urged on the part of the crown. On this subject the house of representatives maintained, in resolutions indicative of great firmness, their former purpose. The house, also, during this session addressed a circular letter to the other colonies, stating the difficulties to be apprehended by the operation of the late acts of parliament, and requesting their co-operation for redress. When the question of addressing a circular to the colonies was first presented to the house it was opposed, as seeming to countenance the meeting of another congress, heretofore so offensive to the British government; and the motion was negatived. The subject was afterwards reconsidered, and the letter so worded as to satisfy a large majority of the house. The other colonies approved of the proceedings of Massachusetts, and joined in applying to the king for relief.

The circular letter of Massachusetts created no little alarm in the British cabinet. They viewed it as an attempt to convene another congress, to concert measures in opposition to the authority of parliament. Union and concert among the colonies was a peculiar object of dread with the ministers; and they were determined, if possible, to prevent every measure leading to it. A letter from Lord Hillsborough, secretary of state, was therefore addressed to the governor of Massachusetts, directing him, at the next meeting of the general assembly of that colony, "to require of the house of representatives, in his majesty's name, to rescind the resolution which gave birth to the circular letter of the speaker, and to declare their disapprobation of, and dissent to, that rash and hasty proceeding." If the house refused compliance, he was directed immediately to dissolve the assembly, and to transmit their proceedings to the king, that measures might be taken to prevent for the future "a conduct of so extraordinary and unconstitutional a nature." This being communicated to the house of representatives of Massachusetts in June, 1768, the house, in the most peremptory manner, by ninety-two to seventeen, refused to rescind, or to disapprove of the proceedings of the preceding assembly; declaring their rights as British subjects, in a respectful manner, to petition the king and parliament for a redress of grievances, and to request the other colonies to unite with them for the same purpose. The house viewed the letter of Lord Hillsborough as an unwarrantable attempt on their rights; and in their answer to the communication of the governor on this subject, express themselves with no little warmth. "If the votes of the house were to be controlled by the direction of a minister," they say, "we have left us but a shadow of liberty." On the question to rescind, Mr. Otis, one of the representatives from Boston, said—"When Lord Hillsborough knows that we will not rescind our acts, let him apply to parliament to rescind theirs. Let Britain rescind their measures, or they are lost for ever." On receiving information of the decision of the house, the governor immediately dissolved the assembly.

The ministerial mandate to the other colonies was equally disregarded. The answer of the house of representatives of Maryland to the message of Governor Sharpe, communicating Lord Hillsborough's letter, evinces the independent and fearless spirit of the people of that province. "We cannot," say they, "but view this as an attempt, in some of his majesty's ministers, to suppress all communication of sentiments between the colonies, and to prevent the united supplications of America from reaching the royal ear. We have the warmest and most affectionate attachment to our most gracious sovereign, and shall ever pay the readiest and most respectful regard to the just and constitutional power of the British parliament; but we shall not be intimidated by a few high-sounding expressions from doing what we think is right." The assemblies of New York, Delaware, Virginia, and Georgia, expressed similar sentiments, in language more or less decided. Indeed, all Americans looked with astonishment at such a system of policy proceeding from a ministry of which Lord Chatham constituted a part. They found it impossible to reconcile the conduct now adopted towards them with their ideas of his lordship's character. They had heretofore regarded him as a friend, in whose honest and liberal principles they might securely trust the management of all that concerned the colonies; but here was a melancholy evidence before their eyes of the insincerity of ministerial professions. In justice to the character of Lord Chatham, however, it must be observed, that he was not in parliament during any part of the time that these measures of Mr. Townshend were under discussion. The state of his health was such as not only to detain him from his seat in the house, but to render him incapable of attending to any of the duties of his high station; and it appears that his opinion weighed but little with the men whom he had raised to power

Charles Townshend, from whom all the troubles and commotions that were now rapidly spreading through the colonies in a great measure originated, did not live to witness their effects. He died in September, 1767, and was succeeded as chancellor of the exchequer by Frederick Lord North, a young nobleman, who was then but little known in the political world, but who will be found to make a conspicuous figure in the sequel of this history. Very soon afterwards, Lord Chatham, disgusted with the corrupt influence which manifested itself in every act of the court, and sick of the political world, resigned the privy seal, which was immediately put into the hands of the Earl of Bristol. It was thought necessary, about the same time, to create a new office—that of secretary of state for the colonies—which was given to Lord Hillsborough, a circumstance which indicated that they were becoming an object of the highest consideration in the estimation of the cabinet.

The colonists meanwhile were adopting all the peaceable means in their power to show their sense of the wrongs heaped upon them. Petitions, memorials, and remonstrances to the king and parliament, and letters to the individual friends of America, were addressed from all the legislatures; but the most favourable reply which any of them received was an exhortation to suffer with patience and in silence. To suffer tamely, and without seeking redress, however, was not the character of the sturdy sons of freedom who inhabited the colonies. They entered into the same kind of resolutions of non-importation, the effects of which had been so severely felt by the traders in England under the stamp act. Boston, as before, took the lead. At a town meeting held in October, it was voted that measures should be immediately taken to promote the establishment of domestic manufactories, by encouraging the consumption of all articles of American manufacture. They also agreed to purchase no articles of foreign growth or manufacture, but such as were absolutely indispensable. New York and Philadelphia soon followed the example of Boston; and in a short time the merchants themselves entered into associations to import nothing from Great Britain but articles that necessity required.

The new board of commissioners of the customs established at Boston had now entered on the duties of their office. From the great excitement at that place, produced by the late proceedings of parliament, a collision between the new custom-house officers and the people was by no means improbable. The indignation of the people of Boston was at length excited to open opposition by the seizure of Mr. Hancock's sloop Liberty, for a violation of the revenue laws. The popularity of the owner, who was one of the most active friends of the people, added to the abhorrence already felt for the officers of the customs and the whole board of commissioners, combined to give a character of outrage to this seizure in the minds of the populace, which led to an alarming riot. Under the idea that the sloop would not be safe at the wharf in their custody, the custom-house officers had solicited aid from a ship of war which lay in the harbour, the commander of which ordered the sloop to be cut from her fastenings and brought under the guns of his ship. It was to prevent this removal that the mob collected—many of the officers were severely wounded in the scuffle, and the mob being baffled in their attempts to retain the sloop at the wharf, repaired to the house of the collector, comptroller, and other officers of the customs, where they committed many acts of violence and injury to their property. This riotous disposition continued for several days, during which the commissioners applied to the governor for assistance, but his excellency not being able to protect them, advised them to remove from Boston; they consequently retired, first on board the Romney man-of-war, and then to Castle William. A committee of the council, in their report on this subject, say, that, although the extraordinary circumstances attending the seizure of the sloop, might, in some measure, extenuate the criminality of the riotous proceedings in consequence of it, yet, being of a very criminal nature, they declared their abhorrence of them, and requested that the governor would direct prosecutions against the offenders. This report was accepted by the council, but in consequence of the dissolution of the assembly, was not acted upon by the house. Such, however, was the state of public feeling, that no prosecutions could be successfully carried on.* The excitement at Boston was greatly increased about this time by the impressment of some seamen belonging to that town by order of the officers of the Romney.† The inhabitants of Boston were assembled on this occasion, and their petition to the governor, praying his interference to prevent such outrages for the future, shows to what a state of alarm, anxiety, and even despair, they were then

† This was in direct violation of an act of parliament, (the 6th Anne,) which declared, that "no mariner, or other person, who shall serve on board, or be retained to serve on board, any privateer, or trading ship, or vessel, that shall be employed in America, nor any mariner or person, being on shore in any part thereof, shall be liable to be impressed or taken away by any officer or officers of or belonging to, her majesty's ships of war."

reduced. They state that, while waiting for a gracious answer to their petitions to the king, they were invaded with an armed force, impressing and imprisoning the persons of their fellow subjects, contrary to an express act of parliament; that menaces had been thrown out fit only for barbarians, affecting them in the most sensible manner, and that, "on account of the obstruction of their navigation, the situation of the town was nearly such as if war had been formally declared against it. To contend," they said, "against our parent state, is, in our idea, the most shocking and dreadful extremity; but tamely to relinquish the only security we and our posterity retain for the enjoyment of our lives and properties without one struggle, is so humiliating and base, that we cannot support the reflection."

The general court of Massachusetts having been dissolved by Governor Bernard, who refused to convene it again without his majesty's command, on the proposal of the selectmen of Boston to the several towns in the colony, a convention met in that town on the 22d of September, to deliberate on constitutional measures to obtain redress of their grievances. The convention, disclaiming legislative authority, petitioned the governor; made loyal professions; expressed its aversion to standing armies, to tumults and disorders, its readiness to assist in suppressing riots, and preserving the peace; recommended patience and good order; and after a short session dissolved itself.

The day before the convention rose, advice was received that a man-of-war and some transports from Halifax, with about nine hundred troops, had arrived at Nantasket harbour. On the day after their arrival, the fleet was brought to anchor near Castle William. Having taken a station which commanded the town, the troops, under cover of the cannon of the ships, landed without molestation, and, to the number of upwards of seven hundred men, marched, with muskets charged, bayonets fixed, martial music, and the usual military parade, into the common. In the evening, the selectmen of Boston were required to quarter the two regiments in the town; but they absolutely refused. A temporary shelter, however, in Fanueil Hall, was permitted to one regiment that was without its campequipage. The next day, the state-house, by order of the governor, was opened for the reception of the soldiers; and, after the quarters were settled, two field pieces, with the main guard, were stationed just in its front. Every thing was calculated to excite the indignation of the inhabitants. The lower floor of the state-house, which had been used by gentlemen and merchants as an exchange, the representatives-chamber, the court-house, Fanueil Hall—places with which were intimately associated ideas of justice and freedom, as well as of convenience and utility—were now filled with troops of the line. Guards were placed at the doors of the state-house, through which the council must pass in going to their own chamber. The common was covered with tents. Soldiers were constantly marching and countermarching to relieve the guards. The sentinels challenged the inhabitants as they passed. The sabbath was profaned, and the devotion of the sanctuary disturbed, by the sound of drums and other military music. There was every appearance of a garrisoned town. The colonists felt disgusted and injured, but not overawed, by the presence of such a body of soldiery. After the troops had obtained quarters, the council were required to provide barracks for them, agreeably to act of parliament; but they resolutely declined any measure which might be construed into a submission to that act. In a few weeks several more transports arrived at Boston from Cork, having on board part of the 64th and 65th British regiments, under Colonels Mackey and Pomeroy.

It is evident that the British ministry little understood the true interests of the kingdom in regard to the transatlantic colonies. They had certainly made sufficient experiments to ascertain that the Americans were not to be intimidated into a surrender of any of their rights; and yet they persisted in measures which could only tend to alienate their affections, and to widen the breach which former attempts had created, and which a contrary policy might have healed. These rigorous measures of the ministry, however, received the fullest sanction of both houses of parliament. The lords passed resolutions censuring the votes and proceedings of Massachusetts; and pronounced the election of deputies to sit in convention, and the meeting of that convention, daring insults offered to his majesty's authority, and audacious usurpations of the powers of government. The house of commons concurred in these resolutions; and both houses, in a joint address to his majesty, expressed their satisfaction in the measures that he had pursued; gave the strongest assurances that they would effectually support him in such further measures as might be found necessary to maintain the magistrates in a due execution of the laws in Massachusetts Bay; and besought him "to direct the governor to take the most effectual methods for procuring the fullest information, touching all treasons or misprisions of treason, committed within the government since the 30th day of December, 1767, and to transmit the same, together with the names of the persons who were most active in the commission of such offences, to one of the secretaries of state, in order that his majesty might issue a special commission for inquiring of, hearing, and determining, the said offences within the realm of Great Britain, pursuant to the provision of the statute of the 35th of Henry the Eighth."

There is no portion of the conduct of the British government, in its contest with the colonies, which betrays stronger indications of tyranny, or evinces more of the blindness happily so often found in connexion with it, than the last of these resolutions. It was evidently intended to terrify the leaders of the patriotic party; but it certainly ought to have been foreseen, that it was far more calculated to give them additional power, by affording another instance of the unjust and oppressive measures which the British legislature was prepared to sanction. If the object of the ministry had been to goad the colonists to resistance before they were overawed by numerous garrisons of royal troops, their conduct was intelligible and consistent; but as that was evidently far from their design, we find in it another occasion of admiring the dispensations of Him "who setteth up one and putteth down another," in allotting so small a portion of prescience to the individuals who at this time counselled his Britannic majesty.

Massachusetts had no general assembly when the address and resolutions of parliament became known in America, it having been dissolved by the governor; but Virginia, uniformly prompt, intelligent, and decided, did not suffer them to pass unobserved. The house of burgesses, alarmed at the general danger, passed several resolutions, which they directed their speaker to transmit without delay to the speakers of the houses of assembly in the other colonies, whose concurrence in similar sentiments was earnestly requested. On the next day, the house, foreseeing the event, met on the instant of the ringing of the bell, and with closed doors received the report of their resolutions, considered, adopted, and ordered them to be entered upon their journals; which they had scarcely done, when they were summoned to attend the governor, and were dissolved. "Mr. Speaker," said he, "and gentlemen of the house of representatives, I have heard of your resolves, and augur ill of their effects; you have made it my duty to dissolve you, and you are accordingly dissolved." But the dissolution of the house of burgesses did not change the materials of which it had been composed. The same members were re-elected without a single exception, and the same determined spirit of resistance continued to diffuse itself from the legislature over the colony which they represented, and to animate by sympathy the neighbouring colonies.* The assembly of South Carolina, the lower house in Maryland and the Delaware counties, and the assembly of North Carolina, adopted similar resolutions. Towards the close of the year, the assembly of New York also passed resolutions in concurrence with those of Virginia.

The general court of Massachusetts was at length convened on the 31st of May, not having been before called together by the governor since his memorable dissolution of it, for refusing to rescind their resolution respecting the circular letter. Their first act was to send a committee to the governor, to declare, "that they claimed that constitutional freedom, which was the right of the assembly, and was equally important as its existence; to assure his excellency, that it was their firm resolution to promote the welfare of the subject, and support his majesty's government in the province; to make a thorough inquiry into the grievances of the people, and to have them redressed; to amend, strengthen, and preserve the laws of the land; to reform illegal proceedings in administration, and to maintain the public liberty." "This resolution," they said, "demanded parliamentary freedom in the debates of the assembly; and therefore they were constrained early to remonstrate to his excellency, that an armament by sea and land investing the metropolis, and a military guard with cannon pointed at the very door of the state-house, where the assembly had convened, was inconsistent with the dignity and freedom with which they had a right to deliberate, consult, and determine. The experience of ages was sufficient to evince that the military power was ever dangerous, and subversive of a free constitution; the council of the province had publicly declared that the aid of the military was unnecessary to support the civil authority in Massachusetts; nor could they conceive that his majesty's service required a fleet and army at Boston, in a time of profound peace; and they had a right to expect that his excellency, as the representative of the king, would give the necessary orders for the removal of the forces, both of the sea and of the land, out of the harbour, and from the gates of the capital, during the sitting of the assembly." To this message of the house the governor replied, "that he had no control of the king's troops stationed in the town or province, and that he had received no orders for their removal."†

in the exercise of official authority; yet it was hardly to be supposed that he would causelessly give offence, by objecting to many of the best friends of the people elected to the council board. He gave his negative, however, to eleven gentlemen who had been chosen by the assembly, among whom were Bowdoin, Brattle, and Hancock: and after the general court had been some days in session, because they were consulting upon means to preserve the liberties of the people and obtain redress of grievances, instead of giving their attention to the ordinary business of voting salaries and providing for replenishing the treasury, he undertook to dictate to them what were the proper subjects of legislation; charged them with wasting the public money by needless debates, and threatened to adjourn the court to some other place, unless they should proceed in the usual, and, as he pretended, necessary course of business. The general assembly was accordingly removed to Cambridge, where it was very inconvenient to be holden, as the records and the house erected for their accommodation were in Boston. Thus the military were suffered to keep possession of the capital of the province, and the legislative assembly ordered to another place, because they chose not to be surrounded by armed men. They could not, however, be driven from their purpose of boldly remonstrating against all arbitrary measures, especially the obnoxious one of keeping a large military force in the province, and of devising proper means for relief to the people. "The firmness and decision of this assembly," says Mr. Alden Bradford, "are entitled to the highest praise. The resolution and patriotism they exhibited at this critical period have never, perhaps, been exceeded by our most meritorious statesmen." The occasion demanded an energy and zeal which no dangers or threats could subdue. And the men whom the people had then trusted with their dearest rights, proved themselves equal to the peculiar exigencies of the times. Nothing was omitted on their part to show their abhorrence of despotism, their attachment to constitutional liberty, and their determined purpose to deliver the people from oppression.*

On the 6th of July, the governor sent a message to the court, with accounts of the expenditures already incurred by quartering his majesty's troops; desiring funds to be provided for discharging the same, and requiring a provision for the further quartering of the forces in Boston and Castle Island, according to act of parliament. The next day the house of assembly, among other resolutions, passed the following:

"That a general discontent on account of the revenue acts, an expectation of a sudden arrival of a military power to enforce the said acts, an apprehension of the troops being quartered upon the inhabitants, the general court dissolved, the governor refusing to call a new one, and the people almost reduced to a state of despair, rendered it highly expedient and necessary for the people to convene by their committees; to associate, consult, and advise the best means to promote peace and good order; to present their united complaints to the throne; and jointly to pray for the royal interposition in favour of their violated rights—nor can this procedure possibly be illegal, as they expressly disclaim all governmental acts: that the establishment of a standing army in this colony, in time of peace, is an invasion of natural rights: that a standing army is not known as a part of the British constitution: that sending an armed force into the colony under pretence of assisting the civil authority, is highly dangerous to the people, unprecedented, and unconstitutional." On the 12th of July, the governor called on the court to answer, whether they would or would not make provision for the troops. The house, by message, after remarking on the mutiny or billeting act, answered, "As we cannot consistently with our own honour or interest, much less with the duty we owe to our constituents, so we never shall make any provision of funds for the purposes in your several messages." On the reception of this message, the governor prorogued the general court to the 10th of January, to meet at Boston.

On the 1st of August, Sir Francis Bernard was recalled. A few days before his departure, he received letters from the secretary of state, which, being circular to the several governors of the continent, were apparently intended to be made public. One of the last acts of his administration was his directing, or authorizing, the publication of the assurance to the people of the colonies in those letters, "that the administration is well disposed to relieve the colonies from all 'real' grievances arising from the late acts of revenue. And though the present ministers have concurred in the opinion of the whole legislature, that no measures ought to be taken which can derogate from the legislative authority of Great Britain over the colonies, yet they have declared, that they have at no time entertained a design to propose any further taxes upon America for the purpose of a revenue; and that it is their intention to propose, in the next session of parliament, to take off the duties upon glass, paper, and colours, upon consideration of such duties being contrary to the true principles of commerce."

* History of Massachusetts, p. 184.

Government in England expected, by this assurance of intended favour, to incline the people to abate their opposition. But it had a very different effect. It was immediately the common language among the advocates for liberty, "Repealing the act upon principles of commerce is a mere pretence, calculated to establish the grievance we complain of. The true reason why the duty upon tea is to continue, is to save the 'right' of taxing. Our acquiescing in the repeal of the rest will be construed into an acknowledgment of this 'right.' The fear of trouble, from the discontent of merchants and manufacturers upon our non-importation agreements, has brought the ministry to consent to this partial repeal. A vigorous enforcement of these agreements will increase the fear, and we shall certainly carry the point we contend for, and obtain the repeal of the whole." A meeting of the trading classes was called in Boston. The repeal of only part of the act was unanimously resolved to be a measure intended merely to quiet the manufacturers in Great Britain, and to prevent the setting up of manufactures in the colonies, and one that would by no means relieve trade from its difficulties; it was, therefore, further resolved, to send for no more goods from Great Britain, a few specified articles excepted, unless the revenue acts should be repealed. A committee was appointed to procure a written pledge from the inhabitants of the town not to purchase any goods from persons who have imported them, or who shall import them, contrary to the late agreement; and another committee to inspect the manifests of the cargoes of all vessels arriving from Great Britain, and to publish the names of all importers, unless they immediately delivered their goods into the hands of a committee appointed to receive them. In the midst of these proceedings, necessarily productive of considerable disorder, Governor Bernard left the administration to Lieutenant-governor Hutchinson, and embarked on board the Rippon, a man-of-war ordered from Virginia to receive him, and sailed for England. Instead of the marks of respect commonly shown, in a greater or less degree, to governors upon their leaving the province, there were many marks of public joy in the town of Boston. The bells were rung, guns were fired from Mr. Hancock's wharf, the liberty tree was covered with flags, and in the evening a great bonfire was made upon Fort Hill.*

The year 1770 is rendered important by the elevation of Lord North to the premiership. Having been chancellor of the exchequer in the Duke of Grafton's administration, on his grace's resignation, which took place in the end of January, he succeeded him as first lord of the treasury, a pre-eminence he held till the close of the American revolution. His administration will ever be celebrated by the fact, that during its existence Great Britain lost more territory and acquired more debt than in any previous period of her history. His first measure was partially, and unhappily only partially, of a conciliatory character—a motion for the repeal of the port duties of 1767, with the exception of the duty on tea, which his lordship expressly declared he desired to keep on as an assertion of the supremacy of the parliament. In vain it was contended that the reservation of this single article would keep up the contention which it was so desirable to allay; that after giving up the prospect of a revenue from the colonies, it was absurd and impolitic to persevere in the assertion of an abstract claim of right, which, if attempted in any mode to be carried into practice, would produce nothing but civil discord and interminable opposition; that, in short, if nothing more was meant by this omission of the tea in the repeal, than the mere declaration of parliamentary supremacy, the law already in existence, under the title of the Declaratory Act, was abundantly sufficient for that purpose, and that the Americans had hitherto silently acquiesced in that law. To all these arguments Lord North replied,—“Has the repeal of the stamp act taught the Americans obedience? Has our lenity inspired them with moderation? Can it be proper, while they deny our legal power to tax them, to acquiesce in the argument of illegality, and, by the repeal of the whole law, to give up that power? No! the most proper time to exert our right of taxation is when the right is denied. To temporize is to yield; and the authority of the mother country, if it is now unsupported, will, in reality, be relinquished for ever. A total repeal cannot be thought of, till America is prostrate at our feet.”

Governor Pownall, who moved, as an amendment, to include the duty on tea, acknowledged, that even the total repeal of the duties in question, though it might be expected to do much, would not restore satisfaction to America. “If,” said he, “it be asked, whether it will remove the apprehensions excited by your resolutions and address of the last year, for bringing to trial in England persons accused of treason in America, I answer, No. If it be asked, if this commercial concession would quiet the minds of the Americans as to the political doubts and fears which have struck them to the heart, throughout the continent, I answer, No. So long as they are left in doubt whether the habeas corpus act, whether the bill of rights, whether the common law as now existing in England, have any operation and effect in America, they cannot be satisfied. At this hour they know not whether the civil constitutions be not suspended and superseded by the establishment of a military force. The Americans think that they have, in return to all their applications, experienced a temper and disposition that is unfriendly, and that the enjoyment and exercise of the common rights of free-men have been refused to them. Never with these views will they solicit the favour of this house; never more will they wish to bring before parliament the grievances under which they conceive themselves to labour. Deeply as they feel, they suffer and endure with a determined and alarming silence; for their liberty they are under no apprehensions. It was first planted under the auspicious genius of the constitution; it has grown up into a verdant and flourishing tree; and should any severe strokes be aimed at the branches, and fate reduce it to the bare stock, it would only take deeper root, and spring out again more durable than before. They trust to Providence, and wait with firmness and fortitude the issue." The event proved that Mr. Pownall knew, incomparably better than Lord North, the character and state of the colonies. During his residence in America, while successively governor of two of the provinces, he acquired that knowledge which the British ministry could not, and some provincial governors would not, acquire. It might have been supposed that the very unsatisfactory result of the previous half-measures of this kind would have deterred any minister from a repetition of them. It displays as little knowledge of the construction of the human mind, as attention to the history of popular agitations, to intermingle professions of kindness with threats, or concessions with expressions of insult.

The colonies, however, would probably have assumed a less agitated aspect, had not other circumstances existed to ferment and perpetuate feelings of hostility. Among these, the introduction and maintenance of troops of the line in Boston was one of the most aggravating. The inhabitants felt that their presence was designed to overawe and control the expression of their sentiments, and the military appear to have viewed their residence in the town in the same light. Under the excitement that was thus occasioned, affrays were frequently occurring between the populace and the soldiers; and it would appear that, as might be expected, neither party conducted themselves with prudence or forbearance. On the one hand, the soldiers are represented as parading the town, armed with heavy clubs, insulting and seeking occasion to quarrel with the people;* while, on the other, the populace are declared to be the aggressors, and the military to have acted on the defensive.† Early in the evening of the 5th of March, the inhabitants were observed to assemble in different quarters of the town; parties of soldiers were also driving about the streets, as if both the one and the other had something more than ordinary upon their minds. About eight o'clock, one of the bells of the town was rung in such manner as is usual in case of fire. This called people into the streets. A large number assembled in the market-place, not far from King-street, armed with bludgeons, or clubs. A small fray between some of the inhabitants and the soldiers arose at or near the barracks at the west part of the town, but it was of little importance, and was soon over. A sentinel who was posted at the custom-house, not far from the main guard, was next insulted, and pelted with pieces of ice and other missiles, which caused him to call to the main guard to protect him. Notice was soon given to Captain Preston, whose company was then on guard, and a sergeant with six men was sent to protect the sentinel; but the captain, to prevent any precipitate action, followed them himself. There seem to have been but few people collected when the assault was first made on the sentinel; but the sergeant's guard drew a greater number together, and they were more insulted than the sentinel had been, and received frequent blows from snowballs and lumps of ice. Captain Preston thereupon ordered them to charge; but this was no discouragement to the assailants, who continued to pelt the guard, daring them to fire. Some of the people who were behind the soldiers, and observed the abuse of them, called on them to do so. At length one received a blow with a club, which brought him to the ground; but, rising again, he immediately fired, and all the rest, except one, followed the example. This seems, from the evidence on the trials and the observation of persons present, to have been the course of the material facts. Three men were killed, two mortally wounded, who died soon after, and several slightly wounded. The soldiers immediately withdrew to the main guard, which was strengthened by additional companies. Two or three of the persons who had seen the action ran to the lieutenant-governor's house, which was about half a mile distant, and begged he would go to King-street, where they feared a general action would come on between the troops and the inhabitants. He went immediately, and, to satisfy the people, called for Captain Preston, and inquired why he had fired upon the inhabitants without the direction of a civil magistrate. The noise was so great that his answer could not be understood; and some persons, who were apprehensive of the lieutenant-governor's danger from the general confusion, called out, "The town-house, the town-house!" when, with irresistible violence, he was forced up by the crowd into the council chamber. There demand was immediately made of him, to order the troops to withdraw from the town-house to their barracks. He refused; but calling from the balcony to the great body of people who remained in the street, he expressed his great concern at the unhappy event; assured them he would do every thing in his power to obtain a full and impartial inquiry, that the law might have its course; and advised them to go peaceably to their homes. Upon this there was a cry—"Home, home!" and a great part separated, and went home. He then signified his opinion to Lieutenant-Colonel Carr, that if the companies in arms were ordered to their barracks, the streets would be cleared, and the town in quiet for that night. Upon their retiring, the rest of the inhabitants, except those in the council chamber, retired also. Lieutenant-Colonel Dalrymple, at the desire of the lieutenant-governor, came to the council chamber, while several justices were examining persons who were present at the transactions of the evening. From the evidence it was apparent that the justices would commit Captain Preston, if taken. Several hours passed before he could be found, and the people suspected that he would not run the hazard of a trial; but at length he surrendered himself to a warrant for apprehending him, and, having been examined, was committed to prison. The next morning the soldiers who were upon guard surrendered also, and were committed. This was not sufficient to satisfy the people, and early in the forenoon they were in motion again. The lieutenant-governor caused his council to be summoned, and desired the two lieutenant-colonels of the regiments to be present. The select-men of Boston were waiting the lieutenant-governor's coming to council, and, being admitted, made their representation, that, from the contentions arising from the troops quartered in Boston, and above all, from the tragedy of the last night, the minds of the inhabitants were exceedingly disturbed; that they would presently be assembled in a town meeting; and that, unless the troops should be removed, the most terrible consequences were to be expected. The justices also of Boston and several of the neighbouring towns had assembled, and desired to signify their opinion, that it would not be possible to keep the people under restraint, if the troops remained in town. The lieutenant-governor acquainted both the select-men and the justices, that he had no authority to alter the place of destination of the king's troops; but that he expected the commanding officers of the two regiments, and would let them know the applications which had been made. Presently after their coming, a large committee from the town-meeting presented an address to the lieutenant-governor, declaring it to be the unanimous opinion of the meeting, that nothing could rationally be expected to restore the peace of the town, "and prevent blood and carnage," but the immediate removal of the troops. The committee withdrew into another room to wait for an answer. Some of the council urged the necessity of complying with the people's demand; but the lieutenant-governor declared that he would, upon no consideration whatever, give orders for their removal. Lieutenant-Colonel Dalrymple then signified, that, as the 29th regiment had originally been designed to be placed at the castle, and was now peculiarly obnoxious to the town, he was content that it should be removed to the castle, until the general's pleasure should be known. The committee was informed of this offer, and the lieutenant-governor rose from council, intending to receive no further application upon the subject; but the council prayed that he would meet them again in the afternoon, and Colonel Dalrymple desiring it also, he complied. Before the council met again, it had been intimated to them that the "desire" of the governor and council to the commanding officer to remove the troops, would cause him to do it, though he should receive no authoritative "order." As soon as they met, a committee from the town-meeting attended with a second message, to acquaint the lieutenant-governor that it was the unanimous voice of the people assembled, consisting, as they said, of near three thousand persons, that nothing less than a total and immediate removal of the troops would satisfy them.* Ultimately the scruples of the lieutenant-governor were overcome, and he expressed his desire that the troops should be wholly withdrawn from the town to the castle, which was accordingly done. The funeral of the victims was attended with extraordinary pomp. Most of the shops were closed, all the bells of the town tolled on the occasion, and the corpses were followed to the grave by an immense concourse of people, arranged six abreast, the procession being closed by a long train of carriages belonging to the principal gentry of the town.* Captain Preston and the party of soldiers were afterwards tried. The captain and six of the men were acquitted, and two were brought in guilty of manslaughter; a result which reflected great honour on John Adams and Josiah Quincy, the counsel for the prisoners, and on the jury.†

This disastrous occurrence infused additional spirit into the assembly of the province. Accumulated as the public business was, there having been but one session for eighteen months, the lieutenant-governor postponed the assembly from January, the time to which it had been prorogued by Governor Bernard, to the middle of March, and then ordered it to be convened at Cambridge. The reason which he gave for this measure was, that he had been so instructed by the British ministry. At the session in Cambridge, in his message to both houses respecting the state of the province, he said nothing to mitigate the alarm, or to alleviate the distress, of the people. His duty to the king, his royal master, he said, he was resolved faithfully to discharge; and he gave promises of a readiness to unite with the assembly in all proper measures for the welfare of the province; but of the recent tragical event he took no notice.

‡ "When complaints," said they, "are made of riots and tumults, it is the wisdom of government, and it becomes the representatives of the people especially, to inquire into the real causes of them. If they arise from oppression, as is often the case, a thorough redress of grievances will remove the cause, and, probably, put an end to the complaint. It may be justly said of the people of this province, that they seldom, if ever, have assembled in a tumultuous manner, unless they were oppressed. It cannot be expected that a people, accustomed to the freedom of the English constitution, will be patient while they are under the hand of tyranny and arbitrary power. They will discover their resentment in a manner which will naturally displease their oppressors; and in such a case, the severest laws and the most rigorous execution will be to little purpose. The most effectual method to restore tranquillity, would be to remove their burdens, and to punish all those who have been the procurers of their oppression. The instance your honour recommends to our attention, admitting it to be true, cannot be more threatening to government, than those enormities which have been known to be committed by the soldiery of late, and have strangely escaped punishment, though repeated, in defiance of the laws and authority of government. A military force posted among the people without their express consent, is itself one of the greatest grievances, and threatens the total subversion of a free constitution; much more, if designed to execute a system of corrupt and arbitrary power, and even to exterminate the liberties of the country. The bill of rights, passed immediately after the revolution (of 1688,) expressly declares, that the keeping of a standing army within the kingdom, in a time of peace, without the consent of the parliament, is against law: and we take this occasion to say, with freedom, that the keeping of a standing army, within this province, in a time of peace, without the consent of the general assembly, is equally against law. Yet we have seen a standing army procured, posted and kept within this province, in a time of profound peace, not only without the consent of the people, but against the remonstrance of both houses of assembly. Such a standing army must

A few days afterwards he sent a special message to inform the house of a trifling affray at Gloucester, in which a petty officer of the customs was said to have been abused; and called on them to afford assistance in bringing the agents to punishment. The reply of the house clearly indicated their deep sense of injury from their own executive government, as well as from the parent state, and the rapid strides they were making towards open resistance.‡ During a great part of this session, the house of representatives and the council were occupied with remonstrances against the removal of the general court to Cambridge. They contended, that law, usage, and convenience, were in favour of holding it in Boston; that the governor had a discretionary power respecting the place, to be exercised only when the public welfare required it in some peculiar exigency; and that it was highly improper and unjust for ministers to give instructions in the case, founded merely on political considerations. Protesting against the removal as unconstitutional, there being no necessity to justify it, and believing it was designed to harass the representatives of the people, whose deliberations and transactions ought to be perfectly free, they declined proceeding to public business. The lieutenant-governor insisted that he was bound be designed to subjugate the people to arbitrary measures. It is a most violent infraction of their natural and constitutional rights. It is an unlawful assembly, of all others the most dangerous and alarming; and every instance of its restraining the liberty of any individual, is a crime, which infinitely exceeds what the law intends by a riot. Surely, then, your honour cannot think this house can descend to the consideration of matters, comparatively trifling, while the capital of the province has so lately been in a state of actual imprisonment, and the government is under duress. We shall not enlarge on the multiplied outrages committed by this unlawful assembly, in frequently assaulting his majesty's peaceable and loyal subjects, in beating and wounding the magistrate when in the execution of his office; in rescuing prisoners out of the hands of justice; and finally, in perpetrating the most horrid slaughter of a number of the inhabitants, but a few days before the sitting of this assembly. Yet not the least notice has been taken of these outrageous offences; nor can we find the most distant allusion to the late inhuman and barbarous action, either in your speech at the opening of the session, or in this message to both houses. These violences, so frequently committed, added to the most rigorous and oppressive prosecutions, carried on against the subjects, grounded on unconstitutional acts, and in the courts of admiralty, uncontrolled by the courts of common law, have been justly alarming to the people. The disorder, which your honour so earnestly recommends to the consideration of the assembly, very probably took its rise from such provocations. The use, therefore, which we shall make of the information in your message, shall be to inquire into the grounds of the people's uneasiness, and to seek a radical redress of their grievances. Indeed, it is natural to expect that while the terror of arms continues in the province, the laws will be, in some degree, silent. But when the channels of justice shall be again opened, and the law can be heard, the person who has complained to your honour will have a remedy. We yet entertain hope, that the military power, so grievous to the people, will soon be removed from the province: till then, we have nothing to expect, but that tyranny and confusion will prevail, in defiance of the laws of the land, and the just and constitutional authority of government."

by his instructions; that his commission required it of him; and that it was competent for him at any time to fix the place, as well as the day, for the meeting of the general court. To this statement the house made a long, elaborate, and able reply; but the lieutenant-governor asserted his authority, and absolutely refused to yield to the request of the assembly. Such was the situation of public affairs, that the house concluded it the most prudent to proceed to consult upon the common concerns of the province; but resolved, "that they were induced thereto from absolute necessity," and declared, "that it was not to be considered as the renunciation of their claim to the legal right of sitting in general assembly, at its ancient place, the court-house in Boston." The general court closed its session in November by prorogation, after having resolved, among other things, to promote industry and frugality, and to encourage the use of domestic manufactures throughout the province; and having appointed a committee of correspondence to communicate with the agents in Great Britain, and with the committees of the colonies. The first of these resolutions of the Massachusetts assembly, namely, to discourage the use of foreign articles, had been adopted in consequence of a determination of the merchants of Boston, made during the present session, by which they agreed to alter their non-importation agreement, and to adopt the plan, which had been for some time followed in New York and in Philadelphia, of importing all the usual articles of trade, except tea, which it was unanimously agreed should not be brought into the country, unless it could be smuggled.*

During the year 1771, nothing of moment occurred either in Boston or the colonies. The encouragement given by the agreement of the merchants to smuggling, occasioned continual contests with revenue officers; and it appears that the magistrates, when appealed to, refused to interfere. One circumstance, however, transpired, which must not be omitted. Early in this year, Mr. Hutchinson received his appointment to the office of governor of Massachusetts, an office which his political opponents allege to have always been the darling object of his ambition; while he maintains, that, however, in ordinary times, he might have desired it, he now "determined not only to desire to be excused from the honour intended for him, but to be superseded in his place of lieutenant-governor; and he wrote to the secretary of state accordingly."†

sources of mutual animosity. The destruction of his majesty's revenue schooner, Gaspee, was one of those popular excesses which highly incensed the British ministry. Lieutenant Doddington, who commanded that vessel, had become very obnoxious to the inhabitants of Rhode Island, by his extraordinary zeal in the execution of the revenue laws. On the 9th of June, the Providence packet was sailing into the harbour of Newport, and Lieutenant Doddington thought proper to require the captain to lower his colours. This the captain of the packet deemed repugnant to his patriotic feelings, and the Gaspee fired at the packet to bring her to: the American, however, still persisted in holding on her course, and by keeping in shoal water, dexterously contrived to run the schooner aground in the chase. As the tide was upon the ebb, the Gaspee was set fast for the night, and afforded a tempting opportunity for retaliation; and a number of fishermen, aided and encouraged by some of the most respectable inhabitants of Providence, being determined to rid themselves of so uncivil an inspector, in the middle of the night manned several boats, and boarded the Gaspee. The lieutenant was wounded in the affray; but, with every thing belonging to him, he was carefully conveyed on shore, as were all his crew. The vessel, with her stores, was then burnt; and the party returned unmolested to their homes. When the governor became acquainted with this event, he offered a reward of five hundred pounds for the discovery of the offenders, and the royal pardon to those who would confess their guilt. Commissioners were appointed also to investigate the offence, and bring the perpetrators to justice; but, after remaining some time in session, they reported that they could obtain no evidence, and thus the affair terminated; a circumstance which forcibly illustrates the inviolable brotherhood which then united the people against the government.

While the conduct of the American populace thus continued to aggravate the exasperation of the British court, the measures of the government had an equal tendency to keep alive the feeling of hostility in the breasts of the Americans. It is vain, and unworthy of the character of any statesman, to urge that the measures adopted would not have given offence in other times; the enactment of laws will ever be regarded not with a view to the principles of abstract propriety, but to the immediate object for which they are promulgated. This plea, however, in extenuation of the plan of rendering the governor, judges, and other officers of the crown, independent of the general court, could only be raised* by persons inattentive (as, indeed, most English politicians appear to have been) to the political history of the colonies. The arrangement which was now ordered to be carried into effect, that the governor and other officers should receive their salaries from the crown, had hitherto been successfully opposed. The old contest on this subject was not yet forgotten, and the people, now greatly increased in numbers, were as little disposed as their ancestors to yield on this point. Opposition to this measure was not confined to the assembly, but numerous meetings of the people themselves in various towns were held on the subject. At these meetings, not only this particular measure, but all the late ministerial and parliamentary proceedings in relation to the colonies, were examined and discussed with great freedom and boldness. At the suggestion of Samuel Adams, a committee, consisting of twenty-one, was appointed "to state the rights of the colonies, and of this province in particular, as men, as Christians, and as subjects." This committee was also directed to publish the same to the several towns in the province, and to the world, as the sense of the town of Boston on the subject of their rights, with the various infringements and violations which had occurred. In this report, drawn with great ability, they claimed those natural and unalienable rights of man, with which no government could interfere without their consent. As British subjects, they claimed equal rights with their fellow-subjects in England, rights secured to them by the constitution. The Christian religion, they said, not only sanctioned their views of civil liberty, but, in spiritual concerns, secured to them all the freedom and self-direction which they and their fathers had long enjoyed. In their letter to the several towns, the committee tell their fellow-citizens, that they had abundant reason to apprehend that a plan of despotism had been concerted, and was hastening to a completion; that the late measures of administration had a direct tendency to deprive them of every thing valuable as men, as Christians, and as subjects entitled to the rights of native Britons. "We are not afraid of poverty," say the committee, in conclusion, "but we disdain slavery. Let us consider we are struggling for our best birthrights and inheritance, which, being infringed, renders all our blessings precarious in their enjoyment, and trifling in their value." Most of the towns held meetings, appointed committees of correspondence, and passed resolutions similar to those of Boston, and some of them even in still bolder language.† These proceedings greatly alarmed the governor and his political friends, who had hoped that the opposition to the British ministry would gradually cease; and that, through fear of ministerial and royal resentment, the people would be induced to submit.‡ After the votes and the circular address of Boston were adopted, and before the other towns had meetings to act upon them, endeavours were made in many places to prevent the people from approving the statement and report of the patriots in the capital. But these attempts were generally without effect. There were in every town some intelligent men, who perfectly understood the nature of the dispute with Great Britain, and who saw the evil tendency of the claims of administration to govern the colonies. "They were," says Mr. Bradford, "also a sober, moral, and religious people, who were actuated by principle; and who, while they contended earnestly for that portion of liberty secured to them by their charter, and which they had long enjoyed, were indisposed to all unconstitutional means of redress."§ In his speech at the opening of the assembly, in January, 1773, the governor declared these meetings of the inhabitants to be unwarrantable and of dangerous tendency; and he called upon the assembly "to join in discountenancing such irregularities and innovations." Alluding to these proceedings, and to the disordered state of the province, he says, "at length the constitution has been called in question, and the authority of the parliament of Great Britain to make and establish laws for the inhabitants of this province has been by many denied." He maintained in the most explicit manner the supremacy of parliament over the colonies, agreeably to the principles of the declaratory act; and his speech was conceived to be a challenge to the assembly on the great question between the two countries. This drew answers from the council and house in vindication of the proceedings

‡ Mr. Hutchinson himself states that he "was greatly alarmed with so sudden and unexpected a change in the state of affairs; and he was greatly perplexed with doubts concerning his own conduct upon the occasion. He had avoided engaging in a dispute upon the authority of parliament, having good reason to think, that administration in England expected that the colonies would return to their former state of submission to this authority, by lenient measures, without discussing points of right; and he knew that great pains had been taken to persuade the people in England, as well as the ministry, that this was all the people in America expected or desired; and that suspicions of other views, either in the body of the people, or in men who had influence over them, were groundless, and had been caused by misrepresentations of governors, and other crown officers in the colonies, in order to promote their own sinister views. But now, a measure was engaged in, which, if pursued to effect, must cause, not a return of the colonies to their former submission, but a total separation from the kingdom, by their independency upon parliament, the only band which could keep them united to it."—Hutchinson's History, p. 370.

of the towns, and of the rights of the colonies, and of Massachusetts in particular; to these the governor replied, and to this reply both the council and house rejoined. These state papers, as they may be justly called, were drawn with no ordinary ability on both sides. The governor was a gentleman of talents, as well as research, and no one was better acquainted with the history of the province over which he presided. The answers of the council and house were prepared by committees composed of men of the first talents in the assembly. They evinced not only a thorough knowledge of the rights of the colonists generally, but of their own provincial history, and the various controversies that had subsisted between the parent country and the people of Massachusetts from their first settlement, as well as the views entertained and expressed at different times by their ancestors on the subject of their rights.

Active resistance to the measures of the British government in relation to the colonies, had for some time been principally confined to Massachusetts. The other colonists, however, had not been idle or indifferent spectators of the scenes that had passed in Massachusetts. The leading patriots of America, no doubt, now began seriously to contemplate the mighty struggle to which the present state of things must finally lead. The parent country seemed determined not to relax, and the colonists were equally determined not to submit. To remain long in their present state seemed impossible; and in the event of an opposition by force, unity of action, as well as of sentiment, was all important. To promote this object, the house of burgesses in Virginia originated what ultimately proved a powerful engine of resistance—a committee for corresponding with the legislatures of the several colonies. It was resolved that it should be the business of this committee, “to obtain the most early and authentic intelligence of such acts and resolutions of the British parliament, or proceedings of administration, as may relate to or affect the British colonies; and to keep up and maintain a correspondence and communication with our sister colonies, respecting these important considerations, and the result of their proceedings from time to time, to lay before the house.” It was also resolved, “that the speaker of this house do transmit to the speakers of the different assemblies of the British colonies on this continent, copies of the said resolutions, and desire that they will lay them before their respective assemblies, and request them to appoint some person or persons, of their respective bodies, to communicate from time to time with the said committee.” The request of Virginia was complied with by the different assemblies; and by this means a confidential communication and interchange of opinions was kept up between the colonies.

The appointment of Lord Dartmouth in the room of Lord Hillsborough, as secretary of state for the American department, a person supposed to be more favourable to the colonies, revived the hopes of the colonists for a reconciliation on terms compatible with their rights. Animated with these hopes, both houses of the Massachusetts assembly addressed a letter to the new secretary, in which they declare they should “rejoice at the restoration of the harmony and good will that once subsisted between the parent state and them.” This happiness, however, they should expect in vain, they observed, during the continuance of their grievances, and while their chartered rights, one after another, were wrested from them. “If your lordship should condescend to ask,” they say, “what are the measures of restoring the harmony so much desired, we should answer, in a word, that we are humbly of opinion, if things were brought to the general state in which they stood at the conclusion of the late war, it would restore the happy harmony which at that time subsisted;” and, in conclusion, they most earnestly request his lordship’s influence in bringing about this happy event. But to retrace their steps was too humiliating to the pride of the British cabinet and nation. A change of men did not produce a change of principles, or any permanent change of measures.

The British government, having determined to carry into execution the duty on tea, attempted to effect by policy what was found to be impracticable by constraint. The measures of the colonists had already produced such a diminution of exports from Great Britain, that the warehouses of the East India Company contained about seventeen millions of pounds of tea, for which a market could not readily be procured. The unwillingness of that company to lose their commercial profits, and of the ministry to lose the expected revenue from the sale of the tea in America, led to a compromise for the security of both. The East India Company were authorized by law to export their tea, free of duties, to all places whatever; by which regulation, tea, though loaded with an exceptionable duty, would come cheaper to America than before it had been made a source of revenue. The crisis now approached, when the colonies were to decide whether they would submit to be taxed by the British parliament, or practically support their own principles, and meet the consequences. One sentiment appears to have pervaded the entire continent. The new ministerial plan was universally considered as a direct attack on the liberties of the colonists, which it was the duty of all to oppose. A violent ferment was every where excited; the corresponding committees were extremely active and it was very generally declared, that whoever should, directly or indirectly, countenance this dangerous invasion of their rights, would be an enemy to his country. The East India Company, confident of finding a market for their tea, reduced as it now was in its price, freighted several ships to the colonies with that article, and appointed agents for the disposal of it. Cargoes were sent to New York, Philadelphia, Charleston, and Boston. The inhabitants of New York and Philadelphia sent the ships back to London, "and they sailed up the Thames to proclaim to all the nation that New York and Pennsylvania would not be enslaved." The inhabitants of Charleston unloaded the tea, and stored it in cellars, where it could not be used, and where it finally perished.

At Boston, before the vessels arrived with it, a town-meeting was called to devise measures to prevent the landing and sale within the province. The agreement not to use tea while a duty was imposed, was now solemnly renewed; and a committee was chosen to request the consignees of the East India Company neither to sell nor unlade the tea which should be brought into the harbour. They communicated the wishes of the town to the merchants, who were to have the custody and sale of the tea; but they declined making any such promise, as they had received no orders or directions on the subject. On the arrival of the vessels with the tea in the harbour of Boston, another meeting of the citizens was immediately called. "The hour of destruction," it was said, "or of manly opposition, had now come;" and all who were friends to the country were invited to attend, "to make a united and successful resistance to this last and worst measure of the administration." A great number of people assembled from the adjoining towns, as well as from the capital, in the celebrated Faneuil Hall, the usual place of meeting on such occasions, but the meeting was soon adjourned to one of the largest churches in the town. Here it was voted, as it had been at a meeting before the tea arrived, that they would use all lawful means to prevent its being landed, and to have it returned immediately to England. After several days spent in negotiations, the consignees still refused to return the tea, and, fearing the vengeance of an injured people, they retired to the castle. The owner of the ship which brought the tea was unable to obtain a pass for her sailing, as the officer was in the interest of the British ministers. Application was then made to the governor, to order that a pass be given for the vessel; but he declined interfering in the affair. When it was found no satisfactory arrangement could be effected, the meeting broke up; but, late in the evening, a number of men, disguised as Mohawk Indians, proceeded to the vessels, then lying at the wharf, which had the tea on board, and in a short time every chest was taken out, and the contents thrown into the sea; but no injury was done to any other part of their cargoes. The inhabitants of the town, generally, had no knowledge of the event until the next day. It is supposed, the number of those concerned in the affair was about fifty; but who they were has been only a matter of conjecture to the present day.

This act of violence, which, in its effects, rapidly advanced the grand crisis, appears rather to have been the result of cool determination, than of a sudden ebullition. The populace appear to have been fully warned by their leaders as to the important consequences which would result from any destruction of the property of the East India Company. "One of the citizens,* equally distinguished as a statesman and a patriot," says Bradford, "addressed the meeting with unusual warmth and solemnity. He seemed deeply impressed with a sense of the serious consequences of their proceedings on this interesting occasion. The spirit then displayed, and the sentiments then avowed, he warned them, should be such as they would be ready to approve and maintain at any future day. For, to retreat from the ground they should then take, would bring disgrace on themselves, and ruin on the country." That Mr. Quincy did not overrate the importance of that memorable day, will be very apparent in the sequel.

CHAPTER IV.

THE REVOLUTION.—FROM THE BOSTON PORT BILL TO THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

THE British ministry appear to have been highly gratified that the town of Boston, which they ever regarded as the focus of sedition in America, had rendered itself, by the violent destruction of the property of the East India Company, obnoxious to their severest vengeance. On the 7th of March, Lord North presented a message from his majesty to both houses of parliament, in which it was stated, that, "in consequence of the unwarrantable practices carried on in North America, and particularly of the violent and outrageous proceedings at the town and port of Boston, with a view of obstructing the commerce of this kingdom, and upon grounds and pretences immediately subversive of its constitution, it was thought fit to lay the whole matter before parliament, recommending it to their serious consideration what further regulations or permanent provisions might be necessary to be established." The minister, on presenting the papers, represented the conduct of Boston in the darkest colours. He said, "that the utmost lenity on the part of the governor, perhaps too much, had been already shown; and that this town, by its late proceedings, had left government perfectly at liberty to adopt any measures they should think convenient, not only for redressing the wrong sustained by the East India Company, but for inflicting such punishment as their factious and criminal conduct merited; and that the aid of parliament would be resorted to for this purpose, and for vindicating the honour of the crown, so daringly and wantonly attacked and contemned." In reply to the royal message, the house voted, "that an address of thanks should be presented to the king, assuring his majesty that they would not fail to exert every means in their power of effectually providing for the due execution of the laws, and securing the dependence of the colonies upon the crown and parliament of Great Britain." In a few days a bill was introduced "for the immediate removal of the officers concerned in the collection of customs from Boston, and to discontinue the landing and discharging, lading and shipping of goods, wares, and merchandise, at Boston, or within the harbour thereof." The bill also levied a fine upon the town, as a compensation to the East India Company for the destruction of their teas, and was to continue in force during the pleasure of the king. The opposition to this measure was very slight, and it was finally carried in both houses without a division.

This, however, was only a part of Lord North's scheme of coercion. He proposed two other bills, which were intended to strike terror into the province of Massachusetts, and to deter the other colonies from following her example. By one of these, the constitution and charter of the province were completely subverted, all power taken out of the hands of the people, and placed in those of the servants of the crown. The third scheme of Lord North was the introduction of "a bill for the impartial administration of justice in Massachusetts." By this act, persons informed against or indicted for any act done for the support of the laws of the revenue, or for the suppression of riots in Massachusetts, might, by the governor, with the advice of the council, be sent for trial to any other colony, or to Great Britain; an enactment which, in effect, conferred impunity on the officers of the crown, however odious might be their violations of the law.

Some distinguished statesmen opposed these plans of administration with great eloquence and zeal. The celebrated Burke declared that "it was only oppressive and unjust laws which the people had opposed; that it was most unreasonable to condemn them without a hearing; and that constitutional principles were not to be settled by the military arm." Pownall observed, that "it was no longer a matter of opinion with the citizens of Massachusetts; that things had come to action; that the Americans would resist all attempts to coerce them, and were prepared to do it; and that if there should be a rebellion in that province, the question would be, who caused it?" The Duke of Richmond, the Marquis of Rockingham, and other peers, insisted that the charter was a solemn contract, which neither the king nor parliament could justly annul or alter, without the consent of the subjects in Massachusetts, unless they had forfeited their rights by an infraction of its provisions. Lord Chatham also opposed these plans of the administration with all his former energy and spirit; although at this time he was in such a debilitated state that he seldom took part in the debates in parliament. He declared himself most decidedly in favour of conciliatory measures; for he was of opinion that the province had been oppressed, and the liberties of the subject therein most flagrantly violated. He believed that just measures on the part of ministers would quiet the colonies, and restore harmony between them and the parent state. He denounced the proposed system as unconstitutional and tyrannical, and predicted that the people of Massachusetts would never submit to such palpable and repeated violations of their political rights. Colonel Barre also addressed the ministry on the last bill, in the following bold and energetic language: "You have changed your ground. You are becoming the aggressors, and offering the last of human outrages to the people of America, by subjecting them to military execution. Instead of sending them the olive branch, you have sent the naked sword. By the olive branch, I mean a repeal of all the late laws, fruitless to you, and oppressive to them. Ask their aid in a constitutional manner, and they will give it to the utmost of their ability. They never yet refused it, when properly required. Your journals bear the recorded acknowledgments of the zeal with which they have contributed to the general necessities of the state. What madness is it that prompts you to attempt obtaining that by force, which you may more certainly procure by requisition? They may be flattered into any thing, but they are too much like yourselves to be driven. Have some indulgence for your own likeness; respect their sturdy English virtue; retract your odious exertions of authority; and remember, that the first step toward making them contribute to your wants, is to reconcile them to your government."

These measures of the British ministry originated partly in mistaken views of the opinions and temper of the people. Great misrepresentations had been made for several years to the administration in England, respecting the state of the colonies. It was declared by the officers of the crown and some other individuals, that it was only a few ambitious persons who objected to the policy of the parent state, while the friends and agents of the people were not permitted to be heard in their attempts to show the general dissatisfaction. It is also true that Lord North, and several other members of the British cabinet at this period, possessed high notions of the supremacy of parliament, and of the sovereign power of the king: the more correct and just principles of civil liberty, recognised in 1689, and still received by many eminent statesmen in England, were not in fashion with the court party. Assuming the doctrine of the supreme and unlimited authority of parliament over all parts of the empire, (which, in a certain sense, restricted and qualified, however, by great constitutional principles, had been generally admitted in the colonies,) ministers insisted that the power of the parent government was entirely without control; and contended for the legitimacy of measures which the patriots in both countries considered most arbitrary, and wholly destructive of the liberties of the subject. With these views of government, they maintained that any measures were justifiable for supporting the authority of the king and parliament; and they calculated upon bringing the refractory and disaffected to ready submission by severity and force. It will soon be apparent, however, that it was not a faction in Boston by which opposition was kept alive in America; and that through this and the other provinces but one sentiment prevailed as to the oppressive and arbitrary conduct of the parent government, and one determination to oppose and prevent the continuance of such a system of policy.

Notwithstanding these successive measures, from which such important results were professedly expected, it is evident that the government entertained serious apprehensions that an appeal to arms was by no means improbable. The English cabinet sought, therefore, to ingratiate themselves with the newly acquired province of Canada, and the proceedings they adopted with this view appear to have been the only measures which were characterized by the slightest indications of wisdom. The Canadian noblesse had enjoyed great authority under the dominion of their native country, and they had recently been complaining of the abridgment of their privileges, while the inhabitants, who were chiefly catholic, had been viewing with jealousy the superior privileges of the protestants;* Lord North, therefore, did not suffer the session to close without introducing a bill calculated to insure the affections of the Canadians. It erected a legislative council, nominated by the crown, on whom very extensive powers were conferred, which was highly gratifying to the Canadian nobility; the catholic clergy were established in their privileges, and a perfect equality between their religion and that of protestants was established; the French laws were confirmed, and trial without jury permitted in all except criminal cases. To afford a wider field for ministerial manœuvres, the limits of the province of Quebec were extended to the river Ohio. To these prudent concessions to the sentiments of the Canadians may be attributed, in a great measure, the singular fact of their remaining attached to the British government during the revolutionary contest, when it might not unreasonably have been anticipated that they would have been the first to throw off a foreign yoke, and declare their independence.

As a measure indicative of a determination to conduct the proceedings against the refractory colonists with the utmost vigour, General Gage was appointed, with powers of the most unlimited extent, to supersede Governor Hutchinson. The offices of governor of the province of Massachusetts and commander of his majesty's forces in America were united in his person. The intelligence of the passing of the Boston port bill had preceded General Gage a few days. The new governor, though it appeared that he entertained serious apprehensions of some disorderly or disrespectful conduct on the part of the people, was received by them with every mark of civility. He had soon occasion to perceive, however, that their politeness to him did not proceed from any fear of his authority, or from any relaxation in their purposes of resistance. On the day after his arrival, the general court having been dissolved by the late governor, a town-meeting was convened and very numerous attended. They declared and resolved,

* Botta, edit. Franc., vol. i. p. 270.

"That the impolicy, injustice, inhumanity, and cruelty of the act, exceed all their powers of expression; and, therefore," they say, "we leave it to the censure of others, and appeal to God and the world."* They also declared it as their opinion, that, "if the other colonies come into a joint resolution to stop all importations from, and exportation to, Great Britain, and every part of the West Indies, till the act be repealed, the same would prove the salvation of North America and her liberties."

The idea was probably entertained by the British ministry, that the other colonies would be inclined rather to avail themselves of the commercial advantages which the closing of one of the chief sea-ports would open to them, than to make common cause with Boston, at the hazard of incurring a similar penalty. In this instance, as in most others, the government made a great miscalculation of the American character. The several colonies lost no time in expressing the deepest sympathy for the sufferings of the inhabitants of Boston, and in contributing to their pecuniary necessities, as well as in affording them moral countenance. In this patriotic course Virginia took the lead: her house of burgesses was in session when the act arrived, and they proceeded to pass an order, which, for the sentiments it expresses, well deserves to be introduced at length.

"Tuesday, the 24th of May, 14 Geo. III. 1774.

"This house being deeply impressed with apprehension of the great dangers to be derived to British America, from the hostile invasion of the city of Boston, in our sister colony of Massachusetts Bay, whose commerce and harbour are, on the first day of June next, to be stopped by an armed force, deem it highly necessary that the said first day of June next be set apart by the members of this house, as a day of fasting, humiliation, and prayer, devoutly to implore the Divine interposition for averting the heavy calamity which threatens destruction to our civil rights, and the evils of civil war; to give us one heart and one mind, firmly to oppose, by all just and proper means, every injury to American rights; and that the minds of his majesty and his parliament may be inspired from above with wisdom, moderation, and justice, to remove from the loyal people of America all cause of danger, from a continued pursuit of measures pregnant with their ruin.

"Ordered, therefore, That the members of this house do attend in their places, at the hour of ten in the forenoon, on the said first day of June next, in order to proceed with the speaker and the mace to the church in this city, for the purposes aforesaid; and that the Rev. Mr. Price be appointed to read prayers, and to preach a sermon suitable to the occasion."

In consequence of this order, Governor Dunmore on the following day dissolved the house, with this brief speech:

"Mr. Speaker, and gentlemen of the house of burgesses:—I have in my hand a paper published by order of your house, conceived in such terms as reflect highly upon his majesty and the parliament of Great Britain, which makes it necessary to dissolve you, and you are dissolved accordingly."

The members immediately withdrew to the Raleigh tavern, where they formed themselves into a committee to consider of the most expedient and necessary measures to guard against the encroachments which so glaringly threatened them, and immediately adopted the following spirited declaration:

"An association, signed by eighty-nine members of the late house of burgesses. We, his majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the late representatives of the good people of this country, having been deprived, by the sudden interposition of the executive part of this government, from giving our countrymen the advice we wished to convey to them, in a legislative capacity, find ourselves under the hard necessity of adopting this, the only method we have left, of pointing out to our countrymen such measures as, in our opinion, are best fitted to secure our dear rights and liberty from destruction, by the heavy hand of power now lifted against North America. With much grief

* "The Boston port bill," says Mr. Quincy, in his celebrated observations on the act, "condemns a whole town unheard, nay, uncited to answer; involves thousands in ruin and misery, without the suggestion of any crime by them committed; and it is so constituted, that enormous pains and penalties must ensue, notwithstanding the most perfect obedience to its injunctions. The destruction of the tea, which took place without any illegal procedure of the town, is the only alleged ground of consigning thousands of its inhabitants to ruin, misery, and despair. Those charged with the most aggravated crimes are not punishable, till arraigned before disinterested judges, heard in their own defence, and found guilty of the charge; but here a whole people are accused, prosecuted by they know not whom, tried they know not when, proved guilty they know not how, and sentenced to suffer inevitable ruin. Their hard fate cannot be averted by the most servile submission, the most implicit obedience to this statute. The first intimation of it was on the 10th of May, and it took place on the 1st of June, thence to continue in full force, till it shall sufficiently appear to his majesty, that full satisfaction hath been made by, or in behalf of the inhabitants of Boston, to the East India Company, for the damage sustained by the destruction of their tea; and until it shall be certified to his majesty, by the governor or lieutenant-governor of the province, that reasonable satisfaction has been made to the officers of the revenue and others, for the riots and insurrections mentioned in it. So short a space is given for staying the torrent of threatened evils, that the subject, though exerting his utmost energy, must be overwhelmed and driven to madness by terms of deliverance, which deny relief till his ruin is inevitable."—Pittkin, vol. i. p. 270

we find, that our dutiful applications to Great Britain for the security of our just, ancient, and constitutional rights, have been not only disregarded, but that a determined system is formed and pressed, for reducing the inhabitants of British America to slavery, by subjecting them to the payment of taxes, imposed without the consent of the people or their representatives; and that, in pursuit of this system, we find an act of the British parliament, lately passed, for stopping the harbour and commerce of the town of Boston, in our sister colony of Massachusetts Bay, until the people there submit to the payment of such unconstitutional taxes; and which act most violently and arbitrarily deprives them of their property, in wharves erected by private persons, at their own great and proper expense; which act is, in our opinion, a most dangerous attempt to destroy the constitutional liberty and rights of all North America. It is further our opinion, that as tea, on its importation into America, is charged with a duty imposed by parliament, for the purpose of raising a revenue without the consent of the people, it ought not to be used by any person who wishes well to the constitutional rights and liberties of British America. And whereas the India Company have ungenerously attempted the ruin of America, by sending many ships loaded with tea into the colonies, thereby intending to fix a precedent in favour of arbitrary taxation, we deem it highly proper, and do accordingly recommend it strongly to our countrymen, not to purchase or use any kind of East India commodity whatsoever, except saltpetre and spices, until the grievances of America are redressed. We are further clearly of opinion, that an attack made on one of our sister colonies, to compel submission to arbitrary taxes, is an attack made on all British America, and threatens ruin to the rights of all, unless the united wisdom of the whole be applied. And for this purpose it is recommended to the committee of correspondence, that they communicate with their several corresponding committees, on the expediency of appointing deputies from the several colonies of British America, to meet in general congress, at such place, annually, as shall be thought most convenient; there to deliberate on those general measures which the united interests of America may from time to time require. A tender regard for the interest of our fellow-subjects, the merchants and manufacturers of Great Britain, prevents us from going further at this time; most earnestly hoping, that the unconstitutional principle of taxing the colonies without their consent will not be persisted in, thereby to compel us, against our will, to avoid all commercial intercourse with Britain. Wishing them and our people free and happy, we are their affectionate friends, the late representatives of Virginia.

"The 27th day of May, 1774."

To give effect to the recommendation of a congress on the part of this colony, delegates were shortly after elected by the several counties, to meet at Williamsburgh on the 1st of August following, to consider further of the state of public affairs, and, more particularly, to appoint deputies to the general congress, which was to be convened at Philadelphia on the 5th of September following. The clear, firm, and animated instructions given by the people of the several counties to their delegates, evince the thorough knowledge of the great parliamentary question which now pervaded the country, and the determined spirit of the colonists to resist the claim of British taxation.

Similar expressions of determined opposition to the port bill, and assurances of support to the disfranchised citizens of Boston, were made wherever the act became known. In some places it was printed upon mourning paper, and hawked about the streets; in others it was publicly burned, with every demonstration of abhorrence. At New York there was a considerable struggle between the friends of administration and the friends of liberty, but the latter at length prevailed by the influence and management of two individuals, who had on several occasions manifested great activity and zeal in their opposition to the obnoxious measures of the ministry. Addresses were also sent from Pennsylvania, the Carolinas, and some other provinces, to the committee of Boston, assuring them of support, and declaring that they considered the cause of Boston as the common cause of the country.

With all these assurances of support and assistance, of sympathy and affection, from their sister colonies, there was still a fearful foreboding in the hearts of the members of the general court, when they assembled at Boston on the 25th of May. Nor was this apprehension lessened by the first official acts of their new governor. At the opening of the court he gave the representatives notice, that, in a few days, he should remove them to Salem; and he also gave his negative to thirteen of the council chosen by the assembly.* The representatives of the people at this critical juncture did not shrink from the high and imperative duties which devolved upon them in defence of political freedom. They had been selected under the belief that a most important crisis was approaching. They adopted resolutions, recommending to the citizens of Boston to be firm and patient, to the people through the province to assist their brethren in the metropolis, and to all to refrain entirely from the use of British goods, and of other foreign articles subject to a duty; conceiving this to be a lawful and most efficient means of convincing the parent government of their opposition to the recent oppressive measures, and of prevailing on ministers to relax in their arbitrary and severe conduct towards Massachusetts. They also requested the governor to appoint a day for public religious worship and prayer. And as he declined doing it, they recommended the observance of a particular day for that solemn service, in imitation of their pious ancestors, who, on all occasions of public distress and danger, humbly sought to the Almighty for guidance and protection. But the most important measure adopted at this eventful period, and in preparing which a large committee was occupied through the greater part of the session, was that of choosing five members of the house as delegates to a general continental congress; and of giving immediate information thereof to all the other colonies, with a request that they would appoint deputies for the same purpose. A measure of this kind had been already suggested, both in Massachusetts and in several of the other colonies, but nothing definite or decisive had been done; nor had any committees or deputies been elected with this design.* The patriots in this province were convinced that the time had arrived for a more efficient and united stand in defence of their rights. They did not, however, even now, contemplate independence; but they were resolved to show the British ministry that a determination prevailed through all the colonies to oppose their arbitrary and oppressive plans of governing America; hoping, probably, for a new administration, whose views would be more conciliatory and just. The preamble to the resolution for choosing delegates to meet in a general congress states concisely the reason which induced the house to adopt this important measure. It was as follows:—

“This house, having duly considered, and being deeply affected with the unhappy differences which have long subsisted and are increasing between Great Britain and the American colonies, are of opinion, that a meeting of committees from the several colonies on this continent is highly expedient and necessary, to consult upon the present state of the country, and the miseries to which we are and must be reduced by the operation of certain acts of parliament; and to deliberate and determine upon wise and proper measures, to be by them recommended to all the colonies, for the recovery and establishment of our just rights and liberties, civil and religious; and the restoration of union and harmony between Great Britain and America, which is most ardently desired by all good men.’

While the house were engaged in considering this measure, the governor received notice of their design from one of the members politically attached to him, and immediately directed that they should be dissolved. The door-keeper was ordered to admit no person into the house; but soon after the secretary proceeded, by his excellency’s command, to the door of the room in which the representatives were sitting, and read a proclamation for dissolving the assembly; and when the resolutions were adopted respecting the delegates to congress, and an order was passed for their compensation, the house separated. In this measure, it was easy to perceive the commencement of a general and open opposition to the parent government; which, without either a great change in the policy of the English cabinet, or servile submission on the part of the colonies, through an apprehension of a more wretched condition under a powerful military force, would produce a struggle, to be determined only by superior physical power.

The two last of the coercive enactments of the British legislature, did not reach Boston till July. By one, the governor alone was authorized to appoint all civil officers; and by the other, the counsellors were to be selected by the king and his ministers in England. A list of those appointed was soon made known, and gave great dissatisfaction, as they were the most unpopular characters in the province. To add to the anxiety which now pervaded every breast, a large military force was ordered into the province, an act of parliament having been passed, which directed the governor to provide quarters for them in any town he might choose. “Thus the charter, the palladium of their rights and privileges, under the shelter of which they had formerly felt themselves safe, at least from systematic tyranny, was wantonly violated by the arbitrary will of a favourite minister. They were to be governed entirely by strangers, and those in whom they had no confidence; and foreign mercenaries were provided to stifle the murmurs occasioned by oppression, and to check the efforts of a generous patriotism, which ministerial threats had not been able to silence or prevent. The intelligent citizens, who composed the committees of correspondence, and others distinguished by their activity and firmness, were openly threatened by the servile tools of despotism, and marked out as victims to appease a tyrannical administration. But, happily for their countrymen, and happily for posterity, they were not moved from their high purpose by the menaces of the corrupt or powerful. Satisfied of the justice of their cause, they resolved to attempt every thing, and hazard every thing for its support."^{*}

It had been agreed by the delegates which had now been appointed by most of the colonies, that they should meet in general congress in September; and the desire to await the result of its determinations prevented any violent proceedings during the interim; while, however, great attention was given by the inhabitants to military discipline. Independent companies were formed, who elected their own officers, many of whom had served during the French war, and were well able to instruct their pupils in military tactics. On the other hand, General Gage was no less active in adopting measures calculated, in his estimation, to overawe the inhabitants, and to deter them from having recourse to force. With this view, although ostensibly for the purpose of preventing desertion, he fortified the isthmus which connects Boston with the main land, called Boston Neck, the only entrance by land into the town of Boston, and therefore the only route by which, according to the port bill, the merchants and traders could carry on their business. This measure, however, served only the more to exasperate the people, and the subsequent seizure of the gunpowder at Charlestown, added to their alarm.

Before day-break, on the 1st of September, General Gage despatched a party of soldiers to bring into his own custody a quantity of provincial powder from the arsenal at Charlestown. Immediately this transaction became generally known; the inhabitants of the neighbouring towns flew to arms, and agreed on Cambridge as a general rendezvous; and it was with great difficulty that they were dissuaded, by their more prudent leaders, from marching at once to Boston, to require the restoration of the powder, or, in case of refusal, to attack the garrison. Their presence at Cambridge, however, induced several gentlemen to resign their appointments as counsellors under the late act of parliament, and to declare they would not take any part in carrying into execution the obnoxious measures of the ministry. Before the agitation occasioned by this movement was tranquillized, a rumour was, probably not without design, rapidly circulated throughout the whole province, that the garrison and fleet were firing on the town of Boston; and in a few hours between thirty and forty thousand men, of all arms, were in motion towards the capital; and although they retired when satisfied of the falsity of the rumour, the readiness with which so powerful a demonstration of physical force was effected, gave additional boldness to the leaders of the patriotic cause.

It was under the excitement of these circumstances that, in defiance of the act of parliament, and the governor's proclamation founded upon it, prohibiting public assemblies, the county of Suffolk, of which Boston was the capital, elected delegates to meet for the purpose of taking into consideration the most proper course to be adopted in the present state of affairs. With a boldness and decision surpassing that of any former assembly, they passed resolutions declaring themselves constitutionally exempt from all obedience to the late measures of the British parliament, that the government of the province was in fact dissolved, and that they should consider all persons who dared to act in any official capacity under the new regulations as open enemies of their country. They sent a copy of their resolutions, and of their letter to the governor, with his answer, to the general congress, upon whose judgment they rested the decision of their future conduct.

This congress, which will ever be celebrated in the page of history, and held sacred in the annals of liberty, met at Philadelphia, on the 5th of September. Representatives from eleven of the colonies were present at the opening, and those from North Carolina arrived shortly after; Georgia alone having demurred to send delegates. Peyton Randolph, of Virginia, was elected president, and Charles Thompson, of Philadelphia, secretary; and after a brief controversy on the mode of voting, which resulted in the determination that each province should have only one vote, whatever number of delegates might be present, the assembly proceeded to business with all the solemnity of an organized legislature. "The most eminent men of the various colonies were now, for the first time, brought together. They were known to each other by fame, but they were personally strangers. The meeting was awfully solemn. The object which had called them together was of incalculable magnitude. The liberties of no less than three millions of people, with that of all their posterity, were staked on the wisdom and energy of their councils. No wonder, then, at the long and deep silence which is said to have followed upon their organization; at the anxiety with which the members looked round upon each other; and the reluctance which every individual felt to open a business so fearfully momentous. In the midst of this deep and death-like silence, and just when it was beginning to become painfully embarrassing, Mr. Henry arose slowly, as if borne down by the weight of the subject. After faltering, according to his habit, through a most impressive exordium, in which he merely echoed back the consciousness of every other heart, in deploring his inability to do justice to the occasion, he launched gradually into a recital of the colonial wrongs.—Rising, as he advanced, with the grandeur of his subject, and glowing at length with all the majesty of the occasion, his speech seemed more than that of mortal man.* Mr. Henry was followed by Mr. Richard Henry Lee, in a speech scarcely less powerful, and still more replete with classic eloquence. One spirit of ardent love of liberty pervaded every breast, and produced a unanimity as advantageous to the cause they advocated, as it was unexpected and appalling to their adversaries.

One of the first acts of this assembly was the appointment of a committee, consisting of two from each colony, to state the rights of the colonies in general, the several instances in which those rights had been violated, and the means most proper to be pursued for obtaining a restoration of them. While these important subjects were before the committee, the proceedings of the delegates of the county of Suffolk, to which we have before alluded, were laid before congress; and on the 8th of October that assembly adopted the following resolutions:

“Resolved,—That this congress do approve of the opposition made by the inhabitants of Massachusetts Bay to the execution of the late acts of parliament; and if the same shall be attempted to be carried into execution by force, in such case all America ought to support them in their opposition.

“Resolved,—That it is the opinion of this body, that the removal of the people of Boston into the country, would be not only extremely difficult in the execution, but so important in its consequences as to require the utmost deliberation before it is adopted. But in case the provincial meeting of that colony shall judge it absolutely necessary, it is the opinion of this congress, that all America ought to contribute towards recompensing them for the injury they may thereby sustain; and it will be recommended accordingly.

“Resolved,—That this congress do recommend to the inhabitants of the colony of Massachusetts Bay, to submit to a suspension of the administration of justice, when it cannot be procured in a legal and peaceable manner, under the rules of the charter, and the laws founded thereon, until the effects of our application for a repeal of the acts, by which their charter rights are infringed, is known.

“Resolved, unanimously,—That every person or persons whosoever, who shall take, accept, or act under any commission or authority, in any wise derived from the act passed in the last session of parliament, changing the form of government and violating the charter of the province of Massachusetts Bay, ought to be held in detestation and abhorrence by all good men, and considered as the wicked tools of that despotism which is preparing to destroy those rights which God, nature, and compact, have given to America.”

The congress proceeded with great deliberation; its debates were held with closed doors, and the honour of each member was solemnly engaged not to disclose any of the discussions till such disclosure was declared advisable by the majority. It was not till the 14th of October that the following series of resolutions, which may be regarded as their grand declaration of rights and of grievances, was passed and promulgated. To abridge or analyze them would be an equal injustice to the memory of their authors, and to the fidelity of history; we therefore present them entire.

“Resolved, unanimously,—That the inhabitants of the English colonies in North America, by the immutable laws of nature, the principles of the English constitution, and the several charters or compacts, have the following rights:

“1. That they are entitled to life, liberty, and property; and they have never ceded to any foreign power whatever a right to dispose of either without their consent.

“2. That our ancestors, who first settled these colonies, were, at the time of their emigration from the mother country, entitled to all the rights, liberties, and immunities of free and natural-born subjects within the realm of England.

“3. That by such emigration they by no means forfeited, surrendered, or lost, any of those rights, but that they were, and their descendants now are, entitled to the exercise and enjoyment of all such of them as their local and other circumstances enable them to exercise and enjoy.

“4. That the foundation of English liberty, and of all free governments, is a right in the people to participate in their legislative council : and as the English colonists are not represented, and from their local and other circumstances cannot properly be represented, in the British parliament, they are entitled to a free and exclusive power of legislation in their several provincial legislatures, where their right of representation can alone be preserved, in all cases of taxation and internal policy, subject only to the negative of their sovereign, in such manner as has been heretofore used and accustomed. But from the necessity of the case, and a regard to the mutual interest of both countries, we cheerfully consent to the operation of such acts of the British parliament as are, bona fide, restrained to the regulation of our external commerce, for the purpose of securing the commercial advantages of the whole empire to the mother country, and the commercial benefit of its respective members ; excluding every idea of taxation, internal or external, for raising a revenue on the subjects in America, without their consent.

" 5. That the respective colonies are entitled to the common law of England, and, more especially, to the great and inestimable privilege of being tried by their peers of the vicinity, according to the course of that law.

" 6. That they are entitled to the benefit of such of the English statutes as existed at the time of their colonization, and which they have, by experience, respectively found to be applicable to their several local and other circumstances.

" 7. That these, his majesty's colonies, are likewise entitled to all the immunities and privileges granted and confirmed to them by royal charters, or secured by their several codes of provincial laws.

" 8. That they have a right peaceably to assemble, consider of their grievances, and petition the king ; and that all prosecutions, prohibitory proclamations, and commitments, for the same, are illegal.

" 9. That the keeping a standing army in these colonies, in times of peace, without the consent of the legislature of that colony in which such army is kept, is against law.

" 10. It is indispensably necessary to good government, and rendered essential by the English constitution, that the constituent branches of the legislature be independent of each other ; that therefore the exercise of legislative power, in several colonies, by a council appointed during pleasure by the crown, is unconstitutional, dangerous, and destructive to the freedom of American legislation.

" All and each of which the aforesaid deputies, in behalf of themselves and their constituents, do claim, demand, and insist on, as their indubitable rights and liberties, which cannot be legally taken from them, altered, or abridged, by any power whatever, without their consent, by their representatives in their several provincial legislatures.

" In the course of our inquiry," they proceed to say, " we find many infringements and violations of the foregoing rights, which, from an ardent desire that harmony and mutual intercourse of affection and interest may be restored, we pass over for the present, and proceed to state such acts and measures as have been adopted since the last war, which demonstrate a system formed to enslave America.

" Resolved,—That the following acts of parliament are infringements and violations of the rights of the colonists, and that the repeal of them is essentially necessary, in order to restore harmony between Great Britain and the American colonies ; viz. the several acts of 4 Geo. III. c. 15 and 34, 5 Geo. III. c. 25, 6 Geo. III. c. 52, 7 Geo. III. c. 41 and 46, 8 Geo. III. c. 22, which impose duties for the purpose of raising a revenue in America, extend the power of the admiralty courts beyond their ancient limits, deprive the American subject of trial by jury, authorize the judge's certificate to indemnify the prosecutor from damages that he might be otherwise liable to, requiring oppressive security from a claimant of ships and goods seized before he shall be allowed to defend his property ; and are subversive of American rights.

" Also, 12 Geo. III. c. 24, entitled, ' An act for the better securing his majesty's dock yards, magazines, ships, ammunition, and stores,' which declares a new offence in America, and deprives the American subject of a constitutional trial by jury of the vicinage, by authorizing the trial of any person, charged with the committing any offence described in the said act, out of the realm, to be indicted and tried for the same in any shire or county within the realm.

" Also, the three acts passed in the last session of parliament, for stopping the port and blocking up the harbour of Boston, for altering the charter and government of Massachusetts Bay, and that which is entitled, ' An act for the better administration of justice,' &c.

" Also, the act passed in the same session, for establishing the Roman Catholic religion in the province of Quebec, abolishing the equitable system of English laws, and erecting a tyranny there, to the great danger (from so total a dissimilarity of religion, law, and government) of the neighbouring British colonies, by the assistance of whose blood and treasure the said country was conquered from France.

" Also, the act passed in the same session, for the better providing suitable quarters for officers and soldiers in his majesty's service in North America.

"Also, that the keeping a standing army in several of these colonies, in time of peace, without the consent of the legislature of that colony in which such army is kept, is against law.

"To these grievous acts and measures, Americans cannot submit; but in hopes their fellow-subjects in Great Britain will, on a revision of them, restore us to that state in which both countries found happiness and prosperity, we have, for the present, only resolved to pursue the following peaceable measures: 1. To enter into a non-importation association; 2. To prepare an address to the people of Great Britain, and a memorial to the inhabitants of British America; and, 3. To prepare a loyal address to his majesty, agreeably to resolutions already entered into."*

An agreement to abstain from commercial intercourse with Great Britain, was signed by all the members of this congress. By this instrument they were bound not to import, directly or indirectly, any goods from Great Britain or Ireland, after the 1st of December, 1774; and in case the acts complained of should not be repealed by the 10th of September, 1775, they agreed not to export to Great Britain, Ireland, or the West Indies, any commodities or merchandise whatever, except rice to Europe. They at the same time agreed to encourage frugality, economy, and industry, and to promote the agriculture, arts, and manufactures of their own country, especially wool. Committees were to be appointed in every county, city, or town, to see that the agreement was observed; and the names of the violators of it were to be published in the gazettes, as enemies to the rights of America; and in that case no dealings were to be had with them.

Upon the principles, and in the spirit of the preceding resolutions, was composed an address to the people of Great Britain, as also one to the king; a statement to the aggrieved colonies, and an address to the inhabitants of Canada. These documents were drawn up with great ability. The gentlemen selected from the several colonies for this memorable congress, were no less distinguished for their talents than their patriotism; and when perusing these state papers, no one can fail to regret that the speeches delivered on that occasion, by such distinguished statesmen and orators as John Adams, John Jay, Richard Henry Lee, Patrick Henry, John Dickinson, Samuel Chase, John Rutledge, and many others of that illustrious band of patriots, are lost to the world.

In their address to the people of Great Britain, after enumerating the several acts of parliament deemed to be violations of their rights, they appeal, with peculiar force of language, to the generosity, to the virtue, and to the justice of the nation, for relief. "You have been told," say they, "that we are seditious, impatient of government, and desirous of independency. Be assured that these are not facts, but calumnies. Permit us to be as free as yourselves, and we shall ever esteem a union with you to be our greatest glory, and our greatest happiness; we shall ever be ready to contribute all in our power to the welfare of the whole empire; we shall consider your enemies as our enemies, and your interest as our own. But if you are determined that your ministers shall wantonly sport with the rights of mankind; if neither the voice of justice, the dictates of the law, the principles of the constitution, or the suggestions of humanity, can restrain your hands from shedding human blood in such an impious cause, we must then tell you, that we will never submit to be hewers of wood or drawers of water for any ministry or nation in the world."

The address of congress to the king was couched in language respectful, and even affectionate; nor is there any just ground to suspect its authors of hypocrisy; they had not yet been driven to familiarize themselves with the idea of separation from the British crown. One extract will afford a specimen of that union of firmness and affection which pervades the whole. "Permit us, then, most gracious sovereign, in the name of all your faithful people in America, with the utmost humility, to implore you, for the honour of Almighty God, whose pure religion our enemies are undermining; for your glory, which can be advanced only by rendering your subjects happy, and keeping them united; for the interests of your family, depending on an adherence to the principles that enthroned it; for the safety and welfare of your kingdoms and dominions, threatened with almost unavoidable dangers and distresses; that your majesty, as the loving father of your whole people, connected by the same bonds of law, loyalty, faith, and blood, though dwelling in various countries, will not suffer the transcendent relation formed by these ties to be further violated, in uncertain expectations of effects that, if obtained, never can compensate for the calamities through which they must be gained."

In their address to the inhabitants of Quebec, congress endeavoured to convince them that the late act respecting that province had deprived them of many of their rights and privileges, and to persuade them to unite in obtaining redress, as well as to join the confederacy; while to the inhabitants of the aggrieved colonies they presented a detailed account of the violations of their rights since the year 1763, as well as the reasons for the pacific mode of redress adopted by them; and concluded by observing, "From the detail of facts herein before recited, as well as from authentic intelligence received, it is clear beyond a doubt, that a resolution is formed, and now carrying into execution, to extinguish the freedom of these colonies, by subjecting them to a despotic government."

Finally, they resolved upon the expediency of holding another congress at the same place, on the 10th of May, 1775, unless it should be rendered unnecessary by a previous redress of grievances. Having thus completed their important transactions in a session of fifty-two days, they dissolved themselves on the 26th of October.

A majority of the members of this congress had little doubt that the measures taken by them, if supported by the American people, would produce a redress of grievances. Richard Henry Lee said to Mr. Adams, "We shall undoubtedly carry all our points. You will be completely relieved; all the offensive acts will be repealed; the army and fleet will be recalled; and Britain will give up her foolish projects." George Washington was of opinion, that with the aid of both the non-importation and the non-exportation system, America would prevail. Patrick Henry concurred in opinion with Mr. Adams, that the contest must ultimately be decided by force.* "The proceedings of this celebrated congress, the tone and temper of their various resolutions, the style of their addresses, the composition of the several papers that were drawn up by them, were in every particular calculated to excite the admiration of the world. That an assembly of fifty-two men, born and educated in the wilds of a new world, unpractised in the arts of polity, most of them unexperienced in the arduous duties of legislation, coming from distant and distinct governments, differing in religion, manners, customs, and habits, as they did in their views with regard to the nature of their connexion with Great Britain; that such an assembly, so constituted, should display so much wisdom, sagacity, foresight, and knowledge of the world, such skill in argument, such force of reasoning, such firmness and soundness of judgment, so profound an acquaintance with the rights of man, such elevation of sentiment, such genuine patriotism, and, above all, such unexampled union of opinion, was indeed a political phenomenon, to which history has yet furnished no parallel. Nor is it less wonderful that the whole people of the colonies represented, should have regarded the simple recommendations of this congress with the reverence and obedience due to the strongest ties of law. Even in those colonies where law and authority had been set at defiance, the injunctions of the congress were scrupulously obeyed. The whole country was in that awful calm of expectation, which precedes the bursting of a storm. They were willing to wait the issue of their petitions, but ready to enforce their rights at the risk of life."†

During the session of the congress most of the colonies had adopted the plan of instituting provincial assemblies, regardless of their old form of government. In Massachusetts, General Gage had convoked a general court, to assemble at Salem, on the 5th of October; but events which subsequently transpired, induced him to issue a proclamation dissolving the assembly. The members, however, regarded that proclamation as illegal, and met at Salem on the day appointed. After waiting in vain the whole day for the governor's appearance to administer the oaths, they resolved themselves into a provincial congress, and adjourned to Concord. After appointing John Hancock president, and addressing a communication to the governor, they again adjourned, to meet at Cambridge on the 17th. Here they appointed a committee of safety, and a committee of supplies. They also voted to enlist one fourth of the militia as minute-men, to be frequently drilled, and held in readiness for service at a minute's warning; and after appointing three general officers, they adjourned to the 23d of November. In the mean time the situation of the citizens of Boston was in every respect disagreeable; General Gage, however, seemed to have no disposition to risk an immediate attack upon the Americans. His intention of remaining quiet for the present was evinced by his demand of materials for the construction of winter quarters for his men; but so great was the general detestation of him and his men, that he could procure neither workmen, materials, clothing, nor provisions.

Before the close of the year the busy note of preparation resounded through almost every colony. The Massachusetts committees were indefatigable in providing for the most vigorous defence in the spring. They had procured all sorts of military supplies for the service of twelve thousand men, and had engaged the assistance of the three neighbouring provinces of New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and Connecticut.

While these hostile preparations were proceeding in America, the British monarch was meeting a new parliament. Happily for the independence of America, it proved equally servile, and it must be said equally purblind, with its predecessor. The king informed his parliament, that a most daring resistance and disobedience to the law still prevailed in Massachusetts, and had broken out in fresh violences; that these proceedings had been countenanced and encouraged in the other colonies, and that unwarrantable attempts had been made to obstruct the commerce of the kingdom, by unlawful combinations; and he expressed his firm determination to withstand every attempt to weaken or impair the supreme authority of parliament over all the dominions of the crown. Addresses in answer to the speech, concurring in the sentiments expressed by the king, were carried in both houses, by large majorities.

The cabinet had determined on coercive measures, in case the colonies persisted in their claims. Mr. Quincy, not long after his arrival in England, had an interview with Lord North, as well as Lord Dartmouth, at their special request. The former, on the 19th of November, in conversation on the subject of American affairs, reminded Mr. Quincy of the power of Great Britain, and declared that they were determined "to exert it to the utmost in order to effect the submission of the colonies." "We must try," said he, "what we can do to support the authority we claim over America. If we are defective in power, we must sit down contented, and make the best terms we can; and nobody can blame us after we have done our utmost; but till we have tried what we can do, we can never be justified in receding." Knowing the principal object of Mr. Quincy's visit to England, it was not to be expected that the minister would use the language of concession to him, even if concession were intended; but rather endeavour to impress him with the idea, that it would be impossible for the colonies to resist with any prospect of success: Mr. Quincy, however, from information obtained from other sources, as well as this conversation with the prime minister, was convinced that the Americans had nothing to hope but from forcible resistance. This conviction was communicated to some of his particular friends in America. "I cannot forbear telling you," says Mr. Quincy, in one of his letters of this date, "that I look to my countrymen with the feelings of one who verily believes they must yet seal their faith and constancy to their liberties with blood."

After the recess, parliament met on the 20th of January, and on the same day Lord Chatham moved, "That an humble address be presented to his majesty, most humbly to advise and beseech his majesty, that, in order to open the way towards our happy settlement of the dangerous troubles in America, by beginning to allay ferments and soften animosities there; and, above all, for preventing, in the mean time, any sudden and fatal catastrophe at Boston, now suffering under daily irritation of an army before their eyes, posted in their town; it may graciously please his majesty that immediate orders may be despatched to General Gage for removing his majesty's forces from the town of Boston, as soon as the rigour of the season and other circumstances, indispensable to the safety and accommodation of the said troops, may render the same practicable." This motion was supported by one of the most eloquent and impressive speeches ever delivered by that distinguished statesman and orator. "My lords," said that patriot peer, "these papers from America, now laid by administration for the first time before your lordships, have been, to my knowledge, five or six weeks in the pocket of the minister; and, notwithstanding the fate of this kingdom hangs upon the event of this great controversy, we are but this moment called to a consideration of this important subject. My lords, I do not wish to look into one of these papers, I know their contents well enough already; I know that there is not a member in this house but is acquainted with their purport also. There ought, therefore, to be no delay in entering upon this matter; we ought to proceed to it immediately; we ought to seize the first moment to open the door of reconciliation. The Americans will never be in a temper or state to be reconciled—they ought not to be, till the troops are withdrawn. The troops are a perpetual irritation to those people; they are a bar to all confidence and all cordial reconciliation. The way must be immediately opened for reconciliation. It will soon be too late. I know not who advised the present measures; I know not who advises to a perseverance and enforcement of them; but this I will say, that whoever advises them ought to answer for it at his utmost peril. I know that no one will avow that he advised, or that he was the author of these measures; every one shrinks from the charge. But somebody has advised his majesty to these measures, and if he continues to hear such evil counsellors, his majesty will be undone; his majesty may indeed wear his crown, but, the American jewel out of it, it will not be worth the wearing. What more shall I say? I must not say the king is betrayed; but this I will say, the nation is ruined. What foundation have we for our claims over America? What is our right to persist in such cruel and vindictive measures against that loyal, respectable people? They say you have no right to tax them without their consent. They say truly. Representation and taxation must go together; they are inseparable. Yet there is scarcely a man in our streets, though so poor as scarcely to be able to get his daily bread, but thinks he is the legislator of America. 'Our American subjects' is a common phrase in the mouths of the lowest orders of our citizens; but property, my lords, is the sole and entire dominion of the owner: it excludes all the world besides the owner. None can intermeddle with it. It is a unity, a mathematical point. It is an atom; untangible by any but the proprietor. Touch it, and the owner loses his whole property. The touch contaminates the whole mass, the whole property vanishes. The touch of another annihilates it; for whatever is a man's own is absolutely and exclusively his own. How have this respectable people behaved under their grievances? With unexampled patience, with unparalleled wisdom. They chose delegates by their free suffrages; no bribery, no corruption, no influence there, my lords. Their representatives meet with the sentiments and temper, and speak the sense of the continent. For genuine sagacity, for singular moderation, for solid wisdom, manly spirit, sublime sentiments, and simplicity of language, for every thing respectable and honourable, the congress of Philadelphia shine unrivalled. This wise people speak out. They do not hold the language of slaves; they tell you what they mean. They do not ask you to repeal your laws as a favour; they claim it as a right—they demand it. They tell you they will not submit to them; and I tell you the acts must be repealed; they will be repealed; you cannot enforce them. The ministry are checkmated; they have a move to make on the board; yet not a move, but they are ruined. Repeal, therefore, my lords, I say. But bare repeal will not satisfy this enlightened and spirited people. What! repeal a bit of paper! repeal a piece of parchment! That alone will not do, my lords: You must go through the work—you must declare you have no right to tax—then they may trust you; then they will have some confidence in you. My lords, deeply impressed with the importance of taking some healing measures at this most alarming, distracted state of our affairs, though bowed down with a cruel disease, I have crawled to this house to give you my best counsel and experience; and my advice is, to beseech his majesty to withdraw his troops. This is the best I can think of. It will convince America that you mean to try her cause, in the spirit, and by the laws of freedom and fair inquiry, and not by codes of blood. How can she now trust you, with the bayonet at her breast? She has all the reason in the world now to believe you mean her death, or her bondage. Thus entered on the threshold of this business, I will knock at your gates for justice without ceasing, unless inveterate infirmities stay my hand. My lords, I pledge myself never to leave this business. I will pursue it to the end in every shape. I will never fail of my attendance on it at every step and period of this great matter, unless nailed down to my bed by the severity of disease. My lords, there is no time to be lost; every moment is big with dangers. Nay, while I am now speaking, the decisive blow may be struck, and millions involved in the consequences. The very first drop of blood will make a wound that will not easily be skinned over. Years, perhaps ages, may not heal it. It will be immedicabile vulnus: a wound of that rancorous, malignant, corroding, festering nature, that, in all probability, it will mortify the whole body. Let us, then, my lords, set to this business in earnest; not take it up by bits and scraps as formerly, just as exigencies pressed, without any regard to general relations, connexions, and dependencies. I would not, by any thing I have said, my lords, be thought to encourage America to proceed beyond the right line. I reprobate all acts of violence by her mobility. But when her inherent constitutional rights are invaded, those rights which she has an equitable claim to enjoy by the fundamental laws of the English constitution, and which are engrafted thereon by the unalterable laws of nature, then I own myself an American, and feeling myself such, shall, to the verge of my life, vindicate those rights against all men who strive to trample upon or oppose them."

Lord Chatham's motion was seconded by Lord Camden, who affirmed that "whenever oppression begins, resistance becomes lawful and right;" and it was ably supported by the Marquis of Rockingham and Lord Shelburne; but, like all other motions opposed to the views of the ministry, it was lost by a large majority. The administration declared their determination never to relax in their measures of coercion, until America was forced into obedience. This, however, did not prevent Lord Chatham from presenting to the house, soon afterwards, a bill, containing his favourite plan "for settling the troubles, and for asserting the supreme legislative authority and superintending power of Great Britain over the colonies." Though this bill, as it contained a direct avowal of the supreme authority of parliament over the colonies, in all cases except that of taxation, could never have received the assent of the Americans, yet, as it expressly denied the parliamentary power of taxing the colonies, without the consent of their as-semblies, and made other concessions, it was rejected by a large majority on its first reading.*

Immediately after the rejection of Lord Chatham's bill, the minister proposed, in the house of commons, a joint address to the king on American affairs. In this address, which was carried by large majorities, parliament declared that Massachusetts was in a state of rebellion; and that this colony had been supported by unlawful combinations and engagements entered into by several of the other colonies, to the great injury and oppression of his majesty's subjects in Great Britain. Assuring his majesty of their determination never to relinquish the sovereign authority of the king and parliament over the colonies, they requested him to take the most effectual measures to enforce obedience to that authority, and promised him their support at the hazard of their lives and property. Opposition to the address was made in both houses, but in vain. The king, in his answer, declared his firm determination, in compliance with their request, to enforce obedience to the laws and authority of the supreme legislature of the empire. His answer was followed by a message, requesting an increase of his forces by sea and land. The restriction of the trade of the colonies, and a prohibition of the use of the fisheries, was also a part of the ministerial system of measures. The minister began this part of his system with Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island, as being the most obstinate and refractory. On the 10th of February he presented a bill, which soon became a law, restricting the trade of these colonies to Great Britain, Ireland, and the British West Indies, and prohibiting their carrying on any fisheries on the banks of Newfoundland, and other places, for a limited time; and the same restrictions were soon after extended to all the colonies represented in the congress at Philadel-

* Lord Chatham had shown this bill to Dr. Franklin, before he submitted it to the house of lords, but the latter had not an opportunity of proposing certain alterations which he had sketched. Dr. Franklin, however, at the special request of Lord Chatham, was present at the debates upon it. Lord Dartmouth was at first disposed to have the bill lie upon the table; but Lord Sandwich opposed its being received, and moved that it be immediately "rejected with the contempt it deserved. He could never believe," he said, "that it was the production of a British peer; it appeared to him rather the work of some American." Turning his face towards Dr. Franklin, then standing at the bar, "He fancied," he said, "he had in his eye the person who drew it up, one of the bitterest and most mischievous enemies this country had ever known." To this part of the speech of Lord Sandwich, the great Chatham replied, by saying, "that it was entirely his own. This declaration," he said, "he thought himself the more obliged to make, as many of their lordships appeared to have so mean an opinion of it; for if it was so weak or so bad a thing, it was proper in him to take care that no other person should unjustly share in the censure it deserved. It had been heretofore reckoned his vice not to be apt to take advice; but he made no scruple to declare, phia, with the exception of New York and North Carolina. These bills were opposed by the minority in both houses, as unjust and cruel towards the colonists, involving the innocent with the guilty, and unwise and impolitic in regard to the people of Great Britain. By the loss of their foreign trade and the fisheries, the colonists, it was said, particularly those of New England, would be unable to pay the large balances due from them to the British merchants. But every argument, however just or reasonable, was urged in vain against the measures proposed by the minister. An idea prevailed in Great Britain, that the people of New England were dependent on the fisheries for subsistence, and that, when deprived of these, they would be starved into obedience and submission.

It would appear, that at this period there were some individuals in the confidence of the ministry engaged in conferences with Dr. Franklin, having for their object to ascertain whether terms of reconciliation could be devised. Dr. Franklin acted with his usual prudence in this affair, as was very manifest in the title of the plan he sketched for the persons who consulted him, which he termed, "Hints for conversation, upon the subject of terms that might probably produce a durable union between Great Britain and the colonies." This plan embraced, in seventeen propositions, the principal points in dispute; but, as the negotiations were not avowedly official, and led to no practical result, we shall not enter upon the detail of them.†

On the 20th of February, Lord North astonished both his friends and his opponents, by introducing into the house of commons a proposition of a conciliatory character. It provided, "that when the governor, council, and assembly, or general court of any of his majesty's colonies in America, shall propose to that if he were the first minister of this country, and had the care of settling this momentous business, he should not be ashamed of publicly calling to his assistance a person so perfectly acquainted with the whole of American affairs, as the gentleman alluded to, and so injuriously reflected on; one whom all Europe held in estimation for his knowledge and wisdom, and ranked with our Boyles and Newtons; who was an honour, not to the English nation only, but to human nature."—Franklin's Works, vol. i. p. 322. Pitkin, vol. i. p. 312. Among the papers which had been laid before the house by Lord Dartmouth, was the petition of the congress to the king, in behalf of which the American agents, Dr. Franklin, Mr. Bollen, and Mr. Lee, petitioned to be heard at the bar of the house. But this privilege was refused to them by the ministers, on the ground that the congress was an illegal body, and their petition was rejected by an unusually large majority.

† Those of our readers who may be desirous of pursuing this subject further, we refer to Pitkin's Political and Civil History, vol. i. p. 315—322. We take this opportunity of acknowledging our obligations to that very valuable work; certainly the most satisfactory extant, in the department which it occupies.

make provision, according to the condition, circumstances, and situation of such province or colony, for contributing their proportion for the common defence, (such proportion to be raised under the authority of the general court or assembly of such colony, and disposable by parliament,) and shall engage to make provision also for the support of the civil government and the administration of justice in such colony, it will be proper, if such proposal shall be approved by his majesty and the two houses of parliament, and for so long as such provision shall be made accordingly, to forbear, in respect to such colony, to levy any duty, tax, or assessment, except only such duties as it may be expedient to levy or impose for the regulation of commerce; the net proceeds of the duties last mentioned to be carried to the account of such colony respectively."

This unexpected proposition was at first opposed by those who usually acted with the minister, as totally inconsistent with the course of measures just adopted; and they would probably have voted against it, had they not been quieted by explanations, as to its real object, made by his particular friends. By these explanations, in which the minister, whatever might have been his original intentions, concurred, it appeared that the object was to cause a division among the colonies, or, if this should not be the effect, and the reasonable terms offered should be rejected by them, to unite the people of England in strong coercive measures.

The adoption of Lord North's conciliatory scheme did not prevent Mr. Burke and Mr. Hartley from presenting to the house their respective plans of reconciliation. That of the former, founded on the principle of expediency, was to permit the colonies to tax themselves in their assemblies, according to ancient usage, and to repeal all acts of parliament imposing duties in America. Mr. Hartley proposed, that, at the request of parliament, the secretary of state should require a contribution from the colonies for the general expense of the empire, leaving the amount and application to the colonial assemblies. These propositions, though supported by all the eloquence and powerful talents of Mr. Burke, were rejected by the usual ministerial majorities.

["The resolution of the colonists was soon put to a more serious test. A considerable quantity of military stores having been deposited at Concord, an inland town, about eighteen miles from Boston, General Gage purposed to destroy them. For the execution of this design, he, on the night preceding the 19th of April, detached Lieutenant-Colonel Smith and Major Pitcairn, with 800 grenadiers and light-infantry, who, at eleven o'clock, embarked in boats at the bottom of the common, in Boston, crossed the river Charles, and landing at Phipps' farm, in Cambridge, commenced a silent and expeditious march for Concord. Although several British officers, who dined at Cambridge the preceding day, had taken the precaution to disperse themselves along the road leading to Concord, to intercept any expresses that might be sent from Boston, to alarm the country; yet messengers, who had been sent from that town for the purpose, had eluded the British patrols, and given an alarm, which was rapidly spread by church bells, signal guns, and volleys. On the arrival of the British troops at Lexington, toward five in the morning, about 70 men, belonging to the minute company of that town, were found on the parade, under arms. Major Pitcairn, who led the van, galloping up to them, called out, "Disperse, disperse, you rebels; throw down your arms, and disperse." The sturdy yeomanry not instantly obeying the order, he advanced nearer, fired his pistol, flourished his sword, and ordered his soldiers to fire. A discharge of arms from the British troops, with a huzza, immediately succeeded; several of the provincials fell, and the rest dispersed. The firing continued after the dispersion, and the fugitives stopped and returned the fire. Eight Americans were killed, three or four of them by the first fire of the British; the others, after they had left the parade. Several were also wounded.

"The British detachment proceeded to Concord. The inhabitants of that town, having received the alarm, drew up in order for defence; but, observing the number of the regulars to be too great for them to encounter, they retired over the north bridge, at some distance beyond the town, and waited for reinforcements. A party of British light-infantry followed them, and took possession of the bridge, while the main body entered the town, and proceeded to execute their commission. They disabled two 24 pounders, threw 500 pounds of ball into the river and wells, and broke in pieces about 60 barrels of flour. The militia being re-enforced, Major Buttrick, of Concord, who had gallantly offered to command them, advanced toward the bridge; but, not knowing of the transaction at Lexington, ordered the men not to give the first fire, that the provincials might not be the aggressors. As he advanced, the light-infantry retired to the Concord side of the river, and began to pull up the bridge; and, on his nearer approach, they fired, and killed a captain and one of the privates. The provincials returned the fire; a skirmish ensued; and the regulars were forced to retreat, with some loss. They were soon joined by the main body, and the whole detachment retreated with precipitancy. All the people of the adjacent country were by this time in arms; and they attacked the retreating troops in every direction. Some fired from behind stone walls and other coverts; others pressed on their rear; and, thus harassed, they made good their retreat six miles back to Lexington. Here they were joined by Lord Percy, who, most opportunely for them, had arrived with a detachment of 900 men, and two pieces of cannon. The enemy, now amounting to about 1800 men, having halted an hour or two at Lexington, recommenced their march; but the attack from the provincials was renewed at the same time; and an irregular, yet very galling fire, was kept up on each flank, as well as in the front and rear. The close firing from behind stone walls, by good marksmen, put them in no small confusion; but they kept up a brisk retreating fire on the militia and minutemen. A little after sunset, the regulars reached Bunker's Hill, where, exhausted with excessive fatigue, they remained during the night, under the protection of the Somerset man-of-war; and the next morning went into Boston." If the Salem and Marblehead regiments had arrived in season to have cut off their retreat, in all probability but few of the detachment would ever have reached Boston. Still the great doctrines of humanity were so deeply impressed upon the minds of the people, already much oppressed, that they forgot, in their sympathy for the distressed, their animosity; and the people of Charlestown, all whigs, still offered the exhausted and dying British soldiers, the same hospitality that they would have afforded friends in distress.

The first act of the great drama was now opened. Blood had flowed, and flowed copiously. The people had now no more doubts on their minds what course they had to pursue. Every workshop, every dwelling-house, every church, was a shrine in which the vows of freemen were made to the God of battles. Cambridge, by a sort of common consent, was fixed upon as a place of general rendezvous, and in a few days twenty thousand freemen were seen in arms, to avenge their wrongs.

The provincial congress of Massachusetts met the next day after the battle of Lexington, and determined the number of men to be raised; fixed on the payment of the troops; voted an issue of paper money; drew up rules and regulations for the army; and all was done in a business-like manner. The other colonies caught the spirit of New England, and the watch-fires of liberty blazed along the whole coast from Falmouth to Charleston. Activity and enterprise were every where conspicuous. A party from Connecticut, under the authority of Governor Trumbull, proceeded to the Canada frontiers, and took many pieces of cannon, and, at the same time, the fort at Ticonderoga. Arnold, Allen, and Easton, were conspicuous in this bloodless enterprise; but all agreed that it was one of spirit and discretion. This fort, although in a somewhat dilapidated state, commanded, as it was thought, all our passes to Canada. At this time it was the opinion of several of the officers of the British army, that it would not require a large body of troops to put all things at rest in America. These men reasoned upon general principles, and so far they were correct. An unarmed force, without system or concert, are, in general, but momentary steps to regular troops; but they underrated the military talents and science of the colonists.

At this period, the first minds in Massachusetts were wrought up to a spirit of martyrdom. Adams and Hancock, in the continental congress, instead of flinching at their troubles, spoke out more boldly than ever; and their feelings seemed to pervade the whole people. Gage, by an indiscreet proclamation, kept this fire alive, and little was thought of, but hostile movements. He offered pardon to all but John Hancock and Samuel Adams, whose crimes, he alleged, deserved condign punishment. This was to them an enviable elevation, and gave them almost the power of dictators. The military knowledge which was discovered in the provincial officers, astonished the experienced commanders in the British army. From Mystic river to Dorchester heights, a line of fortifications were established, that showed the British that our engineers knew something of the art of war; but still they could not be brought to believe, that such a mass of men, so suddenly collected, could, for a moment, resist British veterans. They were not sanguinary, and hoped that all the difficulties would soon pass away; but in this they were deceived.

The American army had been quartered at Cambridge nearly two months, and no blow had been struck to rid the country of the British troops, or to encourage the natives; some uneasiness seemed to show itself in the camp, and more abroad, that greater energy was not shown; but the wise thought to conquer by Fabian wisdom, while others were for decisive measures. The army at Cambridge was known to be large enough to demolish the British, if they could be got at. In this state of feeling, it was thought proper to make some demonstrations of courage, and of an intention of acting offensively and fearlessly. Col. Prescott was sent with the fragments, or rather, the skeletons of three regiments, on the night of the 16th of June, to occupy a station on Bunker's Hill.

On viewing that eminence, he saw at once that it was an ineligible spot; and he looked along to the right, and found that a spur of that hill, which was now called Breed's Hill, was the most proper situation, in every respect, for a battle-ground. Considering that they were within the limits of their orders, Prescott and Colonel Gridley, the engineers, began a redoubt on the right of Breed's Hill. It was about one hundred and forty feet square, with two open passages for ingress and egress. On the left of the redoubt, running north-easterly, was a breast-work of sods, not much over four feet high; but not, as has been stated, extending to Mystic river; it did not extend one quarter of the way to it. The line from this breast-work was made of two post and rail fences, placed about four feet apart, in parallel lines, and between them was trode the newly mown grass, making quite as good a screen for the militia as the redoubt or the breast work.

General Ward, who commanded the American army, concluding from the firing from Copp's Hill, in Boston, at the early dawn of the morning of the 17th, that the British would make a struggle to get possession of the works, offered to relieve Prescott and his men, but they unanimously declined the offer, but earnestly insisted on re-enforcements. These were reluctantly given, as the commander in chief thought that an attack on his camp was contemplated; and in such case, his camp at Cambridge, indifferently fortified as it was, would be a better place for a general action than Bunker's Hill.

Early in the morning, from the battery on Copp's Hill, one of the men in or near the redoubt was shot, and was instantly buried on the spot; but although the roar of the cannon from Copp's Hill was incessant, no further damage was done by their shots; and in aid of this battery, the Lively, a man-of-war, was brought to bear, and in fact she began the cannonade.

General Gage, wishing to drive the provincials from the hill, sent Major-General Howe and Brigadier-General Pigot, with ten companies of grenadiers, and ten of light-infantry, with some artillery, to perform this service. These generals, reconnoitring the American forces, on their arrival at Morton's Point, thought best to wait for re-enforcements from Boston. For these, Howe waited from about noon to three o'clock, P. M. before the battle was commenced. The British began a slow march up the hill in two lines, stopping at times to give the artillery a chance to play. But the angle of elevation was such, that it did but little execution. The provincials wasted no ammunition; they had but a scanty supply. They were ordered to put four buck-shots to a bullet, and to reserve their fire until the enemy were at blank-point shot distance. At this moment they poured in upon the approaching foe a most destructive volley. The effect was not more destructive than appalling. The British soldiery, expecting nothing but random shots from undisciplined militia, were astounded at such deadly fires, and their line was broken in confusion. Some companies had not twenty soldiers fit for duty when they were about to rally. The British officers had the greatest difficulty to bring their troops into line again. At length, they came up a second time towards the works, but with some wavering; and in less than fifteen minutes, their line broke in still greater confusion than before. Clinton saw this from Boston, and hastened over to assist Howe. Both the generals addressed the soldiers; called to their mind their former wreaths of glory, and the everlasting disgrace of being beaten by raw militia. Howe swore to them, that he would never survive the disgrace, if they were conquered that day. By this time, Charlestown, consisting of four hundred houses, was in a blaze. This Clinton had done to terrify the neighbouring army. On the third attack they were under the necessity of resorting to skill, not daring to put it on the score of bravery a third time. Pigot, with a considerable force, took a circuitous route around the south side of the hill, and came upon the southwestern angle of the redoubt, and instantly scaled the slight works. Pitcairn was with him, and was shot through the body as he was about to leap into the redoubt. Pigot, being a short man, was lifted by his soldiers on to the sods, and jumped into the area without harm. The provincials were now attacked on the east and on the west; their ammunition was exhausted, and they had but few or no bayonets; and after beating their assailants a while with the butts of their guns, Prescott ordered a retreat. Those at the breast-work and in the redoubt retreated, and those at the rail fence followed, over Charlestown neck, northward.

Until the commencement of the retreat, but few of the Americans had been killed. Their unwillingness to leave the ground at the proper time, was the cause of the considerable number of the killed and wounded. Captain Knowlton having a fine large company near Mystic river, moved up in good order, and covered the retreat of the Americans. The battle ended between five and six o'clock. The wind, during the fight, was brisk and westerly, and drove the smoke directly in the face of the enemy; but as the smoke arose over the heads of the British, the Americans, as it were, looking under the cloud, saw where to fire. Prescott was all the fight in the redoubt; the other portion of the Massachusetts militia at the breast-works. The New Hampshire troops, under Stark, Dearborn, and others, were at the rail-fence. They were marching from their native state towards Cambridge, and went on to the battle ground by their own impulses, not having received any orders from the commander in chief.

The British had between three and four thousand in the fight. They acknowledged ten hundred and fifty-four killed and wounded, with a great proportion of officers. Their number was most unquestionably larger; for they brought between three and four hundred of the slain, and buried them in the corner of the new burying-ground at the bottom of the common in Boston. The others were buried on Breed's Hill, where they fell.

The Americans had fifteen hundred in the fight, but perhaps there were a few more at times, for volunteers came on to the ground, expended their powder, and retreated, when they could do no more service to the cause. The provincials had one hundred and thirty-nine killed, and three hundred and fourteen wounded and missing. The officers who fell on the American side were, Colonel Gardner of Cambridge, Lieutenant-Colonel Parker of Chelmsford, and Majors Moore and M'Cleary,—all men of distinction and value, and heroes in the cause,—with Major-General Joseph Warren.

General Burgoyne was all the time during the battle seated in the belfry of the North Church of Boston, a most commanding position, to watch the movements of either party. His letter describing the scene was, at that period, considered as one of very graphic power, but it is too general to give the historian much information.

* Joseph Warren was born in Roxbury, near Boston, in the year 1741. His father was a respectable farmer in that place, who had held several municipal offices to the acceptance of his fellow citizens. Joseph, with several of his brothers, was instructed in the elementary branches of knowledge at the public grammar school of the town, which was distinguished for its successive instructors of superior attainments. In 1755 he entered college, where he sustained the character of a youth of talents, fine manners, and of a generous, independent deportment, united to great personal courage and perseverance. An anecdote will illustrate his fearlessness and determination at that age, when character can hardly be said to be formed. Several students of Warren's class shut themselves in a room to arrange some college affairs in a way which they knew was contrary to his wishes, and barred the door so effectually that he could not, without great violence, force it; but he did not give over the attempt of getting amongst them, for, perceiving that the window of the room in which they were assembled was open, and near a spout which extended from the roof of the building to the ground, he went to the top of the house, slid down to the eaves, seized the spout, and, when he had descended as far as the widow, threw himself into the chamber amongst them. At that instant the spout, which was decayed and weak, gave way and fell to the ground. He looked at it without emotion, said that it had served his purpose, and began to take his part in the business. A specta-

Warren assumed no command on that day. He had been commissioned as a major-general by the Provincial congress, but four days previous, and had not taken any command; nor had he, in fact, been sworn into office, except, as every one had an oath in heaven, to live free, or die. Warren was, at the moment of his fall, president of the provincial congress, and chairman of the committee of safety. He had put some one in the chair, and mounted his horse at Watertown, where the legislature was in session, to come and encourage his fellow-citizens in the fight. When he entered the redoubt, Prescott offered him the command, but he declined it, saying, "I come to learn war under an experienced soldier, not to take any command." He was the martyr of that day's glory. His death was felt as a calamity to the cause and to the nation. He was in the prime of life, being only thirty-five years of age, with a spirit as bold and dauntless as ever was blazoned in legends, or recorded in history. He was a prudent, cautious, but fearless statesman; made to govern men, and to breathe into them a portion of his own heroic soul. His eloquence was of a high order; his voice was fine, and of great compass, and he modulated it at will. His appearance had the air of a soldier,—graceful and commanding, united to the manners of a finished gentleman. The British thought that his life was of the utmost importance to the American army; of so much importance, that they would no longer hold together after his fall. They sadly mistook the men they had to deal with. His blood was not shed in vain; it cried from the ground for vengeance; and his name became a watch word in the hour of peril and glory.* The name of the humblest individual who perished in that fight will be remembered by the tor of this feat and narrow escape, related this fact to me in the college yard, nearly half a century afterwards, and the impression it made on his mind was so strong, that he seemed to feel the same emotion as though it happened but an hour before.

On leaving college, in 1759, Warren turned his attention to the study of medicine, under the direction of Dr. Lloyd, an eminent physician of that day, whose valuable life has been protracted almost to the present time. Warren was distinguished very soon after he commenced practice; for, when in 1764 the small-pox spread in Boston, he was amongst the most successful in his method of treating that disease, which was then considered the most dreadful scourge of the human race, and the violence of which had baffled the efforts of the learned faculty of medicine, from the time of its first appearance. From this moment he stood high amongst his brethren, and was the favourite of the people; and what he gained in their good will, he never lost. His personal appearance, his address, his courtesy, and his humanity, won the way to the hearts of all, and his knowledge and superiority of talents secured the conquest. A bright and lasting fame in his profession, with the attendant consequences, wealth and influence, were within his reach, and near at hand; but the calls of a distracted country were paramount to every consideration of his own interests, and he entered the vortex of politics, never to return to the peaceful course of professional labour.

town or parish from whence he came, and be generally enrolled on the books of the corporation. Young, substantial yeomen, or industrious mechanics, they were

The change in public opinion had been gradually preparing the minds of most men for a revolution. This was not openly avowed; amelioration of treatment for the present, and assurance of kindness in future, were all that the colonies asked from Great Britain; but these they did not receive. The mother country mistook the spirit of her children, and used threats when kindness would have been the best policy. When Britain declared her right to direct, govern, and tax us, in any form, and at all times, the colonies reasoned, remonstrated, and entreated, for a while; and, when these means did not answer, they defied and resisted. The political writers of the province had been active and busy, and they were generally screened by fictitious names, or sent their productions anonymously into the world; but the time had arrived when speakers of nerve and boldness were wanted to raise their voices against oppression in every shape. Warren possessed first rate qualities for an orator, and had early declared, in the strongest terms, his political sentiments, which were somewhat in advance of public opinion, for he held as tyranny all taxation which could be imposed by the British parliament upon the colonies. In times of danger the people are sagacious, and cling to those who best can serve them, and every eye was on him in every emergency, for he had not only the firmness and decision they wished for in a leader, but was prudent and wary in all his plans. His first object was to enlighten the people, and then he felt sure of engaging their feelings in the general cause. He knew when once they began, it would be impossible to tread back—independence only would satisfy the country. With an intention of directing public sentiment, without appearing to be too active, he met frequently with a considerable number of substantial mechanics, and others in the middling classes of society, who were busy in politics. This crisis required such a man as they found him to be—one who could discern the signs of the times, and mould the ductile materials to his will, and at the same time seem only to follow in the path of others. His letter to Barnard, which attracted the notice of government, had been written several years before, in 1768; but in some form or other, he was constantly enlightening the people by his pen; but it is now difficult, and of no great importance, to trace him in the papers of that period. The public was not then always right in designating the authors of political essays. In the different situations in which he was called to act, he assumed as many characters as fable has ever given to the tutelar god of his profession, and, like him, in every one of them he retained the wisdom to guide, and the power to charm. At one time he might be found restraining the impetuosity, and bridling the fury of those hotheaded politicians, who felt more than they reasoned, and dared to do more than became men. Such was his versatility, that he turned from these lectures of caution and prudence, to asserting and defending the most bold and undisguised principles of liberty, and defying in their very teeth the agents of the crown.

Twice he was elected to deliver the oration on the fifth of March, in commemoration of the "massacre," and his orations are amongst the most distinguished produced by that splendid list of speakers who addressed their fellow citizens on this subject, so interesting to them all. In these productions generally the immediate causes of this event were overlooked, and the remote ones alone were discussed. Here they were on safe ground, for tyranny in its incipient stages has no excuse from opposition; but in its march it generally finds some plausible arguments for its proceedings, drawn from the very resistance it naturally produces. These occasions gave the orators a fine field for remark, and a fair opportunity for effect. The great orators of antiquity, in their speeches, attempted only to rouse the people to retain what they possessed. Invective, entreaty, and pride, had their effect in assisting these mighty masters to influence the people. They were ashamed to lose what their fathers had left them, won by their blood, and so long preserved by their wisdom, their virtues, and their courage. Our statesmen had a harder task to perform, for they were compelled to call on the people to gain what they had never enjoyed—an independent rank and standing amongst the nations of the world.

owners of the soil for which they fought. The battle scene was imposing;—the ground was in the immediate neighbourhood of a city, whose inhabitants were

His next oration was delivered March 6th, 1775. It was at his own solicitation that he was appointed to this duty a second time. The fact is illustrative of his character, and worthy of remembrance. Some British officers of the army then in Boston had publicly declared that it should be at the price of the life of any man to speak of the event of the 5th of March, 1770, on that anniversary. Warren's soul took fire at such a threat, so openly made and he wished for the honour of braving it. This was readily granted, for at such a time a man would probably find but few rivals. Many who would spurn the thought of personal fear, might be apprehensive that they would be so far disconcerted as to forget their discourse. It is easier to fight bravely, than to think clearly or correctly in danger. Passion sometimes nerves the arm to fight, but disturbs the regular current of thought. The day came, and the weather was remarkably fine. The Old South Meeting House was crowded at an early hour. The British officers occupied the aisles, the flight of steps to the pulpit, and several of them were within it. It was not precisely known whether this was accident or design. The orator, with the assistance of his friends, made his entrance at the pulpit window by a ladder. The officers, seeing his coolness and intrepidity, made way for him to advance and address the audience. An awful stillness preceded his exordium. Each man felt the palpitations of his own heart, and saw the pale but determined face of his neighbour. The speaker began his oration in a firm tone of voice, and proceeded with great energy and pathos. Warren and his friends were prepared to chastise contumely, prevent disgrace, and avenge an attempt at assassination.

The scene was sublime; a patriot, in whom the flush of youth, and the grace and dignity of manhood, were combined, stood armed in the sanctuary of God, to animate and encourage the sons of liberty, and to hurl defiance at their oppressors. The orator commenced with the early history of the country, described the tenure by which we held our liberties and property, the affection we had constantly shown the parent country, and boldly told them how, and by whom, these blessings of life had been violated. There was in this appeal to Britain, in this description of suffering, agony, and horror, a calm and high-souled defiance, which must have chilled the blood of every sensible foe. Such another hour has seldom happened in the history of man, and is not surpassed in the records of nations. The thunders of Demosthenes rolled at a distance from Philip and his host, and Tully poured the fiercest torrent of his invective when Catiline was at a distance, and his dagger no longer to be feared; but Warren's speech was made to proud oppressors, resting on their arms, whose errand it was to overawe, and whose business it was to fight.

If the deed of Brutus deserved to be commemorated by history poetry, painting, and sculpture, should not this instance of patriotism and bravery be held in lasting remembrance? If he "that struck the foremost man of all this world," was hailed as the first of freemen, what honours are not due to him, who, undismayed, bearded the British lion, to show the world what his countrymen dared to do in the cause of liberty? If the statue of Brutus was placed amongst those of the gods, who were the preservers of Roman freedom, should not that of Warren fill a lofty niche in the temple reared to perpetuate the remembrance of our birth as a nation?

If independence was not at first openly avowed by our leading men, at that time, the hope of attaining it was fondly cherished, and the exertions of the patriots pointed to this end. The wise knew that the storm, which the political Prosperos were raising, would pass away in blood. With these impressions on his mind, Warren for several years was preparing himself by study and observation to take a conspicuous rank in the military arrangements which he knew must ensue.

On the 18th of April, 1775, by his agents in Boston, he discovered the design of the British commander to seize or destroy our few stores at Concord. He instantly despatched several confidential messengers to Lexington. The late venerable patriot, Paul watching the progress of events, anxious for their nearest friends;—the roar of cannon from ships of war, and from floating and stationary batteries, followed or commingled with incessant volleys of musketry—a well-built and compact town, seen in

Revere, was one of them. This gentleman has given a very interesting account of the difficulties he encountered in the discharge of this duty. The alarm was given, and the militia, burning with resentment, were, at day break, on the 19th, on the road to repel insult and aggression. The drama was opened about sunrise, within a few yards of the house of God, in Lexington. Warren hastened to the field of action, in the full ardour of his soul, and shared the dangers of the day. While pressing on the enemy, a musket ball took off a lock of his hair close to his ear. The lock was rolled and pinned after the fashion of that day, and considerable force must have been necessary to have cut it away. The people were delighted with his cool, collected bravery, and already considered him as a leader, whose gallantry they were to admire, and in whose talents they were to confide.

On the 14th of June, 1775, the provincial congress of Massachusetts made him a major-general of their forces; but, previous to the date of his commission, he had been unceasing in his exertions to maintain order and enforce discipline amongst the troops, which had hastily assembled at Cambridge, after the battle of Lexington. He mingled in the ranks, and by every method and argument strove to inspire them with confidence, and succeeded in a most wonderful manner in imparting to them a portion of the flame which glowed in his own breast. At such a crisis, genius receives its birth-right, the homage of inferior minds, who for self-preservation, are willing to be directed. Previous to receiving the appointment of major-general, he had been requested to take the office of physician general to the army, but he chose to be where wounds were to be made, rather than where they were to be healed. Yet he lent his aid and advice to the medical department of the army, and was of great service to them in their organization and arrangements.

He was at this time president of the provincial congress, having been elected the preceding year a member from the town of Boston. In this body he discovered his extraordinary powers of mind, and his peculiar fitness for responsible offices at such a juncture. Cautious in proposing measures, he was assiduous in pursuing what he thought, after mature deliberation, to be right, and never counted the probable cost of a measure, when he had decided that it was necessary to be taken. When this congress, which was sitting at Watertown, adjourned for the day, he mounted his horse, and hastened to the camp. Every day "he bought golden opinions of all sorts of men;" and when the troops were called to act on Breed's Hill, he had so often been amongst them, that his person was known to most of the soldiers.

Several respectable historians have fallen into some errors in describing the battle in which he fell, by giving the command of the troops, on that day, to Warren, when he was only a volunteer in the fight. He did not arrive on the battle ground until the enemy had commenced their movements for the attack. As soon as he made his appearance on the field, the veteran commander of the day, Colonel Prescott, desired to act under his direction; but Warren declined taking any other part than that of a volunteer, and added, that he came to learn the art of war from an experienced soldier, whose orders he should be happy to obey. In the battle he was armed with a musket, and stood in the ranks, now and then changing his place, to encourage his fellow soldiers by words and example. He undoubtedly, from the state of hostilities, expected soon to act in his high military capacity, and it was indispensable, according to his views, that he should share the dangers of the field as a common soldier with his fellow citizens, that his reputation for bravery might be put beyond the possibility of suspicion. The wisdom of such a course would never have been doubted, if he had returned in safety from the fight. In such a struggle for independence, the ordinary rules of prudence and caution could not govern those who were building up their names for future usefulness by present exertion. Some maxims drawn from the republione mass of flames,—and all this, but the commencement of troubles,—was a sight appalling to every American, and seemed to shake even the enemy, in both mind and body. The British troops, in considerable numbers, occupied the hill that night, can writers of antiquity, were worn as their mottos. Some precepts descriptive of the charms of liberty, were ever on their tongues, and some classical model of Greek or Roman patriotism, was constantly in their minds. Instances of great men mixing in the ranks of common soldiers, were to be found in ancient times, when men fought for their altars and their homes. The cases were parallel, and the examples were imposing. When the battle was decided, and our people fled, Warren was one of the last who left the breast-work, and was slain within a few yards of it, as he was slowly retiring. He probably felt mortified at the event of the day; but, had he known how dearly the victory was purchased, and how little honour was gained by those who won it, his heart might have been at rest. Like the band of Leonidas, the vanquished have received by the judgment of nations, from which there is no appeal, the imperishable laurels of victors. His death brought a sickness to the heart of the community, and the people mourned his fall, not with the convulsive agony of a betrothed virgin over the bleeding corse of her lover, but with the pride of the Spartan mother, who, in the intensity of her grief, smiled to see that the wounds whence life had flown, were on the breast of her son, and was satisfied that he had died in defence of his country. The worth of the victim, and the horror of the sacrifice, gave a higher value to our liberties, and produced a more fixed determination to preserve them.

This eminence has become sacred ground. It contains in its bosom the ashes of the brave, who died fighting to defend their altars and their homes. Strangers from all countries visit this spot, for it is associated in their memories with Marathon and Plataea, and all the mighty struggles of determined freemen. Our citizens love to wander over this field—the aged to awake recollections, and the youthful to excite heroic emotions. The battle-ground is now all plainly to be seen—the spirit of modern improvement, which would stop the streams of Helicon to turn a mill, and cause to be felled the trees of Paradise to make a rafter, has yet spared this hallowed height.

If "the days of chivalry be gone for ever," and the high and enthusiastic feelings of generosity and magnanimity be not so widely diffused as in more heroic ages, yet it cannot be denied but that there have been, and still are, individuals whose bosoms are warmed with a spirit as glowing and ethereal, as ever swelled the heart of "mailed knight," who, in the ecstasies of love, religion, and martial glory, joined the war-cry on the plains of Palestine, or proved his steel on the infidel foe. The history of every revolution is interspersed with brilliant episodes of individual prowess. The pages of our own history, when fully written out, will sparkle profusely with these gems of romantic valour.

The calmness and indifference of the veteran "in clouds of dust and seas of blood," can only be acquired by long acquaintance with the trade of death; but the heights of Charlestown will bear eternal testimony how suddenly, in the cause of freedom, the peaceful citizen can become the invincible warrior; stung by oppression, he springs forward from his tranquil pursuits, undaunted by opposition, and undismayed by danger, to fight even to death for the defence of his rights. Parents, wives, children, and country, all the hallowed properties of existence, are to him the talisman that takes fear from his heart, and nerves his arm to victory. In the requiem over those who have fallen in the cause of their country, which "Time, with his own eternal lips, shall sing," the praises of Warren shall be distinctly heard.

The blood of those patriots who have fallen in the defence of republics, has often "cried from the ground," against the ingratitude of the country for which it was shed. No monument was reared to their fame; no record of their virtues written; no fostering hand extended to their offspring; but they and their deeds were neglected and forgotten. Towards Warren there was no ingratitude—our country is free from this stain. Congress were the guardians of his and enlarged the redoubt to nearly twice the original extent; yet they did not venture to light their fires, but laboured by the sinking, flickering lights, which shot up from the smouldering ruins of Charlestown. For the Americans, struggling for liberty; the event of this battle was most fortunate. Their troops had done enough for honour; enough to produce an impression of their prowess on the minds of their enemies; enough to give them confidence in themselves; and to show that they had learnt something in the way of preparing themselves to correct the errors of judgment in planning a fight. They suffered enough to feel their loss deeply, and yet not sufficiently in any way to weaken their forces. The wound received was too deep to be healed at once; the sight was too awful to be soon forgotten.

If the army had come down from Cambridge and Roxbury to the succour, the British would have been destroyed altogether; but from the disposition of the king of England at this period, and the spirit of the ministry, the whole force of the British nation would have been brought to crush the Americans at once.

The battle was fought on Saturday afternoon. Before Sunday night the intelligence was spread more than a hundred miles distant from the scene of action. All were roused to the highest pitch of resentment, and set about preparing themselves for a long and bloody struggle. Companies were raised and equipped with the utmost despatch; all hopes of reconciliation were lost. Squads of armed men flocked to head quarters, some of them having travelled eighty miles in twenty-four hours.

To show the character of the men who had entered upon the duties of this important revolution, we need honour, and remembered that his children were unprotected orphans. Within a year after his death, congress passed the following resolution:—

“That a monument be erected to the memory of General Warren, in the town of Boston, with the following inscription:—

In honour of

Major-General of Massachusetts Bay.

He devoted his life to the liberties of his country,
And in bravely defending them, fell an early victim in the BATTLE OF BUNKER HILL,

June 17, 1775.

The Congress of the United States, as an acknowledgment of his services and distinguished merit, have erected this monument to his memory.”

It was resolved, likewise, “that the eldest son of General Warren should be educated from that time at the expense of the United States.” On the first of July, 1780, congress, recognising these former resolutions, further resolved, “that it should be recommended to the executive of Massachusetts Bay, to make provision for the maintenance and education of his three younger children, and that congress would defray the expense to the amount of the half pay of a major-general, to commence at the time of his death, and only to notice the fact, that the provincial congress, then sitting at Watertown, about six miles from the battle-field, proceeded, as usual, with their business; and no mention is made of the battle on their records, until three days afterwards, when a member moved that the body should proceed to elect a president, as it was believed that Doctor Joseph Warren, who had filled the chair, had been slain on the 17th, at Bunker Hill. His place was supplied, and a committee was appointed to collect and publish all the circumstances of the fight. This was only partially executed at the time. It was reserved for the lapse of half a century, to complete the record for history. When the corner stone of Bunker Hill monument was about to be laid, the legislature of Massachusetts invited, by a resolve of that body, all the survivors of that day's fight, to repair, at the expense of the commonwealth, to Charlestown, to take a part in the ceremonies. This invitation was accepted by more than fifty veterans, who, on their arrival, stated, under the solemnity of an oath, the circumstances within their recollections, of the battle. That which had been doubtful and contradictory, was made plain and satisfactory from comparing all these statements of these honest veterans.]

While most of the colonies afforded sufficient occupation for the watchfulness of the British government, those of New England called forth the most vigorous efforts of the royalists, both by sea and land. The naval forces were frequently engaged in destroying armed American vessels, congress having fitted out several, which were very successful in capturing store ships sent with supplies of provisions and ammunition for the royal army.* At Gloucester, the continue till the youngest of the children should be of age.” The part of the resolutions relating to the education of the children, was carried into effect accordingly. The monument is not yet erected, but it is not too late. The shade of Warren will not repine at this neglect, while the ashes of Washington repose without grave stone or epitaph.—Knapp's American Biography.

* After the war had begun in earnest, Washington gave commission and authority to take, and bring in, such vessels as our cruisers could capture, belonging to the British government, on the high seas. By virtue of this authority, several rich prizes were taken, some of them loaded with munitions of war, which came timely to the American army. Several vessels being private property which had been taken by these cruisers, were promptly released. Congress sanctioned his proceedings as justifiable and proper, and at once turned their attention to a naval force. In 1776, they appointed twenty-four captains of the navy, and a few lieutenants, leaving it to the naval committee to appoint the others; and, at the same time, authorized the building of sixteen ships of war, and several smaller vessels. This, with the force which was then already in the possession of the several states, a part of which were sold to congress, soon made a respectable naval force. The work of building went bravely on, for the merchants were deeply interested in it, and readily loaned the money to government for their building, or trusted the national contractor for materials necessary in getting this naval force into effective operation. Some of the ships were as large as thirty-two's, and from these down to four's. After this, larger vessels were built, but only one seventy-four, however, and she was never in our service. These were commanded by brave men, and there was no act of cowardice known in the American navy during the revolutionary war. There might have been a few instances of indecorum and want of discretion, but none of cowardice.

But to be a little more minute in this history, as it is important to examine our beginnings as a nation, in November, 1775, the legislature of Massachusetts passed a spirited act, by which they authorized and encouraged the fitting out of private armed vessels, to defend the sea coast of America; and at the same time created a court of admiralty, to try and condemn all vessels that should be found infesting the same. The preamble to this act was written by the late vice-president, Mr. Gerry, and it is a bold and an ingenious exposition of the sovereign rights of the people in such an exigency, founded on the royal charter of William and Mary, under which the affairs of the province of Massachusetts had been administered for more than eighty years. The body of the act was penned by Mr. Sullivan, late governor of Massachusetts, an early and firm patriot of the revolution. On the 16th of December of that year, the government of Massachusetts resolved to fit out ten vessels to go to the West Indies for military stores. On the 29th of this month, John Adams and J. Palmer were appointed by the legislature of Massachusetts, a committee to prepare and report a plan for fitting out armed vessels. On the 8th of January following, eight thousand pounds were voted for the purpose of making a respectable marine force for the province. On the 11th of January, 1776, it was resolved in council, to build two frigates, one of thirty-six, and the other of thirty-two guns. On the 7th of February, it was resolved by the whole court to build ten sloops of war, to carry sixteen guns each. Ten thousand pounds were appropriated to this purpose. Some of these vessels were built, and some others were hired, so that Massachusetts soon had quite a respectable naval force on the high seas at their disposal. At the close of the year 1775, congress commissioned several vessels of war, six sloops, and thirteen galleys; but they were restrained to the taking of public property. After the declaration of independence, when there was no prospect of peace for a season, or at least until Great Britain had tried the strength of the United Colonies, the marine was greatly increased, and twenty-four vessels were put in commission, and additions were made from time to time to this respectable force. These vessels were commanded by high-spirited and intelligent men, who were wonderfully successful; for in the course of three years they had taken more than double the number of their own guns from the enemy, besides a great number of merchantmen of value. More than eight hundred guns had been taken from the enemy during this time, by the marine which congress had fitted out; while that of Massachusetts, and of the other states, were equally successful. The vessels taken by the public and private armed vessels, from the battle of Lexington to the 17th of March, 1776, when the British evacuated Boston, amounted to thirty-four, of considerable size and value, with excellent cargoes. The tonnage of these captured vessels amounted to three thousand six hundred and forty-five tons. In 1776, the British vessels captured by the private armed vessels, alone, amounted to the great number of three hundred and forty-two, of which forty-four were retaken, eighteen released, and five burnt. In the following year, 1777, the success of our privateers was still greater. Vessels were captured to the amount of four hundred and twenty-one. The success continued without any great diminution until 1780. At this time the British merchants made so strong an appeal to their government, that they provided a convoy for every fleet of merchant vessels to every part of the globe. Out of the fleet sailing from England to the West Indies, consisting of two hundred in number, in the year 1777, one hundred and thirty-seven were taken by our privateers; and from a fleet from Ireland to the West Indies, of sixty sail, thirty-five were taken. Taking the years 1775, 6, 7, 8, and 9, say for the first year, thirty-four; were so warmly received by the militia who had collected on the shore, that the captain thought it necessary to send a re-enforcement, and to commence second, three hundred and forty-two; third, four hundred and twenty-one; and for the fourth, which has not been accurately given, I believe, in any work, say, and this within bounds, two hundred; and for the fifth, the same, two hundred; and allowing but one hundred for the balance of the time during the war, will make twelve hundred and ninety-seven, without including those taken by public vessels from 1776 to the close of the war; and this latter number, if it could be precisely given, would add greatly to the list of captures. The marine, undoubtedly, fell off towards the close of the war, from several causes; one, the difficulties in the finance of the country, and from the great exertions of the Admiralty of England in capturing our privateers. They had become alarmed from the complaints of their merchants, and the rise of insurance against capture, which reached an extent unknown before or since. The French navy, after that time, joined us in the war, and was in itself so powerful, that our smaller vessels were not wanted to co-operate with the land forces as before. Besides the defence of Charleston and Philadelphia, which were engagements that ought to be ranked among the most memorable events in our revolutionary contest, there were others all along the seaboard, of less note, but in themselves spirited affairs. Rhode Island, Philadelphia, and Charleston, have high claims for naval distinction, and for constant efforts on the high seas, during the war.

Our naval affairs were managed by a marine committee in congress, who were as active and efficient as their limited means would allow. They had the admiralty code of England and Holland before them, and took such parts of it as would answer the purpose of their design. The committee of congress did wonders, considering their means, and the difficulties they had to encounter. John Adams was an efficient member of this committee; and, delighted with the course pursued by the merchants of the Netherlands, in gaining their independence and raising their national character, he studied their state papers, ruminated upon their history, and found it wise to copy their policy. He was born and educated among a mercantile people, and was well acquainted with their true interests. He saw an extended seaboard, and knew it were folly to defend our harbours and seaports without a naval force. To him and his co-adjutors are we indebted for the shape our infant navy took, and for the Herculean tasks she performed, as it were, in the cradle. It is not to be denied, however, that he had the cordial co-operation of all the efficient members in congress in every state, whether more or less maritime; for these enlightened men saw what a mighty engine of power this force might be made in a foreign war; and they soon saw, too, how much a matter of gain it was in that day. John Adams has deservedly been considered the father of the American navy. His disposition was of that prompt, effective, and daring character, that made him delight in the naval glories of his country. He knew that Great Britain was henceforth to be separated from us, and that it was only by cherishing a desire for naval distinction, that we were ever to contend upon equal ground with her. This he declared almost as soon as he saw the conflict gathering, and the storm ready to burst, long before he had assisted the people, or their representatives, to brace themselves up for the declaration of independence. A naval force was thought by all to be necessary at that day. It was long since that period, that the establishment of this great engine of national defence, was considered of questionable policy. Then the representatives of all the states concurred most heartily in doing every thing in their power to encourage the increase of our naval force. The success of the privateers gave an elasticity and spirit to the people, that nothing else could have given. It gave them wealth also, through the medium of enterprise and valour. The seaports were full of the bustle of preparation for cruising and reception of prizes. Articles of merchandise were common, and of a quality the frugality and economy of our people had never permitted them to think of before. These articles were of use to citizens and soldiers, and the sale and purchase gave a specious form to business. A great part of the capital on which they were obtained, was the hardihood and daring of the people. This success inspired cannonading the town. A very smart action ensued, which was kept up for several hours, but resulted in the complete defeat of the assailants, leaving upwards of thirty prisoners in the hands of the Americans. This repulse excited the British to deeds of revenge upon several of the defenceless towns on the coast, and to declare that many of them should be reduced to ashes, unless the inhabitants consented to an unconditional compliance with all their demands. Another occurrence also tended to mutual exasperation. In compliance with a resolution of the provincial congress to prevent Tories from conveying out their effects, the inhabitants of Falmouth, in the north-eastern part of Massachusetts, had obstructed the loading of a mast ship. The destruction of the town was therefore determined on, as an example of vindictive punishment. Captain Mowat, detached for that purpose with armed vessels by Admiral Greaves, arrived off the place on the evening of the 17th of October, and gave notice to the inhabitants that he would allow them two hours "to remove the human species." Upon being solicited to afford some explanation of this extraordinary summons, he replied, that he had orders to set on fire all the seaport towns from Boston to Halifax, and that he supposed New York was already in ashes. He could dispense with his orders, he said, on no terms but the compliance of the inhabitants to deliver up their arms and ammunition, and their sending on board a supply of provisions, and four of the principal persons in the town, as hostages that they should engage not to unite with their country in any kind of opposition to Britain; and the army likewise; for they saw that sailors of a new creation could meet, and dared fight, the hardy sons of Neptune born in old England, and educated in the best of fleets in the world; and that these veterans were often found to yield to American sailors, of but a few months discipline on the high seas.

In the bustle that privateering created, the loss of lives and limbs was forgotten, and the pride of conquest, and the joy of the possession of property won by daring, concealed the pain of many wounds, and perhaps healed a great many that a want of success might have festered and rendered immedicable. In an army, individual bravery seldom finds an opportunity for display, while in these sea-fights almost every one had an opportunity of showing his prowess. These mariners on board a privateer were sharers in the success of every enterprise, often a better, or stronger motive, for brave deeds, than the sound of a name. It was often that they had an opportunity of selecting the commander under whom they would serve; and men so situated, are generally sagacious in discerning the merits of their superiors; particularly when that merit, in a good measure, consisted in overt acts, of which they were as good judges as men of higher grades of mind, and of higher rank in society. Several of these commanders of privateers were men of original and commanding talent, and deserve to be handed down to posterity, as well as the leaders of small bands in the primitive wars of the classical ages. Manly, Mugford, Jones, Waters, Young, Tucker, Talbot, Nicholson, Williams, Biddle, Hopkins, Robinson, and many others, who were either in the service of one of the state sovereignties at that time, or in the service he assured them, that, on a refusal of these conditions, he should lay the town in ashes within three hours. Unprepared for the attack, the inhabitants, by entreaty, obtained the suspension of an answer till the morning, and employed this interval in removing their families and effects. The next day, Captain Mowat commenced a furious cannonade and bombardment; and a great number of people, standing on the heights, were spectators of the conflagration, which reduced many of them to penury and despair. More than four hundred houses and stores were burnt. Newport, Rhode Island, being threatened with a similar attack, was compelled to stipulate for a weekly supply to avert it.

Warlike operations were not confined to the sea ports. Their success in the reduction of Ticonderoga and Crown Point stimulated the Americans to more extensive operations in the north; and the movements of Sir G. Carleton, the governor of Canada, appeared to call for them, congress having reason to believe that a formidable invasion was intended from that quarter. The management of military affairs in this department had been committed to the Generals Schuyler and Montgomery. On the 10th of September, about one thousand American troops effected a landing at St. John's, the first British port in Canada, lying one hundred and fifteen miles only to the northward of Ticonderoga, but found it advisable to retreat to Isle aux Noix, twelve miles south of St John's. An extremely bad state of health soon after inducing General Schuyler to retire to Ticonderoga, the command devolved on General Montgomery. That enterprising officer, in a few days returned to the vicinity of St. John's, and opened a battery against it; and the reduction of Fort Chamblee, by a small detachment, giving him possession of six tons of gunpowder, enabled him to prosecute the siege of St. John's with vigour. General Carleton advanced against him with about eight hundred men; but, in attempting to cross the St. Lawrence, with the intention of landing at Longueil, he was attacked by Colonel Warner, at the head of three hundred Green Mountain boys, and compelled to retire with precipitancy. This repulse induced the garrison of St. John's to surrender, on honourable terms of capitulation.

of congress, have been noticed by the writers of biography in times past; but there are many more who are equally worthy of notice. who have been neglected, because they were only commanders of privateers. It ought, however, to be considered, that our vessels of war were small, and did not, in general, carry more guns or men than some of our privateers at that time; and the commanders of both classes of vessels, those of the United States and those of private citizens, were educated and trained alike, and had equal sagacity, skill, and success. Scarcely a day passed, from the summer of 1775 to 1780, that the people were not animated with the news of some sea fight, and generally victory was on our side; for these privateers were built for quick sailing, and when they thought the fight would be at odds against them, they out-sailed the enemy, and escaped to annoy them in some other quarter. These commanders, in general, were men of standing, honour, and principle, and never suffered themselves to sink into petty tyrants, or lawless bucaniers, in their manners or feelings. Instances of the most magnanimous conduct among them, might be given. In several cases of capture, when they understood the owners were friendly to the cause of America, the vessels and crews were suffered to depart without losing a particle of property. In the vessels taken by these privateers, as in the public armed ships, the officers were never deprived of their baggage, and often were allowed their adventures, if their owners had allowed them such privileges, and they had any on board. Some few of these commanders of privateers have lived down to our time.—American Editor.

While Montgomery was prosecuting the siege of St. John's, Colonel Ethan Allen, who had been despatched on a service necessary to that object, hearing that Montreal was in a defenceless state, attempted its capture without the knowledge of his superior in command; he was, however, with part of his detachment, taken prisoner, and, to the disgrace of General Carleton, loaded with irons, and in that state sent to England. "It is impossible to think of the fate of this heroic partisan, without regretting that wild spirit of independence which spurned even at the most necessary and proper subordination in the revolutionary fathers. If Colonel Allen had consulted the general, as was unquestionably his duty, the whole fate of the Canadian expedition might have been changed. He would either have received such re-enforcements as would have rendered his object attainable without hazard, or he would have been forbidden to undertake it; and the assistance of his daring courage and skill might have prevented the fate which subsequently befell General Montgomery before Quebec."* After the capture of St. John's, Montgomery directed his attention to Montreal, with different success. On his approach, the few British troops there repaired on board the shipping, in hopes of escaping down the river; but General Prescott, and several officers, with about one hundred and twenty privates, were intercepted, and made prisoners on capitulation; eleven sail of vessels, with all their contents, fell into the hands of the provincials. Governor Carleton was secretly conveyed away in a boat with muffled paddles, and arrived safely at Quebec. General Montgomery, leaving some troops in Montreal, and sending detachments into different parts of the province to encourage the Canadians and to forward provisions, advanced with his little army to Quebec, where he found, to his surprise, that a body of American troops had arrived before.

General Washington, foreseeing that the whole force of Canada would be concentrated about Montreal, had projected an expedition against Quebec in a different direction from that of Montgomery. His plan was to send out a detachment from his camp before Boston, to march by way of Kennebeck River; and, passing through the dreary wilderness lying between the settled parts of the province of Maine and the St. Lawrence, to penetrate into Canada about ninety miles below Montreal. This extraordinary and most arduous enterprise was committed to Colonel Arnold, who, with one thousand one hundred men, consisting of New England infantry, some volunteers, a company of artillery, and three companies of riflemen, commenced his march on the 13th of September. It is almost impossible to conceive the labour, hardships, and difficulties, which this detachment had to encounter in their progress up the rapid stream of the Kennebeck, frequently interrupted by falls, where they were obliged to land and carry the boats upon their shoulders, until they surmounted them, through a country wholly uninhabited, with a scanty supply of provisions, the season cold and rainy, and the men daily dropping down with fatigue, sickness, and hunger. Arnold was indefatigable in his endeavours to alleviate the distresses of his men, but to procure provisions for them was not in his power. They were at one time reduced to so great an extremity of hunger, that the dogs belonging to the army were killed and eaten, and many of the soldiers devoured their leather cartouch boxes. Arnold and his party at length arrived at Point Levi, opposite the town of Quebec; but in consequence of information the British had received, by the treachery of the Indian to whom Arnold had intrusted a letter to General Schuyler, the boats which he expected to find there to transport his troops across the river had been removed, and the enemy were no longer in a state to be surprised. Arnold, however, was not to be deterred from attempting something against the town—he calculated strongly upon the defection of the inhabitants; and having supplied himself with canoes, he crossed the river in the night, and gained possession of the heights of Abraham. Here, though he had no artillery, and scarcely half the number of men that composed the garrison of the town, he made a bold experiment to try the loyalty of the enemy's troops, by sending a flag to summon them to surrender. But no message would be admitted, and Arnold found himself compelled to retire to more comfortable quarters, where he awaited the arrival of General Montgomery.

General Carleton, who it has already been stated arrived at Quebec, had taken the best measures for its defence, and was prepared to receive him. In a few days, the American general opened a six-gun battery within about seven hundred yards of the walls; but his artillery was too light to make a breach, and he could do nothing more than amuse the enemy, and conceal his real purpose. After continuing a siege nearly a month, he resolved on a desperate attempt to carry the place by escalade. To distract the garrison, two feigned attacks were made on the upper town by two divisions of the army under Majors Brown and Livingston, while two real attacks on opposite sides of the lower town were made by two other divisions under Montgomery and Arnold. Early in the morning of the last day in the year, the signal was given, and the several divisions moved to the assault in the midst of a heavy fall of snow, which covered the assailants from the sight of the enemy. Montgomery, at the head of the New York troops, advanced along the St. Lawrence, by Auncie de Mere, under Cape Diamond. The first barrier to be surmounted on that side was defended by a battery, in which were mounted a few pieces of artillery, in front of which were a blockhouse and picket. The guard at the blockhouse, after giving a random fire, threw away their arms and fled to the barrier, and for a time the battery itself was deserted. Enormous piles of ice impeded the progress of the Americans, who, pressing forward in a narrow defile, reached at length the blockhouse and picket. Montgomery, who was in front, assisted in cutting down or pulling up the pickets, and advanced boldly and rapidly at the head of about two hundred men, to force the barrier. By this time one or two persons had ventured to return to the battery, and, seizing a slow match, discharged one of the guns. Casual as this fire appeared, it was fatal to General Montgomery and to two valuable young officers near his person, who, together with his orderly sergeant and a private, were killed on the spot. Colonel Campbell, on whom the command devolved, precipitately retired with the remainder of the division.—In the mean time, Colonel Arnold, at the head of about three hundred and fifty men, made a desperate attack on the opposite side. Advancing with the utmost intrepidity along the St. Charles, through a narrow path, exposed to an incessant fire of grape shot and musketry, as he approached the first barrier at the Saut des Matelots, he received a musket ball in the leg, which shattered the bone, and he was carried off to the camp. Captain Morgan, who commanded a company of Virginia riflemen, rushed forward to the batteries at their head, and received a discharge of grape shot, which killed one man only. A few rifles were immediately fired into the embrasures, and the barricade was mounted; the battery was instantly deserted, but the captain of the guard, with the greater part of his men, fell into the hands of the Americans. Morgan formed his men, but from the darkness of the night and total ignorance of the situation of the town, it was judged unadvisable to proceed. He was soon joined by Lieutenant-colonel Green and Majors Bigelow and Meigs, with several fragments of companies, amounting collectively to about two hundred men. At daylight this gallant party was again formed; but after a bloody and desperate engagement, in which they sustained the force of the whole garrison three hours, they were compelled to surrender themselves prisoners of war.*

After this brave but disastrous assault, the commander of the American troops did not muster more than four hundred effective men: in the hope, however, of receiving reinforcements, they maintained a position at a short distance from Quebec; and, although the garrison was very superior in numbers, the bravery the colonists had evinced, and the mixed character of his own troops, disinclined General Carleton from leaving his ramparts to attack the Americans.

The existence of armed vessels in the service of the colonies has already been adverted to. From the peculiar situation of Massachusetts, it was perceived that important advantages might be gained by employing armed vessels on the coasts, to prevent the British from collecting provisions from any places accessible to them, and to capture the enemy's ships loaded with military stores. Before the subject of a naval armament was taken up by congress, it appears that not only Massachusetts, but Rhode Island and Connecticut, had each of them two vessels, at

* In Montgomery the Americans lost one of the bravest and most accomplished generals that ever led an army to the field. But he was not more illustrious for his skill and courage as an officer, than he was estimable for his private virtues. All enmity to him on the part of the British ceased with his life, and respect to his private character prevailed over all other considerations. His body was taken up the next day, and he was decently interred.—Montgomery was a gentleman of good family in Ireland, who, having married a lady and purchased an estate in New York, considered himself as an American, and had served with reputation in the late French war. Congress directed a monument to be erected to his memory, with an inscription expressive of their veneration for his character, and of their deep sense of his "many signal and important services; and to transmit to future ages, as examples truly worthy of imitation, his patriotism, conduct, boldness of enterprise, insuperable perseverance, and contempt of danger and death." A monument of white marble, with emblematic devices, has accordingly been erected to his memory, in front of St. Paul's church, in New York.

least, fitted, armed, and equipped by the colonial authorities. Subsequently, the general court of Massachusetts passed an act for encouraging the fitting out of armed vessels to defend the sea coast of America, and for erecting a court to try and condemn all vessels that should be found infesting the same. Shortly afterwards, a committee of congress, appointed to devise ways and means for fitting out a naval armament, brought in their report, which was adopted. It was resolved to fit out for sea thirteen ships, five of thirty-two guns, five of twenty-eight, and three of twenty-four guns; a committee was nominated, with full powers to carry the report into execution with all possible expedition, and Ezekiel Hopkins was appointed commander. Thus commenced the American navy. The advantages that had been anticipated from armed vessels were soon experienced. Captain Manly, of Marblehead, one of the first who put to sea, on the 29th of November took an ordnance brig from Woolwich, containing, besides a large brass mortar, several pieces of fine brass cannon, a large quantity of small arms and ammunition, with all kinds of tools, utensils, and machines, necessary for camps and artillery; and, nine days after, three ships, from London, Glasgow, and Liverpool, with various stores for the British army. A brig, with fifteen thousand pounds of powder, was captured by a vessel fitted out by the council of safety of South Carolina. The supplies obtained by these means were of vast importance to the American army, which was in very great want of ammunition and military stores.

Among other measures tending to promote the general welfare, congress resolved that a line of posts should be appointed from Falmouth, in New England, to Savannah, in Georgia; and Benjamin Franklin was unanimously chosen postmaster-general. They also directed the establishment of an hospital, adequate to the necessities of an army consisting of twenty thousand men; and Dr. Church was appointed director and physician of the establishment.*

General Washington, on his first arrival in camp, had found the materials for a good army; but they were in the crudest state. The troops having been raised by different colonial governments, no uniformity existed among the regiments; and imbued by the spirit of that very liberty for which they were preparing to fight, and unaccustomed to discipline, they neither felt an inclination to be subject to military rules, nor realized the importance of being so. The difficulty of establishing subordination was greatly increased by the shortness of the terms of enlistment, some of which were to expire in November, and none to continue longer than December. Various causes operated to lead congress to the almost fatal plan of temporary military establishments. Among the most important of these were a prospect of accommodation with the parent state, and the want of experience in the management of war upon an extensive scale. It is true, the revolutionary conflict placed the people of America in a situation in which all the energies of the human mind are brought into action, and in which man makes his noblest efforts; the occasion called upon the public theatre statesmen and warriors, who, by the wise and honourable execution of the complicated duties of their new characters, surprised the world; but even from them errors of inexperience were inevitable. The fear of accumulating expenses which the resources of the country could not discharge, had a further influence to deter the American government from the adoption of permanent military establishments; for, although the recommendations of congress, and the regulations of state conventions had, in the day of enthusiasm, the force of law, yet the ruling power thought it inexpedient to attempt to raise large sums by direct taxes, at a time when the commerce of the country was annihilated, and the cultivators of the ground were subjected to heavy services in the field of war. The only recourse was to a paper medium, without funds for its redemption, or for the support of its credit, and therefore of necessity subject to depreciation, and, in its nature, capable of only a temporary currency; congress, therefore, was justly afraid of the expense of a permanent army. Jealousy of a standing army had also a powerful influence upon the military arrangements of America. Indeed this spirit early insinuated itself into the legislative bodies of the colonies, and was displayed in many of their measures: an indication of this feeling appears in the address presented by the provincial assembly of New York to General Washington, while on his journey

* Not long after his appointment, Dr. Church was detected in a traitorous correspondence with the British in Boston. He had sustained a high reputation as a patriot, and was at this time a member of the Massachusetts house of representatives. He was tried, convicted, and expelled from the house of representatives; and congress afterwards resolved, that he be closely confined in some secure goal in Connecticut, without the use of pen, ink, or paper; and that no person be allowed to converse with him, except in the presence and hearing of a magistrate, or the sheriff of the county.

Dr. Church was never confined in Connecticut, but was permitted to sail for the West Indies. The vessel he embarked in was lost, and every one on board of her perished. His traitorous intentions, since that period, have become problematical.—Am. Ed.

to the American camp. "We have the fullest assurance," say they, "that whenever this important contest shall be decided, by that fondest wish of each American soul, an accommodation with our mother country, you will cheerfully resign the important deposit committed to your hands, and reassume the character of our worthiest citizen." Congress, as a body, unquestionably participated in this jealousy, and was afraid to trust a standing army with the power necessary to conduct the war, lest, at its successful termination, this army should become the master of the country for whose liberties it had fought.

The want of subordination was by no means the only difficulty with which the commander in chief had to contend; he soon made the alarming discovery, that there was not more powder than would furnish each man with nine cartridges. Although this dangerous deficiency was carefully concealed from the enemy, yet the want of bayonets, which was very considerable, could not be kept secret. The army was also so destitute of tents as to be unavoidably lodged in barracks, a circumstance extremely unfavourable to sudden movements, to health, and to discipline.* There was no commissary general, and therefore no systematic arrangement for obtaining provisions; and a supply of clothes was rendered peculiarly difficult by the non-importation agreements. Added to this, there was a total want of engineers, and a great deficiency of working tools. The general, happily qualified at once to meet difficulties and to remove them, took immediate care to organize the troops, to fit them for actual service, and to make arrangements for the necessary supplies. Next to these objects, he considered the re-enlistment of the army the most interesting. To this essential point he had early solicited the attention of congress, assuring that body that he must despair of the liberties of his country, unless he were furnished with an army that should stand by him until the conclusion of their enterprise. Congress at length resolved to raise a standing army, to consist of about seventy-five thousand men, to serve for the term of three years, or during the war; and that it should be composed of eighty-eight battalions, to be raised in the colonies, according to their respective abilities. Recruiting orders were accordingly issued; but the progress in raising recruits was by no means proportioned to the public exigencies. On the last day of December, when all the old troops not engaged on the new establishments were disbanded, there had been enlisted for the army of 1776 no more than nine thousand six hundred and fifty men. An earnest recommendation of General Washington to congress to try the influence of a bounty was not acceded to until late in January; but during the winter the number of recruits was considerably augmented. "The history of the winter campaign," says the biographer of Washington, "is a history of continued and successive struggles on the part of the American general, under the vexations and difficulties imposed by the want of arms, ammunition, and permanent troops, on a person in an uncommon degree solicitous to prove himself, by some grand and useful achievement, worthy of the high station to which the voice of his country had called him."

In the space of time between the disbanding the old army, and the constitution of an effective force from the new recruits, the lines were often in a defenceless state; the English must have known the fact, and no adequate reason can be assigned why an attack was not made. "It is not," says General Washington, in his communications to congress, "in the pages of history to furnish a case like ours. To maintain a post within musket shot of the enemy, for six months together, without ammunition, and, at the same time, to disband one army and recruit another, within that distance of twenty odd British regiments, is more, probably, than ever was attempted. But if we succeed as well in the last as we have heretofore in the first, I shall think it the most fortunate event of my whole life." Such a measure, with the organization and discipline of the men, will be supposed to have employed every active power of the general; yet this did not satisfy his mind. He knew that congress anxiously contemplated more decisive steps, and that the country looked for events of greater magnitude. The public was ignorant of his actual situation, and conceived his means for offensive operations to be much greater than they were; and they expected from him the capture or expulsion of the British army in Boston. He felt the importance of securing the confidence of his countrymen by some brilliant action, and was fully sensible that his own reputation was liable to suffer if he confined himself solely to measures of defence. To publish to his anxious country the state of his army, would be to acquaint the enemy with his weakness, and to hazard his destruction. The firmness and patriotism of General Washington were displayed, in making the good of his country an object of higher consideration than the applause of those who were incapable of forming a correct opinion of the propriety of his measures. On this, and on many other occasions during the war, he withstood the voice of the populace, rejected the entreaties of the sanguine, and refused to adopt the plans of the rash, that he might ultimately secure the great object of contention. While he resolutely rejected every measure which in his calm and deliberate judgment he did not approve, he daily pondered the practicability of a successful attack upon Boston. As a preparatory step, he took possession of Plowed-hill, Cobble-hill, and Lechmere's Point, and erected fortifications upon them. These posts brought him within half a mile of the enemy's works on Bunker's-hill; and, by his artillery he drove the British floating batteries from their stations in Charles's River. He erected floating batteries to watch the movements of his enemy, and to aid in any offensive operations that circumstances might warrant. He took the opinion of his general officers a second time respecting the meditated attack; they again unanimously gave their opinion in opposition to the measure, and this opinion was immediately communicated to congress. Congress appeared still to favour the attempt, and, that an apprehension of danger to the town of Boston might not have an undue influence upon the operations of the army, resolved, "That if General Washington and his council of war should be of opinion that a successful attack might be made on the troops in Boston, he should make it in any manner he might think expedient, notwithstanding the town, and property therein, might thereby be destroyed."

General Howe had, in October, succeeded General Gage in the command of the British army, and through the winter confined himself to measures of defence. The inability of the American general to accomplish the great object of the campaign, repeatedly pointed out by congress, was doubtless a source of extreme mortification to him; but he indulged the hope of success in some military operations during the winter that would correspond with the high expectations of his country, and procure him honour in his exalted station of commander in chief of the American army. Early in January he summoned a council of war, in which it was resolved, "That a vigorous attempt ought to be made on the ministerial troops in Boston, before they can be reinforced in the spring, if the means can be provided, and a favourable opportunity shall offer."

It was not, however, till the middle of February that the ice became sufficiently strong for General Washington to march his forces upon it into Boston; he was then inclined to risk a general assault upon the British posts, although he had not powder to make any extensive use of his artillery; but his general officers in council voted against the attempt, and in their decision he reluctantly acquiesced. By the end of the month the stock of powder was considerably increased, and the regular army amounted to fourteen thousand men, which was reinforced by six thousand of the militia of Massachusetts. General Washington now resolved to take possession of the heights of Dorchester, in the prospect that this movement would bring on a general engagement with the enemy under favourable circumstances; or, should this expectation fail, that from this position he would be enabled to annoy the ships in the harbour, and the troops in the town. To mask the design, a severe cannonade and bombardment were opened on the British works and lines for several nights in succession. As soon as the firing began on the night of the 4th of March, a strong detachment marched from Roxbury over the neck of land connecting Roxbury with Dorchester Heights, and, without discovery, took possession of the heights. General Ward, who commanded the division of the army in Roxbury, had fortunately provided fascines before the resolution passed to fortify the place; these were of great use, as the ground was deeply frozen; and, in the course of the night, the party, by uncommon exertions, erected works sufficient for their defence. When the British discovered these works, nothing could exceed their astonishment. Their only alternative was either to abandon the town, or to dislodge the provincials. General Howe, with his usual spirit, chose the latter part of the alternative, and took measures for the embarkation on that very evening of five regiments, with the light infantry and grenadiers, on the important but most hazardous service. The transports fell down in the evening toward the castle with the troops, amounting to about two thousand men; but a tremendous storm at night rendered the execution of the design absolutely impracticable. A council of war was called the next morning, which agreed to evacuate the town as soon as possible. A fortnight elapsed before that measure was effected. Meanwhile, the Americans strengthened and extended their works; and on the morning of the 17th of March, the king's troops, with those Americans who were attached to the royal cause, began to embark; before ten, all of them were under sail. As the rear embarked, General Washington marched triumphantly into Boston, where he was joyfully received as a deliverer.

The issue of the campaign was highly gratifying to all classes; and the gratulation of his fellow-citizens upon the repossession of the metropolis of Massachusetts, was more pleasing to the commander in chief than would have been the honours of a triumph. Congress, to express the public approbation of the military achievements of their general, resolved, "That the thanks of congress, in their own name, and in the name of the thirteen united colonies, be presented to his excellency General Washington, and the officers and soldiers under his command, for their wise and spirited conduct in the siege and acquisition of Boston; and that a medal of gold be struck, in commemoration of this great event, and presented to his excellency." In his letter, informing congress that he had executed their order, and communicated to the army the vote of thanks, he says, "They were, indeed, at first, a band of undisciplined husbandmen; but it is, under God, to their bravery and attention to their duty, that I am indebted for that success which has procured me the only reward I wish to receive—the affection and esteem of my countrymen."

Although Halifax was mentioned as the destined place of the British armament, General Washington apprehended that New York was their object. On this supposition, he detached several brigades of his army to that city, before the evacuation of Boston; and as soon as the necessary arrangements were made in the latter city, he followed with the main body of his army to New York, where he arrived on the 14th of April. The situation of New York was highly favourable for an invading army, supported by a superior naval force; and General Washington doubted the practicability of a successful defence; but the importance of the place, the wishes of congress, the opinion of his general officers, and the expectation of his country, induced him to make the attempt; and the resolution being formed, he called into action all the resources in his power to effect it, and, with unremitted diligence, pushed on his works. Hulks were sunk in the North and East rivers; forts were erected on the most commanding situations on their banks; and works were raised to defend the narrow passage between Long and York Islands. The passes in the Highlands, bordering on the Hudson, became an object of early and solicitous attention. The command of this river was equally important to the American and the British general. By its possession, the Americans easily conveyed supplies of provision and ammunition to the northern army, and secured an intercourse between the southern and northern colonies essential to the success of the war. If the river were in the hands of the British, this necessary communication would be interrupted, and an intercourse between the Atlantic and Canada opened to them. General Washington ordered the passes to be fortified, and made their security an object of primary importance through every period of his command.

While these operations were carrying on in New England, General Arnold, under all his discouragements, continued the blockade of Quebec; but, in the month of May, in a council of war, it was unanimously determined, that the troops were in no condition to risk an assault, and the army was removed to a more defensible position. The Canadians at this juncture receiving considerable reinforcements, the Americans were compelled to relinquish one post after another, and by the 18th of June they had evacuated Canada.

In Virginia, the zeal and activity which had been excited by the spirited enterprise of Patrick Henry still continued to manifest themselves in various parts of the colony. The governor's family, alarmed by the threatening march of Mr. Henry towards Williamsburgh, had already taken refuge on board the Fowey man-of-war; and only a few weeks elapsed before Lord Dunmore himself adopted the same means of personal safety. Soon after fixing his residence on board the Fowey, his lordship required the house of burgesses to attend him there; but instead of obeying the requisition, they passed sundry resolutions, in which they declared that his lordship's message was "a high breach of the rights and privileges of the house," and that his conduct gave them reason to fear "that a dangerous attack was meditated against the unhappy people of the colony." On the 24th of July, the colonial convention met; they appointed a committee of safety, passed an ordinance for regulating the militia, and for raising a regular force of two regiments, the command of which was given to Patrick Henry, who was also made the commander of all the forces raised, and to be raised, for the defence of the colony. The ships of war belonging to his majesty, which had been cruising in the James and York rivers during the whole summer, had committed many petty acts of depredation and plunder along the shores, which the people now eagerly desired to resent, and an opportunity of gratification soon offered. The captain of the Otter sloop of war, on the 2d of September, ventured upon one of his plundering expeditions in a tender, and was driven ashore near Hampton by a violent tempest. The crew left the vessel on the shore, and made their escape in the night, and next morning the people boarded and set fire to her. This naturally roused Captain Squire's resentment, and he threatened instant destruction to the town; but the committee of safety at Williamsburg, having heard of the affair, detached Colonel Woodford, with three companies, to repel the attack, which was so effectually done, that the assailants were soon glad to make a precipitate flight, with considerable loss. This affair produced a proclamation from his lordship, (who continued to hold his head-quarters on board one of the ships,) in which he not only declared martial law, but freedom to all the slaves who would join his standard. By this means he soon collected a crew well suited to his designs; and having fortified himself at the Great Bridge, near Norfolk, continued for some time to commit such acts of wanton barbarity and contemptible depredations, as to disgust even those who had until now continued friendly to the cause of the king. The committee of safety finding themselves called upon to put a stop to his lordship's savage warfare, despatched Colonel Woodford to drive him from his hold. Having arrived within cannon shot of Lord Dunmore's position, the Americans halted, and threw up some hasty entrenchments. His lordship, hearing that the provincials amounted only to three hundred men, badly armed, conceived the design of surprising them; and for this purpose Captain Leslie, with the regulars and slaves, crossed the bridge before day-light, and entered the camp of the provincials, just as they were parading under arms. Captain Fordyce advanced to the attack with the grenadiers, and was among the first that fell. The whole number of grenadiers were either killed, wounded, or made prisoners, and the rest of the royal party were obliged to make a rapid retreat. Disappointed in their hopes, the governor's party abandoned their works the following night, and retired to their shipping, leaving Woodford, who was now joined by Colonel Howe from North Carolina, the complete command of Norfolk. After continuing to assail the coasts of Virginia for a considerable time, but almost every where unsuccessfully,* Lord Dunmore was at length compelled to abandon his hostile designs against the colonists. Some of his ships were driven upon that coast, where the wretched fugitives were made prisoners by their own fellow-citizens, and immured in dungeons. To escape a similar fate, Dunmore burnt the ships of least value; and the miserable remains of soldiers and loyalists, assailed at once by tempests, famine, and disease, sought refuge in Florida, Bermudas, and the West Indies.

Notwithstanding the extent to which hostilities had been carried, a large portion of the colonists had hitherto continued to entertain some hope of an amicable termination of the dispute; and it is evident,

* On the 1st day of January, 1776, the town of Norfolk, in Virginia, was set on fire by the British, under the direction of Lord Dunmore and reduced to ashes. On the arrival of the Liverpool man-of-war from England, a flag was sent on shore to put the question, whether the provincials would supply his majesty's ship with from the transactions we are about to record, that many felt sincerely desirous not to frustrate such a result. The want of more regular and stable governments had for some time been felt in those colonies where royal governments had hitherto existed; and in the autumn of 1775, New Hampshire applied to congress for their advice and direction on this subject. In November, congress advised the convention of that colony, to call a full and free representation of the people; when the representatives, if they thought it necessary, should establish such a form of government as, in their judgment, would best promote the happiness of the people, and most effectually secure peace and good order during the continuance of the dispute between Great Britain and the colonies. On this question the members of congress were not unanimous. It was viewed by some as a step necessarily leading to independence; and by some of its advocates it was probably intended as such. To render the resolution less exceptionable, the duration of the government was limited to the continuance of the dispute with the parent country. Soon afterwards, similar directions and advice were given to South Carolina and Virginia.

The last hopes of the colonists for reconciliation rested on the success of their second petition to the king; and the answer of their sovereign to this application was expected with extreme solicitude. Information, however, was soon received from Mr. Penn, who was intrusted with the petition, that no answer would be given. This intelligence was followed by that of great additional preparations to subdue the "American rebels." The king, in his speech at the opening of parliament in October, not only accused the colonists of revolt, hostility, and rebellion, but stated that the rebellious war carried on by them was for the purpose of establishing an independent empire. To prevent this, he declared that the most decisive and vigorous measures were necessary; that he had consequently increased his naval establishment, had augmented his land forces, and had also taken measures to procure the aid of foreign troops. He at the same time stated his intention of appointing certain persons with authority to grant pardons to individuals, and to receive the submission of whole colonies disposed to return to their allegiance. Large majorities in both houses assured the king of their firm support in his measures for reducing the colonists to obedience. The addresses, provisions, and a negative answer being returned, it was determined to destroy the town. The whole loss was estimated at three hundred thousand pounds sterling. The provincials themselves destroyed the houses and plantations near the water, to deprive the ships of every resource of supply.

however, in answer to the speech, were opposed with great ability. The project of employing foreign troops to destroy American subjects, was reprobated by the minority in the strongest terms. The plans of the ministry, however, were not only approved by parliament, but by a majority of the nation. The idea of making the colonists share their burdens, could not easily be relinquished by the people of Great Britain; and national pride would not permit them to yield the point of supremacy. War was now, therefore, to be waged against the colonies, and a force sent out sufficiently powerful to compel submission, even without a struggle. For these purposes the aid of parliament was requisite; and about the last of December an act was passed, prohibiting all trade and commerce with the colonies, and authorizing the capture and condemnation, not only of all American vessels, with their cargoes, but all other vessels found trading in any port or place in the colonies, as if the same were the vessels and effects of open enemies; and the vessels and property thus taken were vested in the captors, and the crews were to be treated, not as prisoners, but as slaves.* The passing of this act shut the door against the application of the colonies for a reconciliation. The last petition of congress to the king had, indeed, been laid before parliament, but both houses refused to hear it, or even to treat upon any proposition coming from such an unlawful assembly, or from those who were then in arms against their lawful sovereign. In the house of lords, on the motion of the Duke of Richmond, Mr. Penn was examined on American affairs. He stated, among other things, that the colonists were desirous of reconciliation, and did not aim at independence; that they were disposed to conform to the acts regulating their trade, but not to taxation; and that on this point a spirit of resistance was universal. After this examination, the Duke of Richmond moved a resolution, declaring that the petition of congress to the king was a ground for a reconciliation of the differences between the two countries. This motion was negatived, after a warm debate, by eighty-six to thirty-three. These proceedings of the king and parliament, with the employment of sixteen thousand foreign mercenaries, convinced the leading men in each colony, that the sword alone must decide the contest, and that the colonists must now declare themselves totally independent of Great Britain.

Time, however, was still requisite, to convince the great mass of the American people of the necessity of a complete separation from their parent country, and the establishment of independent governments. The ablest pens were employed throughout America, in the winter of 1775-6, on this momentous subject. The propriety and necessity of the measure was enforced in the numerous gazettes, and in pamphlets. Among the latter, "Common Sense," from the popular pen of Thomas Paine, produced a wonderful effect in the different colonies in favour of independence. Influential individuals in every colony urged it as a step absolutely necessary to preserve the rights and liberties, as well as to secure the happiness and prosperity of America.†

When the prohibitory act reached America, congress, justly viewing it as a declaration of war, directed reprisals to be made, both by public and private armed vessels, against the ships and goods of the inhabitants of Great Britain, found on the high seas, or between high and low water mark. They also burst the shackles of commercial monopoly, which had so long kept them in bondage, and opened their ports to all the world, except the dominions of Great Britain. In this state of things, it was pre-

* By a most extraordinary clause in the act, it was made lawful for the commander of a British vessel to take the masters, crews, and other persons, found in the captured vessels, to put them on board any other British armed vessel, and enter their names on the books of the same; and from the time of such entry, such persons were to be considered in the service of his majesty, to all intents and purposes, as though they had entered themselves voluntarily on board of such vessel. By this means the Americans might be compelled to fight even against their own friends and countrymen. This clause in the act excited the indignation of many in both houses of parliament, and drew from them the strongest epithets of reprobation. This treatment of prisoners, they declared not only unjust, but a refinement in cruelty unknown among savage nations. No man, they said, could be despoiled of his goods as a foreign enemy, and at the same time compelled to serve the state as a citizen. Such a compulsion upon prisoners was unknown in any case of war or rebellion; and the only example of the kind that could be produced, must be found among pirates, the outlaws and enemies of human society. Some of the lords, in their protest against the act, described it "as a refinement in cruelty," which, "in a sentence worse than death, obliged the unhappy men who should be made captives in that predatory war, to bear arms against their families, kindred, friends, and country; and after being plundered themselves, to become accomplices in plundering their brethren." The ministry, on the other hand, pretended to view this treatment of American prisoners rather as an act of grace and favour than of injustice or cruelty.

posterous for the colonists any longer to consider themselves as holding or exercising the powers of government under the authority of Great Britain. Congress, therefore, on the 10th of May, recommended to the assemblies and conventions of the colonies where no sufficient government had been established, "to adopt such government as should, in the opinion of the representatives of the people, best conduce to the happiness and safety of their constituents in particular, and America in general." They also declared it necessary, that the exercise of every kind of authority under the crown should be suppressed, and that all the powers of government should be exercised "under the authority of the people of the colonies, for the preservation of internal peace, virtue, and good order, as well as for the defence of their lives, liberties, and properties, against the hostile invasions and cruel depredations of their enemies." This was a preliminary step to a general declaration of independence. Some of the colonial assemblies and conventions about the same time began to express their opinions on this great question. On the 22d of April, the convention of North Carolina empowered their delegates in congress "to concur with those in the other colonies in declaring independence." This, it is believed, was the first direct public act of any colonial assembly or convention in favour of the measure.* The convention of Virginia soon afterwards expressed itself still more decidedly. After full deliberation, the following resolutions were passed unanimously :

"That the delegates appointed to represent this colony in general congress, be instructed to propose to that respectable body, to declare the United Colonies free and independent states, absolved from all allegiance to, or dependence upon, the crown or parliament of Great Britain ; and that they give the assent of this colony to such declaration, and to whatever measures may be thought proper and necessary by the congress for forming foreign alliances, and a confederation of the colonies, at such time and in the manner as to them shall seem best. Provided, that the power of forming governments for, and the regu-

"That a committee be appointed to prepare a declaration of rights, and such a plan of government as will be most likely to maintain peace and order in this colony, and secure substantial and equal liberty to the people."†

Early in the year the British government had prepared a considerable expedition to reduce the southern colonies to obedience. The command was intrusted to Sir Peter Parker and Earl Cornwallis. On the 3d of May, Admiral Parker, with twenty sail, arrived at Cape Fear. They found General Clinton ready to co-operate with them. He had left New York, and proceeded to Virginia, where he had an interview with Lord Dunmore ; but finding nothing could be effected in that colony, he repaired to Cape Fear, to await the arrival of the armament from England. Meanwhile, the Carolinians had been making great exertions. In Charleston the utmost energy and activity was evinced. The citizens pulled down the valuable storehouses on the wharfs, barricaded the streets, and constructed lines of defence along the shore. Abandoning their commercial pursuits, they engaged in incessant labour, and prepared for bloody conflicts. The troops, amounting to between five and six thousand men, were stationed in the most advantageous positions. Amidst all this bustle and preparation, lead was so extremely scarce, that the windows of Charleston were stripped of their weights, in order to procure a small supply of that necessary article for bullets. Early in June, the armament, consisting of between forty and fifty vessels, appeared off Charleston Bay, and thirty-six of the transports passed the bar, and anchored about three miles from Sullivan's Island. Some hundreds of the troops landed on Long Island, which lies on the west of Sullivan's Island, and which is separated from it by a narrow channel, often fordable. On the 10th of the month, the Bristol, a fifty gun ship—having taken out her guns, got safely over the bar ; and on the 25th, the Experiment, a ship of equal force, arrived, and next day passed in the same way.

* Pitkin's Political and Civil History, vol. i. p. 361.

† "This measure was followed by the most lively demonstrations of joy. The spirit of the times is interestingly manifested by the following paragraph from Purdie's paper of the 17th of May, which immediately succeeds the annunciation of the resolutions:—'In consequence of the above resolutions, universally regarded as the only door which will lead to safety and prosperity, some gentlemen made a handsome collection for the purpose of treating the soldiery, who next day were paraded in Waller's grove, before Brigadier-General Lewis, attended by the gentlemen of the committee of safety, the members of the general convention, the inhabitants of this city, &c. The resolutions being read aloud to the army, the following toasts were given, each of them accompanied by a discharge of the artillery and small arms, and the acclamations of all present:—1. The American Independent States.—2. The grand congress of the United States, and their respective legislatures.—3. General Washington, and victory to the American arms.—The union flag of the American states waved upon the capitol during the whole of this ceremony ; which, being ended, the soldiers partook of the refreshments prepared for them by the affection of their countrymen, and the evening concluded with illuminations and other demonstrations of joy ; every one seeming pleased that the domination of Great Britain was now at an end, so wickedly and tyrannically exercised for these twelve or thirteen years past, notwithstanding our repeated prayers and remonstrances for redress.'

—Wirt's Life of Henry, p. 195.

On the part of the British, every thing was now ready for action. Sir Henry Clinton had nearly three thousand men under his command. The naval force, under Sir Peter Parker, consisted of the Bristol and Experiment, of fifty guns; the Active, Acteon, Solebay, and Syren frigates; the Friendship, of twenty-two, and the Sphinx, of twenty guns; the Ranger sloop, and Thunder bomb. On the forenoon of the 28th of June, this fleet advanced against the fort on Sullivan's Island, which was defended by Colonel Moultrie, with about three hundred and fifty regular troops, and some militia. The Thunder bomb began the battle. The Active, Bristol, Experiment, and Solebay, followed boldly to the attack, and a terrible cannonade ensued. The fort returned the fire of the ships slowly, but with deliberate and deadly aim; and the contest was carried on during the whole day with unabating fury. The Sphinx, Acteon, and Syren, were ordered to attack the western extremity of the fort, which was in a very unfinished state; but, as they proceeded for that purpose, they got entangled with a shoal, called the Middle Ground. Two of them ran foul of each other: the Acteon stuck fast; the Sphinx and Syren got off; but, fortunately for the Americans, that part of the attack completely failed. It was designed that Sir Henry Clinton, with his corps, should co-operate with the naval operations by passing the narrow channel which separates Long Island from Sullivan's Island, and assail the fort by land; but this the general found impracticable, for the channel, though commonly fordable, was at that time, by a long prevalence of easterly winds, deeper than usual; and even had the channel been fordable, the British troops would have found the passage an arduous enterprise; for Colonel Thomson, with a strong detachment of riflemen, regulars, and militia, was posted on the east end of Sullivan's Island, to oppose any attack made in that quarter. The engagement, which began about eleven o'clock in the forenoon, continued with unabated fury till seven in the evening, when the fire slackened, and about nine entirely ceased on both sides. During the night, all the ships, except the Acteon, which was aground, removed about two miles from the island. Next morning, the fort fired a few shots at the Acteon, and she at first returned them; but, in a short time, her crew set her on fire, and abandoned her. She blew up shortly afterwards. In this obstinate engagement both parties fought with great gallantry. The loss of the British was very considerable, upwards of sixty being killed, and one hundred and sixty wounded; while the garrison lost only ten men killed, and twenty-two wounded. Although the Americans were raw troops, yet they behaved with the steady intrepidity of veterans. One circumstance may serve to illustrate the cool but enthusiastic courage which pervaded their ranks. In the course of the engagement, the flag-staff of the fort was shot away; but Sergeant Jasper leaped down upon the beach, snatched up the flag, fastened it to a sponge-staff, and while the ships were incessantly directing their broadsides upon the fort, he mounted the merlon, and deliberately replaced the flag. The fate of this expedition contributed greatly to establish the popular government it was intended to destroy, while the news of it spread rapidly through the continent, and exercised an equally unfavourable influence on the royal cause: the advocates of the irresistibility of British fleets and armies were mortified and silenced; and the brave defence of Fort Moultrie saved the southern states from the horrors of war for several years.

In South Carolina, the government took advantage of the hour of success to conciliate their opponents in the province. The adherents of royal power, who, for a considerable time, had been closely imprisoned, on promising fidelity to their country, were set at freedom, and restored to all the privileges of citizens. The repulse of the British was also attended with another advantage, that of leaving the Americans at liberty to turn their undivided force against the Indians, who had attacked the western frontier of the southern states with all the fury and carnage of savage warfare. In 1775, when the breach between Great Britain and her colonies was daily becoming wider, one Stuart, the agent employed in conducting the intercourse between the British authorities and the Cherokees and Creeks, used all his influence to attach the savages to the royal cause, and to inspire them with jealousy and hatred of the Americans. He found little difficulty in persuading them that the Americans, without provocation, had taken up arms against Britain, and were the means of preventing them from receiving their yearly supplies of arms, ammunition, and clothing, from the British government. The Americans had endeavoured to conciliate the good will of the Indians, but their scanty presents were unsatisfactory, and the savages resolved to take up the hatchet. Deeming the appearance of the British fleet in Charleston Bay a fit opportunity, the Cherokees invaded the western frontier of the province, marking their track with murder and devastation. The speedy retreat of the British left the savages exposed to the vengeance of the Americans, who, in separate divisions, entered their country at different points, from Virginia and Georgia defeated their warriors, burned their villages, laid waste their corn-fields, and incapacitated the Cherokees for a considerable time from giving the settlers further annoyance. Thus, in the south, the Americans triumphed both over the British and the Indians.

On the 7th of June, the great question of independence was brought directly before congress, by Richard Henry Lee, one of the delegates from Virginia. He submitted a resolution, declaring "that the united colonies are, and ought to be, free and independent states; that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British crown; and that all political connexion between them and the state of Great Britain is, and ought to be, totally dissolved." The resolution was postponed until the next day, and every member enjoined to attend, to take the same into consideration. On the 8th it was debated in committee of the whole house. No question of greater magnitude was ever presented to the consideration of a deliberative body, or debated with more energy, eloquence, and ability. On the 10th it was adopted in committee, by a bare majority. The delegates from Pennsylvania and Maryland were instructed to oppose it, and the delegates from some of the other colonies were without special instructions on the subject. To give time for greater unanimity, the resolution was postponed in the house until the 1st of July. In the mean time, a committee was appointed to prepare a declaration of independence. During this interval, measures were taken to procure the assent of all the colonies.

On the day appointed, the resolution relating to independence was resumed in the general congress, referred to a committee of the whole house, and assented to by all the colonies, except Pennsylvania and Delaware. The committee appointed to prepare a declaration of independence selected Mr. Adams and Mr. Jefferson as a sub-committee, and the original draft, was made by Mr. Jefferson. This draft, without any amendment by the committee, was reported to congress, and, after undergoing several amendments, received their sanction.

The course of time has now brought us to the decisive hour when a new empire, of a character the most extraordinary, springs into being. The world has known no rest since this grand confederacy took her rank among the nations of the earth; her example infused a power into the principles of liberty which for nearly two centuries had been dormant; although in another hemisphere, it has exercised more influence on the state of the public mind in Europe than did the great struggle in the days of the commonwealth; and the world will know rest no more, till, under whatever form, the great lessons of freedom which American history enforces, have been listened to, and embodied in action, by every nation of the globe. We are persuaded we shall entirely meet the feelings of our readers, by closing this chapter with that ever memorable document, which gave national existence to an empire whose birth has opened so brilliant a prospect to the world—

THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

"A Declaration by the Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled."

"When, in the course of human events, it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, and to assume, among the powers of the earth, the separate and equal station to which the laws of nature and of nature's God entitle them, a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation.

"We hold these truths to be self-evident: that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute new government, laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness. Prudence, indeed, will dictate, that governments long established should not be changed for light and transient causes; and accordingly, all experience hath shown, that mankind are more disposed to suffer, while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves, by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed. But when a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same object, evinces a design to reduce them under absolute despotism, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such government, and to provide new guards for their future security. Such has been the patient sufferance of these colonies; and such is now the necessity which constrains them to alter their former systems of government. The history of the present king of Great Britain is a history of repeated injuries and usurpation, all having in direct object, the establishment of an absolute tyranny over these states. To prove this, let facts be submitted to a candid world.

"He has refused his assent to laws the most wholesome and necessary for the public good.

"He has forbidden his governors to pass laws of immediate and pressing importance, unless suspended in their operation till his assent should be obtained; and when so suspended, he has utterly neglected to attend to them.

"He has refused to pass other laws for the accommodation of large districts of people, unless those people would relinquish the right of representation in the legislature; a right inestimable to them, and formidable to tyrants only.

"He has called together legislative bodies at places unusual, uncomfortable, and distant from the depository of their public records, for the sole purpose of fatiguing them into compliance with his measures.

"He has dissolved representative houses, repeatedly, for opposing with manly firmness his invasions on the rights of the people.

"He has refused, for a long time after such dissolutions, to cause others to be elected; whereby the legislative powers, incapable of annihilation, have returned to the people at large for their exercise; the state remaining, in the mean time, exposed to all the dangers of invasion from without, and convulsions within.

"He has endeavoured to prevent the population of these states; for that purpose obstructing the laws for naturalization of foreigners, refusing to pass others to encourage their migrations hither, and raising the conditions of new appropriations of lands.

"He has obstructed the administration of justice, by refusing his assent to laws for establishing judiciary powers.

"He has made judges dependant on his will alone, for the tenure of their offices, and the amount and payment of their salaries.

"He has erected a multitude of new offices, and sent hither swarms of officers to harass our people, and eat out their substance.

"He has kept among us, in times of peace, standing armies, without the consent of our legislatures.

"He has affected to render the military independent of, and superior to, the civil power.

"He has combined with others to subject us to a jurisdiction foreign to our constitutions, and unacknowledged by our laws; giving his assent to their acts of pretended legislation:—

"For quartering large bodies of armed troops among us:

"For protecting them, by a mock trial, from punishment for any murders which they should commit on the inhabitants of these states:

"For cutting off our trade with all parts of the world:

"For imposing taxes on us without our consent:

"For depriving us, in many cases, of the benefits of trial by jury:

"For transporting us beyond seas to be tried for pretended offences:

"For abolishing the free system of English laws in a neighbouring province, establishing therein an arbitrary government, and enlarging its boundaries, so as to render it at once an example and fit instrument for introducing the same absolute rule into these colonies:

"For taking away our charters, abolishing our most valuable laws, and altering, fundamentally, the forms of our governments:

"For suspending our own legislatures, and declaring themselves invested with power to legislate for us in all cases whatsoever.

"He has abdicated government here, by declaring us out of his protection, and waging war against us.

"He has plundered our seas, ravaged our coasts, burnt our towns, and destroyed the lives of our people.

"He is, at this time, transporting large armies of foreign mercenaries, to complete the works of death, desolation, and tyranny, already begun with circumstances of cruelty and perfidy, scarcely paralleled in the most barbarous ages, and totally unworthy the head of a civilized nation.

"He has constrained our fellow-citizens, taken captive on the high seas, to bear arms against their country, to become the executioners of their friends and brethren, or to fall themselves by their hands.

"He has excited domestic insurrections amongst us, and has endeavoured to bring on the inhabitants of our frontiers, the merciless Indian savages, whose known rule of warfare is an undistinguished destruction of all ages, sexes, and conditions.

"In every stage of these oppressions we have petitioned for redress, in the most humble terms: our repeated petitions have been answered only by repeated injury. A prince, whose character is thus marked by every act which may define a tyrant, is unfit to be the ruler of a free people.

"Nor have we been wanting in attentions to our British brethren. We have warned them, from time to time, of attempts by their legislature to extend an unwarrantable jurisdiction over us. We have reminded them of the circumstances of our emigration and settlement here. We have appealed to their native justice and magnanimity, and we have conjured them, by the ties of our common kindred, to disavow these usurpations, which would inevitably interrupt our connexions and correspondence. They, too, have been deaf to the voice of justice and of consanguinity. We must therefore acquiesce in the necessity which denounces our separation, and hold them, as we hold the rest of mankind, enemies in war, in peace friends.

"We, therefore, the representatives of the United States of America in general congress assembled, appealing to the Supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of our intentions, do, in the name and by authority of the good people of these colonies, solemnly publish and declare, that these United Colonies are, and of right ought to be, FREE and INDE-PENDENT STATES; that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British crown, and that all political connexion between them and the state of Great Britain is, and ought to be, totally dissolved; and that, as free and independent states, they have full power to levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances, establish commerce, and to do all other acts and things which independent states may of right do. And for the support of this declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honour."*

* This declaration was directed to be engrossed, and on the 2d of August, 1776, was signed by all the members then present, and by some who were not members on the 4th of July.

Authenticated fac-similes of the signatures are given in an engraved plate.

FROM THE CAMPAIGN OF 1776 TO THAT OF 1779.

THE noblest employ of the pen of history, is to develop facts which illustrate the progress of the human mind. The age is passed away, when the record of the operations of brute force, even when presented in the fascinating garb of military achievements, could be dwelt upon with feelings of unmingled satisfaction and delight. The slaughter of man by his fellow-man, the consigning of cities to the flames, the substituting of the cries of the widow and the orphan for the smiles of domestic peace, are deeds which civilized nations would now be well content to obliterate from their history; but if this cannot be, it is better that the desolations of war should be merely sketched in faithful outline, rather than exhibited in a highly wrought picture, tending to excite an admiration of its character, and a perpetuation of its evils. True it is, that the ardour of a disinterested patriot cannot be exhibited in too strong a light; but his glory arises far more from the grandeur of the motives which actuate him, than from exploits in the field of blood, to which he is sometimes inevitably, though reluctantly, borne. Having already dwelt at considerable length on the devoted patriotism of the inhabitants of the American colonies, we shall, in the subsequent pages, rather state the results than the details of their military operations, which, happily for the world, terminated in the establishment and recognition of a republic possessing all the elements of a great empire, and exhibiting a rapidity of progress which ought to excite the admiration, not the envy, of every civilized nation of the earth. We feel the more satisfaction in proposing to notice but concisely the details of hostilities, as ample justice has already been done to them by several writers, both in America and England, while that portion of the history most capable of affording moral and political instruction, has, in our own country at least, hitherto received a very partial and inadequate degree of attention. We shall, however, give an outline of military operations amply sufficient to answer all the purposes of the history.

General Washington, after compelling the British to abandon Boston, had made every possible preparation for the defence of New York, where he had fixed his head-quarters. To second his exertions, the congress instituted a flying camp, to consist of an intermediate corps, between regular soldiers and militia; and called for ten thousand men from the states of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Delaware, to be in constant service to the first day of the ensuing December; and for thirteen thousand eight hundred of the common militia, from Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, and New Jersey. The command of the naval force destined to operate against New York was given to Admiral Howe, while his brother, Sir William, was entrusted with the command of the army; and, in addition to their military powers, the brothers were appointed commissioners for restoring peace to the colonies. General Howe, after waiting two months at Halifax for expected re-enforcements from England, sailed with the force which he had previously commanded in Boston; and, directing his course towards New York, arrived on the 25th of June off Sandy Hook. Admiral Lord Howe, with part of the re-enforcement from England, arrived at Halifax soon after his brother's departure, and, without dropping anchor, followed, and joined him on the 12th of July, at Staten Island. General Clinton arrived there about the same time, with the troops brought back from the expedition of Charleston and South Carolina; Commodore Hotham also appeared there with a re-enforcement under his escort; and in a short time the British army amounted to about twenty-four thousand men, English, Hessians, and Waldeckers. The royal commissioners, before they commenced military operations, attempted to effect a re-union between the colonies and Great Britain. Lord Howe announced his pacific powers to the principal magistrates of the several colonies. He promised pardon to all, who, in the late times, had deviated from their allegiance, on condition of their speedily returning to their duty; and, in case of their compliance, encouraged their expectation of the future favour of their sovereign. In his declaration, he observed, "that the commissioners were authorized, in his majesty's name, to declare any province, colony, county, district, or town, to be at peace with his majesty; that due consideration should be had to the meritorious services of any who should aid or assist in restoring the public tranquillity; that their dutiful representations should be received, pardons granted, and suitable encouragement to such as would promote the measures of legal government and peace, in pursuance of his majesty's most gracious purposes." These pacific proposals were regarded by the Americans as only an attempt to sow dissensions among them, and were never for a moment seriously regarded by any of the patriotic party. The British forces waited so long to receive accessions from Halifax, the Carolinas, the West Indies, and Europe, that the month of August was far advanced before they commenced the campaign. The commanders, having resolved to make their first attempt on Long Island, landed their troops, estimated at about twenty-four thousand men, at Gravesend Bay, to the right of the Narrows. The Americans, to the amount of fifteen thousand, under Major-General Sullivan, were posted on a peninsula between Mill Creek, a little above Red Hook, and an elbow of East River, called Wallebout Bay. Here they had erected strong fortifications, which were separated from New York by East River, at the distance of a mile. A line of entrenchment from the Mill Creek enclosed a large space of ground, on which stood the American camp, near the village of Brooklyn. This line was secured by abattis, and flanked by strong redoubts. The armies were separated by a range of hills, covered with a thick wood, which intersects the country from west to east, terminating on the east, near Jamaica. Through these hills there were three roads; one near the Narrows, a second by the Flatbush road, and a third by the Bedford road; these were the only passes from the south side of the hills to the American lines, excepting a road which led to Jamaica, round the easterly end of the hills; and General Putnam, agreeably to the instructions of General Washington, had detached a considerable part of his men to occupy them.

On the 26th, the main body of British troops, with a large detachment of Germans, landed under cover of the ships, on the south-western extremity of Long Island, and, advancing in three divisions, took post upon the south skirt of the wood; General Grant upon their left, near the coast; the German general, De Heister, in the centre, at Flatbush; and General Clinton upon their right, at Flatland. Only the range of hills now separated the two armies, and the different posts of the British were distant from the American camp from four to six miles. In the evening, General Clinton, without beat of drum, marched with the infantry of his division, a party of light horse, and fourteen field pieces, to gain the defile on the Jamaica road. During the night he surprised an American party stationed here to give the alarm of an approaching enemy, and, undiscovered by Sullivan, seized the pass. At day-break he passed the heights, and descended into the plain on the side of Brooklyn. Early in the morning, General De Heister, at Flatbush, and General Grant upon the west coast, opened a cannonade upon the American troops, and began to ascend the hill; but they moved very slowly, as their object was to draw the attention of the American commander from his left, and give General Clinton opportunity to gain the rear of the American troops stationed on the heights. General Putnam, in the apprehension that the serious attack would be made by De Heister and Grant, sent detachments to re-enforce General Sullivan and Lord Stirling at the defiles, through which those divisions of the enemy were approaching. When General Clinton had passed the left flank of the Americans, about eight o'clock in the morning of the 27th, De Heister and Grant vigorously ascended the hill; the troops which opposed them bravely maintained their ground, until they learned their perilous situation from the British columns which were gaining their rear. As soon as the American left discovered the progress of General Clinton, they attempted to return to the camp at Brooklyn, but their flight was stopped by the front of the British column. In the mean time, the Germans pushed forward from Flatbush, and the troops in the American centre, under the immediate command of General Sullivan, having also discovered that their flank was turned, and that the enemy was gaining their rear, in haste retreated towards Brooklyn. Clinton's columns continuing to advance, intercepted them; they were attacked in front and rear, and alternately driven by the British on the Germans, and by the Germans on the British. Desperate as their situation was, some regiments broke through the enemy's columns, and regained the fortified camp; but most of the detachments upon the American left and centre, were either killed or taken prisoners. The detachment on the American right, under Lord Stirling, maintained a severe conflict with General Grant, for six hours, until the van of General Clinton's division, having crossed the whole island, gained their rear. Lord Stirling perceived his danger, and found that his troops could be saved only by an immediate retreat over a creek near the cove. He gave orders to this purpose; and, to facilitate their execution, he in person attacked Lord Cornwallis, who, by this time, having gained the coast, had posted a small corps in a house, just above the place where the American troops must pass the creek. The attack was bravely made with four hundred men; but his lordship being re-enforced from his own column, and General Grant attacking Lord Stirling in the rear, this brave band was overpowered by numbers, and those who survived were compelled to surrender themselves prisoners of war; but this spirited assault gave opportunity for a large proportion of the detachment to escape. General Washington passed over to Brooklyn in the heat of the action; but, unable to rescue his men from their perilous situation, was constrained to be the inactive spectator of the slaughter of his best troops. The loss of the Americans on this occasion, for the number engaged, was great; General Washington stated it at a thousand men; but his returns probably included only the regular regiments. General Howe, in an official letter, made the prisoners amount to one thousand and ninety-seven. Among these were Major-General Sullivan and Brigadier-General Lord Stirling. Brigadier-General Woodhull (then called Udall) is named as having been taken prisoner at the battle. This is however erroneous, he not having been engaged in the conflict, and his capture not having occurred until the following day, at a different part of the island.* The British loss, as stated by General Howe, was twenty-one officers,

* Nathaniel Woodhull, a distinguished martyr to the cause of American liberty, was descended from an English family of great respectability, among some of the branches of which the ancient spelling of the name of Woodhull, is yet preserved. He was the eldest son of Nathaniel Woodhull, of Suffolk county, Long Island. His great grandfather, Richard Woodhull, Esq. was one of those whom an abhorrence of civil and ecclesiastical tyranny drove in such numbers to our shores, and he settled at an early period of the history of the colony of New York, at Seatacot, on Long Island. After the capture and organization of the province of New York, a grant was issued by Gov. Nicolls, (in 1666,) of the town of Brookhaven, to Richard Woodhull and others. He served in the magistracy and principal offices of the town, until his death, which occurred about thirty years afterwards.

The subject of the present memoir was born on the 30th day of December, 1722, O. S. on an extensive farm at Mastic, on the south side of Long Island, now belonging to his daughter, Mrs. Elizabeth Smith, which became the property of his grandfather, Richard Woodhull, Jr. partly by purchase from the Indians, and grant from the governor, and partly by transfer from the original settler. His early life was passed in assisting his father in cultivating the possessions which he afterwards inherited. In 1761, he was married to Ruth Floyd, a sister of the Hon. William Floyd, one of the signers of the declaration of American Independence.

Being appointed a major in the provincial forces of New York, Mr. Woodhull, in 1758, served in that capacity, in the army under General Abercrombie, intended for the reduction of Ticonderoga and Crown Point. He was engaged in the daring, or rather the rash assault, ordered by the English general before the arrival of his artillery, upon the former place, which, strongly fortified, was defended by a garrison of more than five thousand men, and protected on its only assailable side by fallen trees, with their branches projecting outward, so cut as to answer the purpose of chevaux-de-frise. After an exposure of four hours to the covered fire of the French, during which time every effort of heroic perseverance proved ineffectual in making an impression on the enemy's works, the assailing force was obliged to retire to the southern side of Lake George, with a loss of about 2000 men killed or dangerously wounded.

Desirous of wiping off the stain of this repulse, Gen. Abercrombie detached a portion of his army on an expedition against Caderaqui, or Fort Frontenac, (now Kingston,) an important fortress at the communication of Lake Ontario with the river St. Lawrence. Lieut. Col. Bradstreet, with whom the design originated, commanded this enterprise, having a train of eight cannon and three mortars, and a body of 3000 men, of whom, about 150 only were regulars. The rest of the detachment was composed of provincials, from Massachusetts, Rhode Island, New Jersey, and New York. Those of the latter province amounted to somewhat more than 1100 men, of whom, one battalion, of 440 men, was placed under the command of Lieut. Col. Charles Clinton, (the grandfather of the late De Witt Clinton;) and the second battalion, of 670 men, was confided to Lieut. Col. Corsa and Major Woodhull. On the 27th of August, 1758, a combined operation against the fort was made by land and water; the conduct of the forces in the boats being committed to Lieut. Col. Corsa and Major Woodhull, with orders to receive the fire of the fort without returning it, until their troops had landed and formed. The resolution with which the operations were conducted, dispirited the enemy, whose forces were insufficient to the defence of their works, and after a feeble resistance, the garrison struck their colours, and capitulated. Immense stores of provisions and merchandise, intended for the supply of the French forces in America, sixty pieces of cannon, sixteen mortars, and nine armed vessels, some of them carrying eighteen guns, were the fruits of this surrender.

Whether Mr. Woodhull was employed in the campaign of the following year, is not ascertained, most of his papers having been accidentally destroyed by fire, a few years after his death. It is believed, however, that he marched either with the force which Gen. Prideaux conducted, in 1759, against Niagara, or with that led by Gen. Amherst against Ticonderoga and Crown Point, both of which enterprises had a successful issue. In 1760, he served as colonel of the third regiment of New York provincials, in the army under Gen. Amherst, which marched against Montreal, and effected the final reduction of Canada. Upon the capitulation of the Marquis de Vaudreuil, Colonel Woodhull, with his troops, returned to New York, and he retired to private life.

The removal of the neighbourhood of French power, so dangerous to the colonists, and the consciousness of the latter that they had efficiently contributed to its achievement, were calculated to produce among them a more free inquiry into the relative rights of the provinces and the mother country, and of their own ability sus-and three hundred and forty-six privates killed, wounded, and taken prisoners.

The British now encamped in front of the American lines, and on the succeeding night broke cessfully to assert their privileges. The spirit to which this inquiry gave rise, was stimulated by the pretensions set up at home, which, first assuming that America was to be taxed by the British parliament, for the expenses of whatever attacks the wars of interest, or ambition, in which the parent state engaged, should draw upon the colonists, grew into the assertion of a right, to tax them in all cases whatsoever. Acts of parliament rashly passed, and sometimes timidly repealed, only served to spread the existing discontent, and to hasten the impending crisis. Partaking of the general feeling, the assembly of New York, at the close of December, 1768, unanimously resolved, that no tax could, or ought to be imposed, or levied, on the persons or estates of his majesty's subjects within that colony, but of their own free gift, by their representatives convened in general assembly. The consequence was a dissolution of the body on the 2d of January, 1769, by the royal governor, Sir Henry Moore.

The proceedings of the assembly were highly approved by the people of Suffolk, among whom the primitive manners and republican feelings of their puritan ancestors, were in a remarkable degree preserved.

At the election in the spring of 1769, they returned to that body William Nicoll, Esq. who had been one of its former members, and Col. Nathaniel Woodhull. In the instructions drawn for their representatives, the county emphatically expressed their reliance on the exertions of their newly selected members, "to preserve their freedom, and the command over their own purses." The injunction was faithfully observed by Mr. Woodhull, who, during the six years that followed of the continuance of the royal government, was constant in his devotion to the rights of his countrymen, and his opposition to the party of the court.

In the convention which met in the city of New York, April 10th, 1775, to choose delegates to the continental congress, Mr. Woodhull appeared as a delegate from the county of Suffolk. Pursuant to a recommendation from the New York local committee, a provincial congress was soon afterwards deputed by the several counties of the colony, which met in that city, May 22d, 1775. This body practically asserted its right to entire sovereignty, superseding, in effect, from the time of its organization, and ultimately dissolving and expelling the royal authority. Colonel Woodhull was placed at the head of the delegation from Suffolk county. On the 22d of August, 1775, the provincial congress re-organized the militia of the colony into brigades, directing, "that a brigadier-general, with a major of brigade, be commissioned to the command of each brigade." The militia of Suffolk and Queens constituted one brigade, of which Mr. Woodhull was subsequently appointed to be the general, and Jonathan Lawrence, Esq., (a member of the provincial congress from Queens county,) to be major of brigade.

On the 28th of August, 1775, Gen. Woodhull was elected president of the provincial congress, and held the same office in the body that succeeded it, in 1776. Doubting its powers to conform to the recommendation of the continental congress, by erecting a new form of government, to the exclusion of all foreign control, the provincial congress, on the 31st of May, 1776, recommended to the electors of the several counties, to vest the necessary powers, either in their present delegates, or in others to be chosen in their stead. The British army having, on the 30th of June, appeared off the harbour of New York, the provincial congress, on its adjournment that day, directed that the congress, in which these new powers were vested, and which was to assemble on the 8th of July, should meet at White Plains. They did not, in fact, assemble until the 9th day of July, 1776, when General Woodhull was chosen president.

The declaration of independence, passed on the 4th instant, had not received the unanimous approbation of the colonies in continental congress, the delegates from the colony of New York having declined to vote, because, although they were personally for the measure, and believed their constituents to be so, they were fetterground within six hundred yards of a redoubt on the left. In this critical state of the American army on Long Island,—in front a numerous and victorious enemy, with a formidable train of artillery, the fleet

ed by instructions drawn nearly a twelve month before, when the hope of reconciliation was yet cherished. Immediately on their meeting, the new provincial congress unanimously adopted the declaration, (Gen. Woodhull presiding,) on the part of the people of New York: thus filling the void occasioned by the want of the necessary powers in their delegates at Philadelphia. On the next day they assumed the title of "the convention of the representatives of the state of New York," and subsequently formed the first constitution of the state.

The invading army under Lord Howe, had landed on Staten Island, and by the command which their naval force secured over the neighbouring waters, they were enabled to threaten an attack from this point, either on Long Island or the island of New York. Gen. Washington was therefore obliged to divide the force collected to oppose them, a portion of which entrenched themselves at Brooklyn, while the residue were stationed at different parts of York Island. The New York convention had, on the 20th July, ordered one fourth of the militia of Queens and Suffolk to be drafted, and the two regiments thus obtained had marched under the command of Col. Josiah Smith, of Suffolk, and Col. Jeromus Remsen, of Queens, within the lines at Brooklyn, then commanded by Gen. Sullivan. On the 10th August, Gen. Woodhull's concerns requiring his return home, he obtained leave of temporary absence from the convention, whose sittings had been transferred to Harlem, and proceeded to his residence at Mastic, about seventy-five miles from New York. On the 22d of August, the uncertainty that had prevailed as to the first point of attack on the part of the invaders, was dispelled by the landing of a portion of their forces near New Utrecht. Aware of the increasing want of provisions among the enemy, and that, the American army being now confined to their lines, the whole stock and produce of Long Island would be in the power of the hostile troops, unless means were taken to prevent it, the convention of New York adopted a policy since successfully pursued on a larger scale by the Russians. This was to deprive the invading force of supplies, and thus compel their abandonment of the island, by removing the stock and other provisions in the adjacent country, or if that could not be effected, by destroying them. Resolutions were accordingly passed on the 24th August, 1776, ordering Gen. Woodhull, or, in his absence, Col. Potter, (who had served as a captain of the New York provincials in the campaigns against the French in 1758 and 1759,) to march without delay one half of the western regiment of militia of Suffolk county, with five days' provisions, into the western parts of Queens county; and that the officers of the militia of Queens should immediately order out the whole militia of that county, to effect the desired objects. An express being sent with these directions to Brigade-Major Lawrence, Col. Potter, and Gen. Woodhull, the latter reached Jamaica on the next day, (Sunday,) apprised the convention of his arrival there, and awaited the approach of the forces intended for his command.

The convention were fully aware, that the militia to be collected on this emergency, would be wholly insufficient to effect the above object, and more particularly to enable the general to station a force, agreeably to their wishes, on the high grounds in the western part of Queens county, to repel the ravaging parties of the enemy.

In the preceding year it had been necessary to despatch from the main, some of the troops under the command of Gen. Wooster, to Suffolk county, in order to prevent depredations along its exposed coast; and its armed inhabitants were not now more than competent to the same purpose. In Queens county a majority of the inhabitants were disaffected to the patriotic cause. They had, in the previous month of December, obtained arms from the Asia man-of-war, and had prevented, by superior numbers at the polls, an election, then attempted, of delegates to the provincial congress; inasmuch that a military intervention, under the direction of the continental congress, had been necessary, to deprive the tories of offensive weapons, and to secure to the whigs the freedom of election.

indicating an intention to force a passage into East River to make some attempt on New York, the troops lying without shelter from heavy rains, fatigued and dispirited,—it was determined to withdraw from the

A large number of the whigs of that county were already imbedded in the regiment of Col. Remsen, and many of those at home were overawed by the neighbourhood of the British force, or were employed in preparations for the flight of their families, if fortune should be favourable to the British arms.

The convention accordingly deputed a committee to Gen. Washington, advising him of their objects; of their apprehension of the insufficiency of the force they had ordered to join Gen. Woodhull; and of their conviction, that it would be most conducive to the public welfare, that the regiments of Colonels Smith and Remsen, should be added. The committee reported, on the 26th, that at the conference with Gen. Washington, he seemed well pleased, but said he was afraid it was too late. He however expressed his willingness to afford every assistance to the convention consistent with the public good, and stated that he would immediately give orders that Smith's and Remsen's regiments should march into Queens county, to join Gen. Woodhull. Notice of this result was forwarded to the latter, as well as of the expectation of the convention, that by the time he received their letter, he would have been joined by the promised re-enforcement.

On the same day, the whole militia force that had been collected, was assembled at Jamaica, and was found to consist only of about one hundred men, led by Col. Potter, from Suffolk county, about forty militia from Queens, and fifty horsemen belonging to the troop of Kings and Queens counties. With this handful of men, Gen. Woodhull advanced to the westward of Queens county, agreeably to his orders. Owing probably to the receipt of information, that increased numbers of the British had disembarked on the preceding day at New Utrecht, the commanding officer at Brooklyn did not detach the two Long Island regiments to join Gen. Woodhull, and by some fatality, the omission was neither communicated to the convention, nor explained to the expecting general. Disappointed in not meeting the additional troops, without whom he could not post any force on the heights, to repel depredations of the enemy, he nevertheless commenced with vigour the execution of the rest of his orders, placed guards and sentries to prevent communication between the tories and the enemy, and scouring, during this and the succeeding day, the country southward of the hills in Kings, and a considerable part of the towns of Newtown and Jamaica, he sent off an immense quantity of stock, collected there, towards the Great Plains, and ordered off a further quantity from near Hempstead. In the meantime his numbers had dwindled by the anxiety of the militia to reach their homes, and protect or remove their families, to less than one hundred men, who, as well as their horses, were worn down with the fatigue of the duty they had performed. What they had effected demonstrated, that with the force the convention had expected to place under his command, the object to which they attached so much importance, could have been readily accomplished. The subsequent disasters to the American arms would, however, have rendered its accomplishment useless.

Early on the 27th of August, a pass through the hills in Kings county, which had been left unguarded by the American troops, was taken possession of by the enemy. The American outposts were surprised, and the American army driven, after a sanguinary engagement, within their entrenchments at Brooklyn. Numbers of the British troops, during the same day, posted themselves on the hills between Newtown and Jamaica, and parties of the enemy's horse made incursions into the country, within a short distance of the general's force. In this state of things he retired to Jamaica, sending at different times two messages to the convention, apprising them of his situation, of the absolute necessity of re-enforcements, and of his conviction, that the two Long Island regiments could not join him, in consequence of the interruption of the communications. Unfortunately, the convention did not sit on that day, and the general receiving no answer, despatched his brigade-major, who was also a member of that body, to repeat his representation; and this difficult movement was effected with great skill and judgment, and with complete success.

The defeat of the 27th made a most unfavourable impression upon the army. A great proportion of tions, and obtain their orders. The convention, at their meeting on the 28th, still adhered to their favourite project, believing that by crossing the East River to York Island, and making a detour to Flushing, the two regiments might still reach Jamaica. They accordingly sent Major Lawrence to General Washington, with a letter expressing that opinion, and referring him to the brigade-major for explanations as to the means. At the same time they directed the necessary preparations for the transportation and landing of the troops, and receiving soon after a reiteration of the call for an immediate re-enforcement, they deputed two of their body, (John Sloss Hobart and James Townsend, Esqrs.,) to repair to Gen. Woodhull with instructions and advice. Owing probably to the intermediate roads being in possession of the enemy, these gentlemen, it is believed, never reached him. Whether the express despatched by Major Lawrence, as soon as he was ordered on the mission to Gen. Washington, was more successful, is not known.

On the same morning, the convention forwarded a circular to the committees of the different towns of Connecticut, lying on the Sound, requesting their co-operation in removing the stock from Long Island to that state, and an application to the governor of Connecticut for such force as could be speedily obtained. An application to him had been intermediately made by Gen. Washington, to throw over a body of one thousand men upon the island.

In the afternoon, Major Lawrence returned from the American camp, bringing a letter from the commander in chief, declining the request of the convention for the desired re-enforcements, because, in the opinion of himself and his general officers, the men they had were not more than competent to the defence of their lines. The retreat across the river, which was effected on that night, might have been suspected and thwarted, if the passage of the two regiments had been attempted in open day. This no doubt formed an additional reason for non-compliance.

In the meantime, General Woodhull, whose notions of military obedience had been formed in the strictest school, was awaiting the expected orders and re-enforcements. His small body of troops had been directed to proceed eastward in the performance of their duties; he remaining with a few personal attendants at a house on the road side, about two miles from Jamaica, to receive some definitive reply to his messages. Here he was overtaken by a large detachment of the enemy, accompanied by some of the most active of the tories. After an ineffectual attempt at concealment, he surrendered himself a prisoner of war, giving up his sword, as is customary. Elated by the capture of a rebel general, and the president of the rebel convention, they coarsely and insultingly required him to cry, "God save the King!" His refusal to obey the degrading command, was rewarded by a repetition of the insult, and an accompanying cut of a sabre. At each succeeding denial, a blow of the cutlass, or a thrust of the bayonet, was aimed at the defenceless victim. No compunction of manly feeling, nor sensibility to shame, arose among his captors, to arrest this savage butchery, until his head and body were covered with wounds, when the interference of one of the officers averted the instant fate that had seemed to await him, and reserved him for new indignities and a lingering death.

He was hurried from the scene of this dastardly attack to Jamaica, on foot, and there confined in the stone church, formerly standing in the middle of the road, exposed, in his blood-stained garments, to the gaze of all whom curiosity, or malignant feeling, or concealed sympathy, attracted thither. On the following morning he was carried to Gravesend, where, with the late Colonel Robert Troup, and other prisoners, he was thrown on board a filthy prison ship, that had been employed to transport cattle for the use of the British army. From this situation he was subsequently released, and provided with accommodations on shore.

The wounds of the general had assumed a promising state, and hopes were entertained of his recovery, when a mortification of the arm ensued, rendering amputation necessary. Believing that this the troops lost their confidence in their officers, and in themselves. Before this unfortunate event, they met the enemy in the spirit of freemen fighting for their highest interests, and under the persuasion that their thorough use of arms rendered them equal to the disciplined battalions which they were to oppose. But on this occasion, by evolutions which they did not comprehend, they found themselves encompassed with difficulties from which their utmost exertions could not extricate them, and involved in dangers from which their bravery could not deliver them; and entertaining a high opinion of the adroitness of the enemy, in every movement they apprehended a fatal snare.* No sooner had the British secured the possession of Long Island, than they made dispositions to attack New York. It was a serious question whether that place was defensible against so formidable an enemy; and General Washington called a council of general officers, to decide whether it should be evacuated without delay, or longer defended. The general officers, in compliance with the views of congress, were very averse from the abandonment of the city; and it was resolved, contrary to the individual opinion of Washington, to endeavour to defend the city. The army was accordingly arranged into three divisions, one of which, consisting of five thousand men, was to remain in New York; another, amounting to nine thousand, was to be stationed at King's Bridge; and the residue of the army was to occupy the intermediate space, so as to support either extreme. The unexpected movements of the British soon evinced the correctness of the opinion of the general-in-chief; and in a second council it was determined, by a large majority, that it had become not only prudent, but necessary, to withdraw the army from New York. Several English ships of war passed up North River, on the one side of York Island, and East River on the other side; Sir Henry Clinton, embarking at Long Island, at the head of four thousand men, proceeded through Newtown Bay, crossed East River, and landed, under cover of the ships, at Kipp's Bay, about three miles above New York. Works of considerable strength had been thrown up at this place, to oppose the landing of the enemy; but they were immediately abandoned by the troops stationed in them, who, terrified at the fire of the ships, fled precipitately toward their main body, and communicated their panic to a detachment marching to their support. General Washington, to his extreme mortification, met this whole party retreating in the utmost disorder, and exerted himself to rally them; but, on the appearance of a small corps of the British, they again broke, and fled in confusion. Nothing was now left him but to withdraw the few remaining troops from New York, and to secure the posts on the heights. The retreat from New York was effected with a very inconsiderable loss of men, but all the heavy artillery, and a large portion of the baggage, provisions, and military stores, were unavoidably abandoned.

operation would be unavailing, he nevertheless submitted to it, asking leave, at the same time, for his wife to visit him. She arrived soon enough to attend him in his dying moments, and was permitted to remove his dead body, which was opened and prepared for the purpose by the British surgeon. Poignant as her feelings must have been, while accompanying the mangled corpse of her husband in its slow progress over a distance of seventy miles, she had yet the melancholy satisfaction of reflecting, that it was out of the hands of the enemy, and of depositing it on his late possessions, among the remains of his ancestors. A plain marble stone marks the spot, with the following inscription:—

In memory of
GEN. NATHANIEL WOODHULL,
 Who, wounded and a prisoner,
 Died on the 20th day of September, 1776,
 In the 54th year of his age,
 Lamented by all who knew how to value his many private virtues,
 And that pure zeal for the rights of his country,
 To which he perished a victim.

Hoping to negotiate an exchange of General Woodhull, the convention had despatched John Sloss Hobart, Esq., to the camp at Kingsbridge, the more readily to effect that object. He had made some progress in his mission, when he heard of the decease of his colleague, from an inhabitant of Islip, before whose door the sad procession passed.

The massacre of this gallant officer and eminent citizen, aroused in every patriotic breast the feelings due to the atrocity of the act, and to the qualities and station of its subject. Nor can its circumstances ever be recollected without sympathy and admiration for the lofty spirit whom no extremity of suffering could bend to dishonour; nor without disdain and abhorrence of a coward brutality that vainly seeks for extenuation in the bitter animosities of the times.

General Woodhull had, by his marriage with Miss Floyd, a son, Nathaniel, and a daughter, Elizabeth, the former of whom died in his infancy. The latter, who still survives, was married first to Henry Nicoll, a member of the bar, and after his death to the late John Smith, one of the senators in the congress of the United States, from the state of New York.—Knapp's American Biography.

* These melancholy facts were thus narrated by General Washington, in his letter to congress:—"Our situation is truly distressing. The check our detachment sustained on the 27th ultimo, has dispirited too great a proportion of our troops, and filled their minds with apprehension and despair. The militia, instead of calling forth their utmost efforts to a brave and manly opposition, in order to repair our losses, are dismayed, intractable, and impatient to return. Great numbers of them have gone off; in some instances almost by whole regiments, by half ones, and by companies, at a time. This circumstance of itself, independent of others, when fronted by a well-appointed enemy, superior in number to our whole collected force, would be sufficiently disagreeable; but when their example has infected another part of the army,—when their want of discipline, and refusal of almost every kind of restraint and government, have produced a like conduct, but too common to the whole, and an entire disregard of that order and subordination necessary to the well doing of an army, and which had been inculcated before, as well as the nature of our military establishment would admit of,—our condition is still more alarming; and with the deepest concern I am obliged to confess my want of confidence in the generality of the troops."

The British, taking possession of New York, stationed a few troops in the capital; but the main body of their army was on York Island, at no great distance from the American lines. The day after the retreat from New York, a considerable body of the British appearing in the plains between the two camps, the general ordered Colonel Knowlton, with a corps of rangers, and Major Leitch, with three companies of a Virginia regiment, to get in their rear, while he amused them by making apparent dispositions to attack their front. The plan succeeded; and a skirmish ensued, in which the Americans charged the enemy with great intrepidity, and gained considerable advantage; but the principal benefit of this action was its influence in reviving the depressed spirits of the whole army. The armies did not long retain their position on York Island. The British frigates having passed up North River under a fire from Fort Washington and the post opposite to it on the Jersey shore, General Howe embarked a great part of his army in flat-bottomed boats, and, passing through Hell Gate into the Sound, landed at Frog's Neck. The object of the British general was, either to force Washington out of his present lines, or to enclose him in them. Aware of this design, General Washington moved a part of his troops from York Island, to join those at King's Bridge, and detached some regiments to West Chester. A council of war was now called, and the system of evacuating and retreating was adopted, with the exception of Fort Washington, for the defence of which nearly three thousand men were assigned. After a halt of six days, the royal army advanced, not without considerable opposition, along the coast of Long Island Sound, by New Rochelle, to White Plains, where the Americans took a strong position behind entrenchments. This post was maintained for several days, till the British having received considerable re-enforcements, General Washington withdrew to the heights of North Castle, about five miles from White Plains, where, whether from the strength of his position, or from the British general having other objects in view, no attempt at attack was made.

Immediately on leaving White Plains, General Howe directed his attention to Fort Washington and Fort Lee, as their possession would secure the navigation of the Hudson, and facilitate the invasion of New Jersey. On the 15th of November, General Howe, being in readiness for the assault, summoned the garrison to surrender. Colonel Magaw, the commanding officer, in spirited language, replied, that he should defend his works to extremity. On the succeeding morning, the British made the assault in four separate divisions; and having, after a brave and obstinate resistance, surmounted the outworks, again summoned the garrison to surrender. His ammunition being nearly expended, and his force incompetent to repel the numbers which were ready on every side to assail him, Colonel Magaw surrendered himself and his garrison, consisting of two thousand men, prisoners of war. The enemy lost in the assault about eight hundred men, mostly Germans. The conquest of Fort Washington made the evacuation of Fort Lee necessary. Orders were therefore issued to remove the ammunition and stores in it; but, before much progress had been made in this business, Lord Cornwallis crossed the Hudson, with a number of battalions, with the intention to enclose the garrison between the Hackensack and North Rivers. This movement made a precipitate retreat indispensable, which was happily effected with little loss of men; but the greater part of the artillery, stores, and baggage, was left for the enemy. The loss at Fort Washington was heavy. The regiments captured in it were some of the best troops in the army. The tents, camp-kettles, and stores, lost at this place, and at Fort Lee, could not, during the campaign, be replaced, and for the want of them the men suffered extremely. This loss was unnecessarily sustained, as those posts ought, unquestionably, to have been evacuated before Gen. Howe was in a situation to invest them; and this event was the more to be deplored, as the American force was daily diminished by the expiration of the soldiers' term of enlistment, and by the desertion of the militia.

These successes encouraged the British to pursue the remaining American force, with the prospect of annihilating it. Gen. Washington, who had taken post at Newark, on the south side of the Passaic, finding himself unable to make any real opposition, withdrew from that place as the enemy crossed the Passaic, and retreated to Brunswick, on the Raritan; and Lord Cornwallis, on the same day, entered Newark. The retreat was still continued from Brunswick to Princeton; from Princeton to Trenton; and from Trenton to the Pennsylvania side of the Delaware. The pursuit was urged with so much rapidity, that the rear of one army was often within shot of the van of the other.* The winter being now set in, the British army went into quarters, between the Dela-ton, in person, with Stirling's brigade, left not one hour before the British arrived. At Princeton, the British general waited seventeen hours, marched at nine o'clock in the morning of the 8th, and ware and the Hackensack. Trenton, the most important post and barrier, was occupied by a brigade of Hessians, under Colonel Rawle. General Howe now issued a proclamation, in the name of his brother and himself, in which pardon was offered to all persons who, within the space of sixty days, should take the oath of allegiance, and submit to the authority of the British government. The effects of this proclamation were soon apparent. People from several quarters availed themselves of it, and threw down their arms. No city or town, indeed, in its corporate capacity, submitted to the British government; but most of the families of fortune and influence discovered an inclination to return to their allegiance. Many of the yeomanry claimed the benefit of the commissioners' proclamation; and the great body of them were too much taken up with the security of their families and their property, to make any exertion in the public cause. Another source of mortification to the Americans, was the capture of General Lee, who had imprudently ventured to lodge at a house three miles distant from his corps.*

This was the most gloomy period of the revolutionary war. It was the crisis of the struggle of the United States for independence. The American army, reduced in numbers, depressed by defeat, and exhausted by fatigue, naked, barefoot, and destitute of tents, and even of utensils with which to dress their scanty provisions, was fleeing before a triumphant enemy, well appointed and abundantly supplied. A general spirit of despondency through New Jersey was the consequence of this disastrous state of public affairs. But in this worst of times congress stood unmoved; their measures exhibited no symptoms of confusion or dismay; the public danger only roused them to more vigorous exertions, that they might give a firmer tone to the public mind, and animate the citizens of United America to a manly defence of their independence. Beneath this cloud of adversity, too, General Washington shone with a brighter lustre than in the day of his highest prosperity. Not dismayed by all the difficulties which encompassed him, he accommodated his measures to his situation, and still made the good of his country the object of his unwearied pursuit. He ever wore the countenance of composure and confidence, by his own ex-arrived at Trenton at four o'clock in the afternoon, just when the last boat of General Washington's embarkation crossed the river, as if he had calculated, it was observed, with great accuracy, the exact time necessary for his enemy to make his escape."—Steadman's History of the American War, vol. i. p. 220.

* General Lee had been a British officer, and had engaged in the American service before the acceptance of the resignation of his commission. Sir William Howe, for this reason, pretended to view him as a traitor, and at first refused to admit him to his parole, ample inspiring his little band with firmness to struggle with adverse fortune.

While Washington was retreating over the Delaware, the British, under Sir Pelew Parker and General Clinton, took possession of Rhode Island, and blocked up Commodore Hopkins's squadron, and a number of privateers at Providence; but this measure was disadvantageous to the British, as it required the presence of troops which might have been much more advantageously employed.

The neighbourhood of Philadelphia now becoming the seat of war, congress adjourned to Baltimore; resolving at the same time, "that General Washington should be possessed of full powers to order and direct all things relative to the department and the operations of the war." In this extremity, judicious determinations in the cabinet were accompanied with vigorous operations in the field. The united exertions of civil and military officers had by this time brought a considerable body of militia into their ranks. General Sullivan, too, on whom the command of General Lee's division devolved on his capture, promptly obeyed the orders of the commander in chief, and at this period joined him, and General Heath marched a detachment from Peekskill.

The army, with these re-enforcements, amounted to seven thousand men, and General Washington determined to commence active and bold operations. He had noticed the loose and uncovered state of the winter quarters of the British army, and contemplated the preservation of Philadelphia, and the recovery of New Jersey, by sweeping, at one stroke, all the British cantonments upon the Delaware. The present position of his forces favoured the execution of his plan. The troops under the immediate command of General Washington, consisting of about two thousand four hundred men, were ordered to cross the river at M'Konkey's ferry, nine miles above Trenton, to attack that post. General Irvine was directed to cross with his division at Trenton ferry, to secure the bridge below the town, and prevent the retreat of the enemy that way. General Cadwallader received orders to pass the river at Bristol ferry, and assault the post at Burlington. The night of the twenty-fifth was assigned for the execution of this daring scheme. It proved to be severely cold, and so much ice was or to consider him as a subject of exchange. Congress directed the commander in chief to propose to Sir William Howe to exchange six field officers for General Lee. In case the proposal was rejected, that body resolved, that these officers should be closely confined, and in every respect receive the treatment that General Lee did. The proposition not being acceded to, the resolution of congress was carried into effect, by the executives of the states in whose custody the selected field officers were, with a degree of severity which even the treatment of General Lee did not warrant.

made in the river, that General Irvine and General Cadwallader, after having strenuously exerted themselves, found it impracticable to pass their divisions, and their part of the plan totally failed. The commander in chief was, however, more fortunate, and, though with much difficulty and considerable loss of time, succeeded in crossing the river, and reached Trenton by eight o'clock in the morning. The brave Colonel Rawle, the commanding officer, assembled his forces for the defence of his post; but he was mortally wounded by the first fire, and his men, in apparent dismay, attempted to file off towards Princeton. General Washington, perceiving their intention, moved a part of his troops into this road, in their front, and defeated the design. Their artillery being seized, and the Americans pressing upon them, they surrendered. Twenty of the Germans were killed, and a thousand made prisoners. By the failure of General Irvine, a small body of the enemy stationed in the lower part of the town, escaped over the bridge to Bordentown. Of the American troops, two privates were killed, and two frozen to death, and one officer and three or four privates were wounded. Could the other divisions have crossed the Delaware, General Washington's plan, in its full extent, would probably have succeeded. Not thinking it prudent to hazard the fruits of this gallant stroke by more daring attempts, the general, the same day, recrossed the Delaware with his prisoners, with six pieces of artillery, a thousand stand of arms, and some military stores.

This display of enterprise and vigour on the part of the Americans, astonished and perplexed General Howe, and, though in the depth of winter, he found it necessary to commence active operations. Such was the reviving influence on the minds of the American soldiers, and such the skill which the commander in chief exercised, that, after several successful operations following that of Trenton, he not only saved Philadelphia and Pennsylvania, but recovered the greatest part of the Jerseys, in defiance of an army vastly superior to his, in discipline, resources, and numbers. Of all their recent extensive possessions in the Jerseys, the English retained now only the posts of Brunswick and Amboy. These successful operations on the part of the Americans were immediately followed by a proclamation, in the name of General Washington, absolving all those who had been induced to take the oaths of allegiance tendered by the British commissioners, and promising them protection on condition of their subscribing to a form of oath prescribed by congress. The effects of this proclamation were almost instantaneous. The inhabitants of the Jerseys, who had conceived a violent hatred to the British army, on account of their unchecked course of plundering, instantly renounced their allegiance to Great Britain, and attached themselves to the cause of America. Several who were resolved to avenge their wrongs, joined the army under General Washington, while others rendered equal service to the side to which they attached themselves, by supplying the American army with provisions and fuel, and by conveying intelligence of the operations of the British army.

Before entering on the campaign of 1777, it will be proper briefly to notice the state of affairs in Canada. The Americans still possessed Crown Point and Ticonderoga, and were masters of Lake Champlain. To dispossess them of these posts was an arduous and a difficult task, inasmuch as the British had not a vessel on Lake Champlain to oppose the American fleet. Difficult, however, as it was, General Carleton resolved to use every effort to procure an adequate naval force, and at length succeeding in the attainment of his object, he acquired a decided superiority. On the 11th of October, the British fleet discovered that of their opponents very advantageously posted off the island Valicour, with an intention of defending the passage between that island and the western main. A schooner and some gunboats, being considerably ahead of the rest of the fleet, began the engagement, which was continued for some hours on both sides, with great intrepidity. Brigadier-General Waterbury, in the Washington galley, fought with undaunted bravery, until nearly all his officers were killed or wounded, and his vessel greatly injured, when Arnold ordered the remaining shattered vessels to retire up the lake towards Crown Point, to refit. Two days afterwards they were overtaken by the British, and the action was renewed. The Washington galley, crippled in the first action, was soon obliged to strike and surrender. General Arnold, having obstinately defended himself with great judgment and gallantry against a superior force, was at length so closely pressed, that he was compelled to run on shore his own vessel, the Congress galley, which, with five gondolas, was abandoned and blown up. Of sixteen American vessels, eleven were taken or destroyed; of the British, two gondolas were sunk, and one blown up, with sixty men. The loss of men on each side was supposed to be nearly equal; that of the Americans was estimated at about a hundred. The British army and fleet now established themselves at Crown Point, and proceeded to strengthen the old fortifications originally erected at this place by the French in 1756:

but they very soon abandoned this station, and retired into Canada.

Having secured the Hessian prisoners on the Pennsylvania side of the Delaware, Washington recrossed the river two days after the action, and took possession of Trenton. Generals Mifflin and Cadwallader, who lay at Bordentown and Crosswix, with three thousand six hundred militia, were ordered to march up in the night of the first of January, to join the commander in chief, whose whole effective force, including this accession, did not exceed five thousand men. The detachments of the British army which had been distributed over New Jersey, now assembled at Princeton, and were joined by the army from Brunswick, under Lord Cornwallis. From this position they advanced toward Trenton in great force, on the morning of the second of January; and, after some slight skirmishing with troops detached to harass and delay their march, the van of their army reached Trenton about four in the afternoon. On their approach, General Washington retired across the Assumpinck, a rivulet that runs through the town, and by some field pieces, posted on its opposite banks, compelled them, after attempting to cross in several places, to fall back out of the reach of his guns. The two armies, kindling their fires, retained their positions on opposite sides of the rivulet, and kept up a cannonade until night. The situation of the American general was at this moment extremely critical. Nothing but a stream, in many places fordable, separated his army from an enemy in every respect its superior. If he remained in his present position, he was certain of being attacked the next morning, at the hazard of the entire destruction of his little army. If he should retreat over the Delaware, the ice in that river not being firm enough to admit a passage upon it, there was danger of great loss, perhaps of a total defeat; the Jerseys would be in full possession of the enemy; the public mind would be depressed; recruiting would be discouraged; and Philadelphia would be within the reach of General Howe. In this extremity, he boldly determined to abandon the Delaware, and, by a circuitous march along the left flank of the enemy, fall into their rear at Princeton. When it was dark, the army, leaving its fires lighted, and the sentinels on the margin of the creek, decamped with perfect secrecy. About sunrise two British regiments, that were on their march to join the rear of the British army at Maidenhead, fell in with the van of the Americans, conducted by General Mercer, and a very sharp action ensued. The advanced party of Americans, composed chiefly of militia, soon gave way, and the few regulars attached to them could not maintain their ground. General Mercer, while gallantly exerting himself to rally his broken troops, received a mortal wound. General Washington, however, who followed close in their rear, now led on the main body of the army, and attacked the enemy with great spirit. While he exposed himself to their hottest fire, he was so well supported by the same troops which had aided him a few days before in the victory at Trenton, that the British were compelled to give way, and Washington pressed forward to Princeton. A party of the British that had taken refuge in the college, after receiving a few discharges from the American field-pieces, surrendered themselves prisoners of war; but the principal part of the regiment that was left there, saved itself by a precipitate retreat to Brunswick. In this action upwards of a hundred of the British were killed, and nearly three hundred were taken prisoners. Great was the surprise of Lord Cornwallis when the report of the artillery at Princeton, and the arrival of breathless messengers, apprised him that the enemy was in his rear. Alarmed by the danger of his position, he commenced a retreat; and, being harassed by the militia and the countrymen who had suffered from the outrages perpetrated by his troops on their advance, he did not deem himself in safety till he arrived at Brunswick, from whence, by means of the Rariton, he had communication with New York.

The successes of the American arms at Trenton and at Princeton were followed by important consequences. The affairs of the United States, before these events, appeared to be desperate. Two thousand of the regular troops had a right, on the 1st of January, to demand their discharge. The recruiting service was at an end, and general despondency prevailed. The triumphs of the British through the previous parts of the campaign produced a common apprehension, in the citizens of the middle states, that any further struggle would be useless, and that America must eventually return to her allegiance to Great Britain. Many individuals made their peace with the commissioners, and took protection from the officers of the crown; and more discovered an inclination to do it, when opportunity should present itself. General Howe supposed New Jersey restored to the British government, and thought the war drawing to a close. But these successes were considered as great victories, and produced important effects upon the public mind. The character of the commander in chief proportionably rose in the estimation of the great mass of American people, who now respected themselves, and confided in their persevering efforts to secure the great object of contention—the independence of their country. Other causes had a powerful operation upon the minds of the yeomanry of New Jersey. The British commanders tolerated, or at least did not restrain, gross licentiousness in their army. The inhabitants of the state which they boasted was restored to the bosom of the parent country, were treated not as reclaimed friends, but as conquered enemies. The soldiers were guilty of every species of rapine, and with little discrimination between those who had opposed or supported the measures of Britain. The abuse was not limited to the plundering of property. Every indignity was offered to the persons of the inhabitants, not excepting those outrages to the female sex which are felt by ingenuous minds with the keenest anguish, and excite noble spirits to desperate resistance. These aggravated abuses roused the people of New Jersey to repel that army to which they had voluntarily submitted, in the expectation of protection and security. At the dawn of success upon the American arms, they rose in small bands to oppose their invaders. They scoured the country, cut off every soldier who straggled from his corps, and in many instances repelled the foraging parties of the enemy. Early in this year also the Americans were gratified by the arrival of a vessel from France at Portsmouth, in New Hampshire, with upwards of eleven thousand stand of arms, and a thousand barrels of powder; and about the same time ten thousand stand of arms arrived in another part of the United States.

This supply was, however, in some measure counterbalanced. In the month of March the British sent out two detachments to destroy the American stores at Peekskill on the North River, and at Danbury, in Connecticut. Both succeeded in their attempt; and although the stores destroyed did not equal in quantity the report on which the expeditions were planned, yet their loss was sensibly felt by the Americans in the active season of the campaign.

Sir William Howe, having in vain attempted to entice or provoke General Washington to an engagement, had, in June, retired with his army from the Jerseys to Staten Island. After keeping the American general in long and perplexing suspense concerning his intended operations, he at length sailed from Sandy Hook with about sixteen thousand men, entered Chesapeake Bay, and on the 24th of August arrived at the head of Elk river. Generals Grant and Knyphausen having joined him on the 8th of September with the troops under their command, the whole army moved onward in two columns toward Philadelphia, the possession of which was now evidently the object of the British commander. Washington, who regulated his movements by those of the enemy, had by this time, with the whole American army excepting the light infantry, which remained on the lines, taken a position behind Red Clay Creek, on the road leading directly from the enemy's camp to Philadelphia. The British rapidly advanced until they were within two miles of the Americans; while Washington crossed the Brandywine, and took post on a height behind that river. At daybreak on the morning of the 11th it was ascertained that Sir William Howe in person had crossed the Brandywine at the forks, and was rapidly marching down the north side of the river to attack the American army. The commander-in-chief now ordered General Sullivan to form the right wing to oppose the column of Sir William. General Wayne was directed to remain at Chadd's Ford with the left wing, to dispute the passage of the river with Knyphausen. General Greene, with his division, was posted as a reserve in the centre between Sullivan and Wayne, to re-enforce either, as circumstances might require. General Sullivan marched up the river, until he found favourable ground on which to form his men; his left was near the Brandywine, and both flanks were covered with thick wood. At half-past four o'clock, when his line was scarcely formed, the British, under Lord Cornwallis, commenced a spirited attack. The action was for some time severe; but the American right, which was not properly in order when the assault began, at length gave way, and exposed the flank of the troops that maintained their ground to a destructive fire, and continuing to break from the right, the whole line finally gave way. As soon as the firing began, General Washington, with General Greene's division, hastened towards the scene of action, but before his arrival, Sullivan was routed, and the commander-in-chief could only check the pursuit of the enemy, and cover the retreat of the beaten troops. During these transactions General Knyphausen assaulted the works erected for the defence of Chadd's Ford, and soon carried them. General Wayne, by this time learning the fate of the other divisions, drew off his troops. General Washington retreated with his whole force that night to Chester. The American loss in this battle was about three hundred killed and six hundred wounded. Four hundred were made prisoners, but these chiefly of the wounded.

Perceiving that the enemy were moving into the Lancaster-road, towards the city, General Washington took possession of ground near the Warren tavern, on the left of the British, and twenty-three miles from Philadelphia. The protection of his stores at Reading was one object of this movement. The next morning he was informed of the approach of the British army. He immediately put his troops in motion to engage the enemy. The advance of the two hostile armies met and began to skirmish, when a violent storm came on, which prevented a general engagement, and rendered the retreat of the Americans absolutely necessary. The inferiority of the muskets in the hands of the American soldiery, which had been verified in every action, was strikingly illustrated in this retreat. The gun-locks being badly made, and the cartridge-boxes imperfectly constructed, this storm rendered most of the arms unfit for use; and all the ammunition was damaged. The army was in consequence extremely exposed, and their danger became the greater, as many of the soldiers were destitute of bayonets. Fortunately the tempest, which produced such serious mischief to the Americans, prevented the pursuit of the British. Washington still continued to make every effort to save the capital; but Sir William Howe, having secured the command of the Schuylkill, on the 23d of September, crossed it with his whole army; on the 26th he advanced to Germantown; and on the succeeding day Lord Cornwallis, at the head of a strong detachment, entered Philadelphia in triumph.

The American army, re-enforced to eight thousand continental troops and three thousand militia, took a position at Shippack Creek, on the east side of the Schuylkill, about twenty miles from Philadelphia, and sixteen from Germantown. At the latter place was posted the main body of the British army. The first object of Sir William Howe was to subdue the defences, and remove the impediments of the Delaware, that a communication might be opened with the British shipping. General Washington made every effort to prevent the execution of his enemy's design, in the hope of forcing General Howe out of Philadelphia, by preventing supplies of provisions from reaching him. Of the attainment of this important object, he had no doubt, could the passage of the Delaware be rendered impracticable. For this purpose works had been erected on a bank of mud and sand in the river, near the confluence of the Schuylkill, and about seven miles below Philadelphia. The place, from these works, was denominated Fort Island, and the works themselves Fort Mifflin. On a neck of land on the opposite shore of New Jersey, called Red Bank, a fort was constructed and mounted with heavy artillery, and called Fort Mercer. Fort Island and Red Bank were distant from each other half a mile. In the channel of the Delaware, which ran between them, two ranges of chevaux-de-frise were sunk. These consisted of large pieces of timber, strongly framed together, and pointed with iron, and they completely obstructed the passage of ships. These works were covered by several galleys, floating batteries, and armed ships.

Sir William Howe having detached a considerable force from Germantown to operate against the works on the Delaware, General Washington thought this a favourable opportunity to attack the British army in their cantonments. The line of the British encampment crossed the village of Germantown at right angles, near its centre, and its flanks were strongly covered. The army, having moved from its ground about seven in the afternoon of the 3d of October, began an attack about sunrise the next morning. The advance of the column, led by Sullivan, and accompanied by the commander in chief, encountered and drove in a picket, which presently gave way; and his main body, soon following, engaged the light infantry and other troops encamped near the picket, and forced them from their ground. Though closely pursued, Lieutenant-colonel Musgrove, with six companies, took post in a strong stone house, which lay in the way of the Americans, and severely galled them by a fire of musketry from the doors and windows. General Washington immediately ordered a brigade to surround the house; but Colonel Musgrove refused to surrender. Four pieces of cannon were brought against him, but he sustained the fire of them until Major-general Gray, with the third brigade, and Brigadier-general Agnew, with the fourth, came to his assistance, and attacked the Americans with great spirit. In the mean time General Greene arrived with his column, and attacked the right wing of the British. Colonel Matthews routed a party of the British opposed to him; but being enveloped in a most extraordinary fog, he lost sight of the brigade to which he belonged, and was taken prisoner, with his whole regiment. At length a part of the right wing of the British attacked the Americans on the opposite side of the town; and the embarrassments among the American troops, occasioned by the darkness, gave the English time to recover from their consternation. Sullivan's division had penetrated far into Germantown; but the main body of the American army now commenced a retreat, and all efforts to rally it proved ineffectual. In this battle the loss of the Americans, in killed, wounded, and prisoners, was not less than twelve hundred men, while that of the British did not exceed half that number. The American army encamped again on Shippack Creek, but soon after advanced to White Marsh, while the royal army removed from Germantown to Philadelphia.

The works in the Delaware now engaged the attention of the British and American generals. Lord Howe, by continued exertion, having overcome the obstructions which the Americans had placed in the river at Billingsport, a joint attack by sea and land was planned against Red Bank and Fort Island. The Augusta, a sixty-four gun ship, the Merlin frigate, and several small armed vessels, moved up the Delaware to assault the works on Fort or Mud Island. Count Donop crossed into New Jersey with twelve hundred Germans, and in the evening of the 22d appeared before Fort Mercer, on Red Bank. His assault was highly spirited, and the defence intrepid and obstinate. Colonel Green, the commandant, whose garrison did not exceed five hundred men, was unable adequately to man the outworks; but he galled the Germans in their advance, and on their near approach he quitted them, and retired within the inner intrenchments. They pressed forward with undaunted bravery, and the Americans poured upon them a deadly fire. Count Donop was himself mortally wounded at the head of his gallant corps; the second in command soon after fell, and the third immediately drew off his forces. The assailants had four hundred men killed and wounded, while the garrison, fighting under cover, had only thirty. In the mean time, Fort Mifflin was attacked by the shipping, and by batteries erected on the Pennsylvania shore. Incessant volleys of bombs and cannon balls were discharged upon it. But at ebb tide the Augusta and Merlin grounded, and were burnt. The garrison supported this tremendous fire without material injury. The resistance of the forts on the Delaware far exceeding the expectations of the British commanders, they adopted measures to overcome it without the hazard of a second assault. They erected batteries upon Providence Island, within five hundred yards of the American fort. They also brought up their shipping, gun-boats, &c., and from the 10th to the 16th of November, battered the American works. By this time the defences were entirely beaten down, every piece of cannon was dismounted, and one of the ships approached so near Fort Mifflin as to throw hand-grenades from her tops into it, which killed the men upon the platform. The brave garrison received orders to quit the post. Red Bank being no longer useful, its garrison and stores were also withdrawn, on the approach of Lord Cornwallis with five thousand men to invest it.

While these inauspicious operations were carried on in the south, the northern portion of the country was a theatre of events that more than counterbalanced them. A principal object of the British, in the campaign of this year, was to open a free communication between New York and Canada. The British ministry were sanguine in their hopes, that, by effecting this object, New England, which they considered as the soul of the confederacy, might be severed from the neighbouring states, and compelled to submission. In prosecution of this design, an army of British and German troops, amounting to upwards of seven thousand men, exclusive of artillery, was put under the command of Lieutenant-General Burgoyne, an enterprising and able officer. The plan of operations consisted of two parts. General Burgoyne, with the main body, was to advance by way of Lake Champlain, and force his way to Albany, or, at least, so far as to effect a junction with the royal army from New York; and Lieutenant-Colonel St. Leger, with about two hundred British, a regiment of New York loyalists, raised and commanded by Sir John Johnson, and a large body of Indians, was to ascend the St. Lawrence to Lake Ontario, and from that quarter to penetrate toward Albany, by the way of the Mohawk river. General Burgoyne arrived at Quebec in May. In the latter end of June he advanced with his army to Crown Point, and from thence proceeded to invest Ticonderoga, which was soon abandoned by the Americans, under General St. Clair, who, after a distressing march, joined General Schuyler at Fort Edward, on the river Hudson. General Burgoyne, having with incredible labour and fatigue conducted his army through the wilderness from Skenesborough, reached Fort Edward on the 30th of July. As he approached that place, General Schuyler, whose forces, even since the junction of St. Clair, did not exceed four thousand four hundred men, retired over the Hudson to Saratoga. Early in August, St. Leger invested Fort Schuyler, and at first obtained some advantages over the Americans; but, by stratagem,* the Indians were induced to desert him, and finding himself abandoned by seven or eight hundred of these important auxiliaries,† he decamped in great confusion, and returned to Montreal,

* Thacher's Military Journal, p. 107.

† It has ever been a source of reproach against the British, that they employed the sanguinary Indians as their allies. The atrocities they committed might be somewhat exaggerated by General Gates and others; but that instances did occur, to the disgrace of their civilized associates, cannot be denied. The melancholy case of Miss M'Crea will long be remembered. Captain Jones, her lover, an officer in the British army, anxious on her account, engaged some Indians, of two different tribes, to convey her away from among the Americans, for the purpose of security; fearing for her, probably, on account of her father being interested in the royal cause, and of her attachment to himself. Having promised to reward the person who should bring her safe to him with a barrel of rum, the two Indians, who had already conveyed her to some distance, disputed which of them should present to Captain Jones the object of his affection. Each was anxious for the reward; and that the other might not receive it, one of them killed her with a blow of his tomahawk. Upon the first intelligence of what had happened, Burgoyne obliged the Indians to deliver up the murderer, and threatened to put him to death. Many thought the threat would have been executed; but he was pardoned, upon the Indians agreeing to terms enjoined them by Burgoyne, which the general thought would be more efficacious than an execution, to prevent similar mischiefs.—Gordon, vol. ii. p. 544.

The fate of this young woman has excited the sympathies of her friends, and the whole people of the United States. She was the daughter of James McCrea, a clergyman of New Jersey, who died before the revolution. After her father's death, she resided with her brother, at Albany, who removed to the neighbourhood of Fort Edward. There are several versions of this story of blood; but the following is drawn from an examination of all of them. August, 1777, is stated to be the time of her death.

She was a young lady twenty-three years of age, amiable and well educated. She was related to one of the American officers who was at Fort Edward, but on the alarm given by the retreat of the American army from the lakes, she had left her home for a safe retreat in Fort Miller; but when the American forces thought it prudent to retire from that fortress to Vermont, she did not think proper to go with them, and returned to Sandy Hill, the place of her usual residence. Rumour after rumour soon reached her here of the approach of the Indians, and she knew not whither to fly. The whole country from the lakes was in great consternation, and she set out for Fort Edward, with some other females. Her fears were increased, for she felt no confidence in either side. She was on American ground, but was betrothed to an American, who had taken sides with the British, and had gone to Canada, where he was made captain of a company. The lovers had managed to keep up a correspondence, and he was informed, when he reached Fort Anne, that his innamorata was concealed in a house a few miles from Sandy Hill. To go there himself would be dangerous to both, as the woods were infested with scouting parties of American troops, and he, as a tory, would have been harshly dealt with, if taken by them; but, to make all sure, he engaged a party of confidential Indians, to take his horse and go to her place of concealment, and bring her to him in safety. The party reached the place, and she received the letter. He urged her in his letter not to hesitate a moment in putting herself under their protection, but she had some sad misgivings. The Indians had been a terror to that part of the country, and the tales she had heard in her childhood, came thickly upon her distracted mind; but the voice of a lover is law to a confiding woman.

She put herself under their guidance, and they had proceeded on their journey, she on horseback and they on foot, to near a small spring, which may now be seen, when they were met by another party of Indians, who had heard of the reward which her lover had offered, or were sent by him, in his impatience to see her out of danger. A quarrel arose between the parties of Indians, which should have the reward, or at least how it should be shared, when an American scouting party came in sight, and commenced a brisk fire on the Indians, who were thus disputing. They instantly fled; but, unwilling she should be taken by the scouting party, one of the Indians, while the others had fled to the bushes, pulled the girl from the horse, struck his tomahawk into her forehead, tore off her scalp, and gashed her breast, and left her under a huge pine. The scouting party found her there in that situation, and they covered her body, and that of an American officer, who had just fallen by the fire of the Indians, as well as they could, with leaves and earth. Some one of the Indians, with their usual regard to truth, made her lover acquainted with the facts, and another proved his assertions by exhibiting the scalp. He knew the long golden tresses of Miss McCrea, and in defiance of all danger, flew to the spot, to realize the horrid tale. He tore away the thinly spread leaves and earth, clasped the still bleeding body to his arms, and despatched to seize a large depot in New Hampshire Grants, was also defeated by a body of militia under General Stark.* Meanwhile, General Burgoyne, wrapping it in his cloak, bore it to the first wagon he could find, and there hid it from the sight of the world, until he could dispose of it according to his affections. The driver was bribed to silence. The lover sat by the wagon all night, in a state but little short of a quiet delirium, now and then rousing himself to a furious determination to immolate the first Indian he could find; but they were all in their lairs. The morning sun arose, and the wagon went on, he having determined to take the corse on with him to some spot hallowed by the graves of others, and there deposit the sacred relics of the beloved of his soul. But his neglect of duty, and strange demeanor, caused him to be watched by his superior officers, who heard something of the rumour, and they discovered the secret, that the corse of Miss McCrea was in the wagon. They instantly ordered the wagon to stop, and the corse to be buried by the wayside, kindly allowing Captain Jones to stay a few moments, "to see her decent limbs composed," and laid in the bosom of the earth, a coffin having been procured. The grave is about four miles from Fort Edward.

Captain Jones, it is said, survived her but a few years; and this melancholy event is supposed to have brought him to the grave. Perhaps the tragical death of this amiable girl has given a degree of romance to her virtues and personal charms; but it is agreed, by all who knew her, that she was amiable, virtuous, and accomplished. The tomahawk and the scalping knife have nearly become extinct, as weapons of dread to the women and children of our favoured country. To our primitive mothers they were something more than "air drawn daggers," creatures of the imagination; for on their blade and dudgeon were often real gouts of blood.—American Editor.

* "The colonel was furnished with the following curious instructions, which fell into the hands of General Stark: 'To proceed to New Hampshire Grants, cross the mountains, scour the country, with Peter's corps (tories) and the Indians, from Rockingham to Otter Creek, to get horses, carriages, and cattle, and mount Reidesel's regiment of dragoons; to go down Connecticut river as far as Brattleborough, and return by the great road to Albany, there to meet General Burgoyne; to endeavour to make the country believe it was the advanced body of the general's army, who was to cross Connecticut river and proceed to Boston, and that at Springfield they were to be joined by the troops from Rhode Island. All officers, civil and military, acting under the congress, were to be made prisoners. To tax the towns where they halted, with such articles as they wanted, and take hostages for the performance, &c. You are to bring all horses fit to mount the dragoons, or to serve as battalion horses for the troops, with as many saddles and bridles as can be found. The number of horses requisite, besides those for the dragoons, ought to be thirteen hundred; if you can bring more, so much the better. The horses must be tied in strings of ten each, in order that one man may lead ten horses.' This redoubtable commander surely must be one of the happiest men of the age, to imagine that such prodigious achievements were at his command,—that such invaluable resources were within his grasp. But, alas! the wisest of men are liable to disappointment in their sanguine calculations, and to have their favourite projects frustrated by the casualties of war. This is remarkably verified in the present instance."—Thacher's Military Journal, p. 109.

Hinton has dismissed this battle, which deserves a volume, in less than three lines; for it was the prelude to the capture of Burgoyne, an incident more important than any that occurred in the military history of our country. It settled the treatment of prisoners, a great event in our warfare, and secured our independence. John Stark, the hero of this battle, was born at Londonderry, in the state of New Hampshire, in the year 1728. When quite a young man, he was taken, while on a hunting excursion, by the St. Francis Indians, and carried to Canada. From this captivity he was released by the payment of a ransom obtained from his friends. He went on hunting expeditions, after his return, in order to refund the sum paid for his deliverance. When the five companies having collected about thirty days' provision, and thrown a bridge of boats over the Hudson, crossed that river on the 13th and 14th of September, and of rangers were raised by Major Rogers, in 1755, Stark was appointed a lieutenant of a company. Distinguishing himself in this body, he was made a captain, and increased his reputation by his prowess in every campaign. The history of the rangers is full of interest; they were the most hardy and invincible of soldiers engaged in a border war—the proper school for heroes. From the peace of 1763 to 75, Stark was engaged as a farmer; but hearing of the battle of Lexington, he at once repaired to Cambridge. There receiving a commission as colonel, he hastened to raise a regiment in his native state, and was marching to join the army at Cambridge, when the battle of Bunker Hill was fought. He led his troops directly on to the hill, and took his position on the left of the breastwork, behind the rail fence. (See battle of Bunker Hill, page 225.) His bravery on this occasion was worthy of his former reputation. In the campaign of 1776, he proceeded from New York to Canada. At the battle of Trenton, he commanded the right wing, and was also at Princeton.

Being overlooked, in a promotion of officers, in the spring of 1777, he retired from the service of the confederation, to his farm. In July of that year, he accepted the command of the New Hampshire troops, on condition that he should not be obliged to serve under any continental officer, and marched to Vermont, to be in readiness to assist in checking Burgoyne in his progress toward Albany, where it was supposed the British army expected to winter. His troops were at Bennington when he received information that a German force had been detached by the British commander in chief to collect cattle and forage. He lost no time in meeting the enemy, and with success. Many accounts of this memorable affair have been given by our historians; we shall subjoin an interesting description of that battle, from the pen of one of the officers under Count Baum. It is true in all its general features, and is a compliment to the bravery of General Stark and his army. For this fight, Stark received the thanks of congress, and was appointed a brigadier-general by that body; and recruiting a new force, was in season to assist in the capture of Burgoyne. General Stark continued in the army until the revolutionary conflict was over, and then retired to his farm again. He enjoyed a green old age, living until he was ninety-three years old. He died in 1822, and over his ashes a monument has been erected by his family. He was a man of robust constitution, and of great firmness of character. He was brave, honest, and direct. He spoke what he thought, without the fear of any one. His mansion was as hospitable as a free heart and liberal hand could make it. To the last years of his life he conversed upon the events of the revolution with energy and patriotism. He detailed his border fights with graphic minuteness. He abhorred hypocrisy and cowardice, and denounced these vices in no measured terms. This race of soldier-patriarchs, who led their sons and sent out their grandsons to battle, have now become nearly extinct.—American Editor.

The great object which General Burgoyne sought to obtain, was to force his way down the course of the Hudson, and rallying round him, as he proceeded, as many loyalists as chose to follow his fortunes, to effect a junction with the army of General Howe, then blockaded in New York. To facilitate this measure, by distracting the attention of the enemy, a smaller expedition, under the orders of Colonel St. Leger, had been organized, which, moving through the western part of Chester county, threatened Fort Stanwix, a rudely fortified station upon the Mohawk. Colonel St. Leger's force was extremely weak, particularly in troops of the line, of which no more than four hundred, and those composed of detachments from different regiments, served under him; and the whole, including provincials, Canadians, and some hundreds of Indians, barely came up to twelve hundred men. He pushed forward, however, with diligence, and on the third of August invested the fortress, sending intelligence, at the same time, to the general in chief, of his situation; and in two days afterwards he had the good fortune to surprise and cut to pieces a body of eight hundred Americans, when on their march to relieve the garrison. So far all things had succeeded according to our wish; but Colonel St. Leger gradually found, that in the expectations which he had been led to form respecting the loyalty of the inhabitants of the invaded district, the grossest impositions had been practised on him. Instead of crowds of volunteers, scarcely an individual came to his camp; and of the few who did come, it was more than suspected, that by far the greater proportion came with a treacherous intention.

That these advantages, trifling as they were, might not be wholly wasted, it became incumbent on Gen. Burgoyne to advance without delay; whilst the deplorable deficiency in the means of transport under which he laboured, seemed to render all attempts at moving the army fruitless. Though our troops had toiled without intermission during three whole weeks, there was in camp no greater stock of provisions than promised to suffice for four days' consumption; and to move forward with a supply so slender, into a desert country, appeared to a leader of the old school little better than insanity. I have called it a desert country, not only with reference to its natural sterility,—and heaven knows it was sterile enough,—but because of the pains which were taken, and unfortunately with too great success, to sweep its few cultivated spots of all articles likely to benefit the invaders. In doing this, the enemy showed no clemency either to friend or foe. All the fields of standing corn were laid waste, the cattle were driven away, and every particle of grain, as well as morsel of grass, carefully removed; so that we could depend for subsistence, both for men and horses, only upon the magazines which we might ourselves establish. But our draft animals were so inadequate to the conveyance of stores, that no magazine had as yet been formed farther in advance than Fort George; and Fort George was too much in the rear to be of service as a base of operations, after we should have quitted the position which we now occupied.

I have said that the American army retreated as we advanced, cutting up the roads, and devastating the face of the country over which they passed. They were now, according to the best accounts which we could receive, at Saratoga, a hamlet, or rather farm, on the left bank of the Hudson, and about half way between Fort Edward and the Mohawk. It seemed advisable to General Burgoyne to threaten them there: for if they risked an action, he had no apprehensions as to the result; if they retired, Colonel St. Leger would be in their rear; and should they succeed in escaping both divisions, then was the road to Albany thrown open, and the principal design of the inroad attained. Increased exertions were accordingly used to bring a flotilla from the lakes to the nearest navigable point in the river; and so unremitting were they, that before the close of the first week in August, a considerable number of boats and barges, laden with such stores as could be forwarded, were launched upon the stream, and ready to accompany the army.

Whilst these projects were in contemplation, and the above means adopted for bringing them to an issue, a piece of information was obtained at head-quarters, which promised to bring about the happiest results, by relieving us at once from all the embarrassments attendant upon meagre supplies and inadequate means of transport. About twenty miles to the eastward of the Hudson, lies the obscure village of Bennington—a cluster of poor cottages, situated in a wild country, between the forks of the Hossac. Here the enemy had gathered together a considerable depot of cattle, corn, horses, and wheel carriages, most of which were drawn across the Connecticut river from the provinces of New England; and as it was understood to be guarded by a party of militia only, an attempt to surprise it seemed by no means unjustifiable. It is true, that between Fort Edward and Bennington, the means of communication were exceedingly defective. One prodigious forest, bottomed in swamps and morasses, covered the whole face of the country; through which, no body of men, unless familiarly accustomed to such expeditions, could hope to make their way, at all events with celerity. But the necessities of the army were pressing; the state of the campaign was a critical one; and the risk, though doubtless great, was considered by no means to outweigh the advantages to be derived from success. General Burgoyne determined to incur it; and a few hours sufficed for the final arrangement of his plan, and drawing up of his instructions.

There were attached to our little army, two hundred German dragoons; men of tried valour and enterprise, but destitute of horses. These the general selected as part of the force to be employed in the surprise of Bennington; not only because he entertained the most perfect confidence in their steadiness, but because he conceived, that in the country into which they were about to penetrate, they might be able to pick up a sufficient number of horses for their own use. In addition to these, the Canadian rangers, a detachment of provincials, about one hundred Indians, and Captain Fraser's marksmen, with two pieces of light cannon, were allotted to this service; and the whole, amounting to five hundred men, were placed under the orders of Lieutenant Colonel Baume. The latter officer received special instructions to proceed with extreme caution. He was particularly enjoined to keep his dragoons together, and to feel his way, foot by foot, with his light troops alone; and whilst it was broadly insinuated that he might look for recruits among the well disposed inhabitants, the greatest care was taken to impress him with the conviction, that they were not to be implicitly trusted. It would have been well both for himself and his followers, had these advices been somewhat more carefully remembered. But there was a fatality attending all our measures, which soon began to develop itself; and perhaps the fate of the present expedition ought to have been taken as a fair warning of the destiny which awaited the army at large.

Though all these arrangements were completed, and the troops destined to fulfil them told off so early as the beginning of August, the middle of the month was approaching ere this attempt, on the success of which so much was supposed to depend, was made. Perhaps there was no great error here, more especially as the column broke up from its bivouac, and advanced to the point where the Hudson was to be crossed. It was a toilsome and a tedious march—a little, and but a little enlivened, by a harmless skirmish, which some straggling Americans chose to maintain with our detached Indians. After enduring great privations with a spirit which failed not to the last, our army at length reached its destined resting place, and took up a position on the eastern bank of the Hudson, immediately opposite to the heights of Saratoga.

This done, and the enemy having withdrawn as far as Stillwater, the general proceeded to carry into execution his projected design against Bennington. At an early hour in the morning of the 12th, our little band, unincumbered with any quantity of baggage besides that which each man could conveniently carry upon his back, set off in the direction of Batten Kill, where it arrived, without meeting with any adventure, by four o'clock in the afternoon. Here we halted for the night, by which means a company of fifty chasseurs overtook us, whom General Burgoyne, distrustful of our strength, sent to re-enforce us; but at five next morning, we were again in motion, and pushed cautiously, though with a quick pace, in the direction of Cambridge. Our journey this day proved in many respects more interesting than any which we had performed since the pursuit from Ticonderoga. The country, as we advanced, exhibited greater signs of cultivation, a field or two interposing here and there amidst the plains, and a few detached cottages lying by the wayside; whilst several of the country people voluntarily joined us, and took the oath of allegiance to the king. From them we learned that a company of Americans had been left in Cambridge as a guard over some cattle which were on their way to Bennington; and as it was deemed of importance to seize such, wherever they could be found, our scouts were commanded to quicken their pace, and surprise them.

I was not one of the party thus sent forward, that duty having been entrusted to thirty provincials and fifty Indians; but the latter attained their object after a trifling skirmish, in which one man only was wounded. Nothing could be finer than the effect produced by the desultory firing which was kept up on that occasion by the retreating enemy and our pursuers. It so happened that the point where they first met, though covered with a deep and ex-of the American army; and about noon on the 19th advanced in full force against it. The right wing was commanded by General Burgoyne, and covered tensive forest, was not incumbered by brush wood or other deafening substances; and hence each report, as it rolled from tree to tree and glade to glade, sounded as if not one, but fifty muskets, had been fired. You will easily believe that the first discharge caused us to quicken our pace, and to recover our ranks, which had begun to straggle; but no opportunity was afforded us of joining. The enemy fought only to escape; and hence, when we reached Cambridge, we found it in full occupation of our advance, which had made prizes of no inconsiderable quantity of carts and wagons, as well as of cattle and horses.

The satisfaction arising from this first success was not, however, so great as to render us indifferent to the nature of the intelligence which met us there. Instead of four or five hundred men, it was accurately ascertained that not fewer than eighteen hundred were in Bennington; and though some appeared to be of opinion that they would not wait to receive us, there were others who scrupled not to foretell a widely different result. Now, in spite of our late re-enforcement, our whole strength fell considerably short of six hundred men; and of these, a full hundred were Indians, on whom no great reliance could be placed. Still, Colonel Baume appeared to consider his situation secure. He spoke, as far as we could understand him, in very contemptuous terms of the Americans, and busily employed himself in receiving the submission of the inhabitants, who in great numbers flocked to his standard. Unfortunately, Colonel Baume forgot the cautions which had been so strongly impressed upon him. He considered all persons sincere who professed attachment to the royal cause; alluding in their presence, and without reserve, both to his own numbers and designs; and as by far the greater proportion were in reality traitors to us, every circumstance connected with our dispositions and plans became as well known to the enemy as to ourselves.

It was their leader's intention to march at once upon Bennington; for which purpose his little corps was under arms and in column, long before sunrise on the 14th. For some time our progress was, as it had hitherto been, unimpeded; but as we approached the northern branch of the Hossac, by the farm and bridge of Sankcoick, the arrangements of the enemy began gradually to develop themselves.

A flying party of Americans were discovered in front of the farm, which, on the approach of our people, spread themselves along the underwood; and they were not dislodged till after a good deal of firing, which caused us some loss in several of the most forward among the savages. At last, however, they retreated, abandoning a mill which they had previously fortified, and breaking down the bridge; and long before the latter could be repaired, they were safe from further molestation. There was a good deal to excite apprehension even in this unimportant rencontre. The Americans, though they gave way at last, fought like men conscious of their own prowess, and confident in the strength of the support which was behind them; and this, coupled with the rumours which had reached us relative to the amount of the garrison of Bennington, failed not to startle both Colonel Baume and the boldest of his troops. Besides, much time was lost by the destruction of the bridge. It required a full hour so far to repair it as to enable the guns and horses to pass; and when this was done, the day had declined so far as to render any attempt to reach the point of our destination before sunset fruitless. We accordingly bivouacked at the farm of Walmscott, about four miles from Sankcoick, and three from Bennington; where the night was spent, if not in a sense of absolute security, at all events without the occurrence of any accident capable of exciting alarm.

The morning of the 15th came in with heavy rains, and a perfect hurricane of wind; consequently, the little column, instead of pressing forward, was fain to keep under shelter of the farm building. But it was not permitted to remain long in a situation so comfortable. Our early parade had just been dismissed, when a few shots in the direction of the advanced sentries gave notice that the Americans, instead of waiting to be attacked, were on the move; and in a few minutes afterwards, a general commotion at by General Fraser and Colonel Breyman, with the grenadiers and light infantry, who were posted along some high grounds on the right. The front and the outposts, indicated more by the shouts of the Indians than the report of their arms, warned us to make ready for an immediate attack. Colonel Baume lost no time in preparing to meet it. Forming his dismounted dragoons in close column among the homestead, he directed the provincials, supported by Fraser's marksmen, to advance to the assistance of the pickets, with orders to dispute every inch of ground to the utmost, and finally to retire upon the reserve, should all their efforts to maintain themselves prove ineffectual.

In an instant we were in motion, and a few minutes sufficed to bring us to the scene of action. We found our Indians threatened, rather than seriously assailed, by a considerable body of militia men, before whom they were falling back, leisurely and in order; but such was the violence of the storm, that not one out of a dozen muskets would explode, and hence the skirmish was neither very animated nor very bloody. On seeing us, our savage allies uttered a yell, which seemed to strike panic into the bosoms of their assailants: for the latter instantly paused, hung back as it were irresolute, and finally retired. We followed for a time, briskly and impetuously; but we likewise felt the bad effects of the weather too much to seek a general engagement; and as the movements of the enemy seemed to indicate a wish on their parts to draw us on, we were of course extremely shy in trusting ourselves beyond our own limits. We accordingly halted as soon as we had recovered the ground which the savages had lost, and, lying down behind the trees, contented ourselves with watching the result during many hours, and striving, as well as we could, to keep the priming of our rifles from the rain.

Whether the Americans ever entertained any serious intention of attacking this day, I cannot pretend to determine; but if they did, the state of the weather compelled them to relinquish it. Yet they ventured to advance, from time to time, in considerable numbers, as if resolved to try how far our position was tenable; and on each occasion a little firing took place; but no impression was made upon us, and the rain continuing to fall without intermission, they at last desisted from their efforts, and withdrew. Their proceedings were not, however, of a nature to be disregarded, or held in contempt, by a force so insignificant as ours. Colonel Baume immediately despatched a messenger to the rear, for the purpose of bringing up an additional corps which General Burgoyne had stationed at Batten Kill to support us; whilst he set sedulously to the task of fortifying a position in which he might await the coming up of supplies, of which he began now to be conscious that he stood in need.

The farm of Walmscott lies upon both banks of the Hossac, and consisted at this time of some six or eight log built huts, scattered here and there over the narrow expanse of cultivated ground. To the left was a height, which Colonel Baume hastened to occupy: he posted here the dragoons, with a portion of the marksmen on their right, in rear of a little zigzag breastwork, composed of logs and loose earth. Such of the detached houses as came within the compass of his position, he filled with Canadians, supporting them with detachments of chasseurs and grenadiers, likewise entrenched behind breastworks; and he kept the whole, with the exception of about a hundred men, on the north side of the stream, holding the woods upon his flanks, in his front and rear, by the Indians.

To complete these arrangements, and throw up the few works which were to render them efficient, occupied the entire day, and some portion of the night of the 15th; and seldom have men undergone hardships more severe than our people endured whilst thus employed. Let it be borne in mind, that the 15th was a day of continued rain; not such rain as we are accustomed to witness in this country, but an absolute torrent, to afford shelter against which human ingenuity has yet devised no covering. Under this, the men toiled on, the earth which they threw up being repeatedly washed down again, and the holes and ditches which they dug out filled in a moment, and so rendered worse than useless. But their patience equalled the difficulties which it was called upon to surflanks were covered by Indians, provincials, and Canadians. The left wing and artillery were commanded by Major-Generals Phillips and Reidesel, mount. Each man felt, too, that he was labouring for his own personal safety, not less than for the benefit of the whole; and all were, in consequence, inspired with a principle of perfect heroism and self-devotion. Poor fellows! their spirit and perseverance were, on the present occasion, of little avail. They sufficed, indeed, to save their possessors from dishonour, and enabled them to sell their lives dearly; but they were quite inadequate to secure victory, or even to ward off defeat.

As soon as darkness fairly set in, our corps, which had kept its station on the opposite side of the stream, was silently withdrawn, and took ground beside Reidesel's dragoons, on the little hill above alluded to. There we passed the night, not very comfortably, as may be well supposed, seeing that no fires were lighted, and that we were all impressed with a powerful sense of impending danger; but if there was an absence of mirth from amongst us, there was no approximation to terror; for we held our own valour at the highest, and rated that of our opponents somewhat too cheaply. Yet there were few amongst us that slept very soundly. We could not but remember, that we were cut off, by a wide tract of desolate country, from all communication with our friends, and exposed to attacks on every side from a numerous enemy; and the whoop which the savages raised from time to time, as well as an occasional musket shot, gave notice, that even now that enemy was not inactive. Our anxiety for the return of day was greater by far than perhaps any of us would have been willing to acknowledge, even to his dearest friend; and the feeling of satisfaction was general, when the gradual reddening of the eastern sky denoted that it was fast approaching.

The morning of the 16th rose beautifully serene. The storm of the preceding day having expended itself, not a cloud was left to darken the face of the heavens; whilst the very leaves hung motionless, and the long grass waved not, under the influence of a perfect calm. Every object around, too, appeared to peculiar advantage; for the fields looked green and refreshed, the river was swollen and tumultuous, and the branches were all loaded with dew-drops, which glittered in the sun's early rays like so many diamonds. Nor would it be easy to imagine any scene more rife with peaceful and even pastoral beauty. Looking down from the summit of the rising ground, I beheld immediately beneath me a wide sweep of stately forest, interrupted at remote intervals by green meadows or yellow corn fields; whilst here and there a cottage, a shed, or some other primitive edifice, reared its modest head as if for the purpose of reminding the spectator, that man had begun his inroads upon nature, without as yet taking away from her simplicity and grandeur. I hardly recollect a scene which struck me at the moment more forcibly, or which has left a deeper or more lasting impression on my memory.

I have said that the morning of the 16th rose beautifully serene; and it is not to the operations of the elements alone that my expression applies. All was perfectly quiet at the outposts, not an enemy having been seen, nor an alarming sound heard, for several hours previous to sunrise. So peaceable, indeed, was the aspect which matters bore, that our leaders felt warmly disposed to resume the offensive, without waiting the arrival of the additional corps for which they had applied; and orders were already issued for the men to eat their breakfasts, preparatory to more active operations. But the arms were scarcely piled, and the havresacks unslung, when symptoms of a state of affairs different from that which had been anticipated, began to show themselves, and our people were recalled to their ranks in all haste, almost as soon as they had quitted them. From more than one quarter scouts came in to report, that columns of armed men were approaching though whether with a friendly or hostile intention, neither their appearance nor actions enabled our informants to ascertain.

It has been stated, that during the last day's march our little corps was joined by many of the country people; most of whom demanded and obtained arms, as persons friendly to the royal cause. How Colonel Baume became so completely duped as to place reliance on these men, I know not; but having listened with compla-who proceeded along the great road. Colonel Morgan, who was detached to observe their motions, and to harass them as they advanced, soon fell in with cency to their previous assurances, that in Bennington a large majority of the populace were our friends, he was somehow or other persuaded to believe, that the armed bands of whose approach he was warned, were loyalists on their way to make a tender of their services to the leader of the king's troops. Filled with this idea, he despatched positive orders to the outposts, that no molestations should be offered to the advancing columns; but that the pickets retiring before them should join the main body, where every disposition was made to receive either friend or foe. Unfortunately for us, these orders were but too faithfully obeyed. About half past nine o'clock, I, who was not in the secret, beheld, to my utter amazement, our advanced parties withdraw without firing a shot, from thickets which might have been maintained for hours against any superiority of numbers; and the same thickets quickly occupied by men, whose whole demeanour, as well as their dress and style of equipment, plainly and incontestably pointed them out as Americans.

I cannot pretend to describe the state of excitation and alarm into which our little band was now thrown. With the solitary exception of our leader, there was not a man amongst us who appeared otherwise than satisfied that those to whom he had listened were traitors; and that unless some prompt and vigorous measures were adopted, their treachery would be crowned with its full reward. Captain Fraser, in particular, seemed strongly imbued with the conviction, that we were wilfully deceived. He pointed out, in plain language, the extreme improbability of the story which these deserters had told, and warmly urged our chief to withdraw his confidence from them; but all his arguments proved fruitless. Colonel Baume remained convinced of their fidelity. He saw no reason to doubt that the people whose approach excited so much apprehension, were the same of whose arrival he had been forewarned; and he was prevented from placing himself entirely in their power, only by the positive refusal of his followers to obey orders given to that effect, and the rash impetuosity of the enemy.

We might have stood about half an hour under arms, watching the proceedings of a column of four or five hundred men, who, after dislodging the pickets, had halted just at the edge of the open country, when a sudden trampling of feet in the forest on our right, followed by the report of several muskets, attracted our attention. A patrol was instantly sent in the direction of the sound; but before the party composing it had proceeded many yards from the lines, a loud shout, followed by a rapid though straggling fire of musketry, warned us to prepare for a meeting the reverse of friendly. Instantly the Indians came pouring in, carrying dismay and confusion in their countenance and gestures. We were surrounded on all sides; columns were advancing everywhere against us, and those whom we had hitherto treated as friends, had only waited till the arrival of their support might justify them in advancing. There was no falsehood in these reports, though made by men who spoke rather from their fears than their knowledge. The column in our front no sooner heard the shout, than they replied cordially and loudly to it; then, firing a volley with deliberate and murderous aim, rushed furiously towards us. Now then, at length, our leader's dreams of security were dispelled. He found himself attacked in front and flank by thrice his numbers, who pressed forward with the confidence which our late proceedings were calculated to produce; whilst the very persons in whom he had trusted, and to whom he had given arms, lost no time in turning them against him. These fellows no sooner heard their comrades cry, than they deliberately discharged their muskets amongst Reidesel's dragoons; and dispersing before any steps could be taken to seize them, escaped, with the exception of one or two, to their friends.

If Colonel Baume had permitted himself to be duped into a great error, it is no more than justice to confess, that he exerted himself manfully to remedy the evil, and avert its consequences. Our little band, which had hitherto remained in column, was instantly ordered to extend, and the troops lining the breastwork replied to the fire of the Americans with extreme celerity and considerable effect. So close and destructive, indeed, was our first volley, that the assailtheir pickets in front of their right wing, attacked them sharply, and drove them in. A strong corps was brought up to support them, and, after a severe ants recoiled before it, and would have retreated, in all probability, within the wood; but ere we could take advantage of the confusion produced, fresh attacks developed themselves, and we were warmly engaged on every side, and from all quarters. It became evident that each of our detached posts was about to be assailed at the same instant. Not one of our dispositions had been concealed from the enemy, who, on the contrary, seemed to be aware of the exact number of men stationed at each point; and they were one and all threatened by a force perfectly adequate to bear down opposition, and yet by no means disproportionately large, or such as to render the main body inefficient. All, moreover, was done with the sagacity and coolness of veterans, who perfectly understood the nature of the resistance to be expected, and the difficulties to be overcome, and who, having well considered and matured their plans, were resolved to carry them into execution at all hazards, and at every expense of life.

It was at this moment, when the heads of columns began to show themselves in rear of our right and left, that the Indians, who had hitherto acted with spirit, and something like order, lost all confidence, and fled. Alarmed at the prospect of having their retreat cut off, they stole away, after their own fashion, in single files, in spite of the strenuous remonstrances of Baume, and of their own officers, leaving us more than ever exposed, by the abandonment of that angle of the intrenchments which they had been appointed to maintain. But even this spectacle, distressing as it doubtless was, failed in affecting our people with a feeling at all akin to despair. The vacancy which the retreat of the savages occasioned, was promptly filled up by one of our two field-pieces, whilst the other poured destruction among the enemy in front, as often as they showed themselves in the open country, or threatened to advance.

In this state things continued upwards of three quarters of an hour. Though repeatedly assailed in front, flanks, and rear, we maintained ourselves with so much obstinacy, as to inspire a hope that the enemy might even yet be kept at bay till the arrival of Breyman's corps, now momentarily expected, when an accident occurred, which at once put an end to this expectation, and exposed us, almost defenceless, to our fate. The solitary tumble which contained the whole of our spare ammunition, became ignited, and blew up with a violence, which shook the very ground under our feet, and caused a momentary cessation in firing, both on our side and that of the enemy. But the cessation was only for a moment. The American officers, guessing the extent of our calamity, cheered their men on to fresh exertions. They rushed up the ascent with redoubled ardour, in spite of the heavy volley which we poured in to check them; and finding our guns silent, they sprang over the parapet, and dashed within our works. For a few seconds the scene which ensued defies all power of language to describe. The bayonet, the butt of the rifle, the sabre, the pike, were in full play; and men fell, as they rarely fall in modern war, under the direct blows of their enemies. But such a struggle could not, in the nature of things, be of long continuance. Outnumbered, broken, and somewhat disheartened by late events, our people wavered, and fell back, or fought singly and unconnectedly, till they were either cut down at their posts, obstinately defending themselves, or compelled to surrender. Of Reidesel's dismounted dragoons, few survived to tell how nobly they had behaved; Colonel Baume, shot through the body by a rifle ball, fell mortally wounded; and all order and discipline being lost, flight, or submission, was alone thought of. For my own part, whether the feeling arose from desperation or accident I cannot tell, but I resolved not to be taken. As yet I had escaped almost unhurt, a slight flesh wound in the left arm having alone fallen to my share; and gathering around me about thirty of my comrades, we made a rush where the enemy's ranks appeared weakest, and burst through. This done, each man made haste to shift for himself, without pausing to consider the fate of his neighbour; and losing one third of our number from the enemy's fire, the remainder took refuge in groups of two or three, within the forest.—Glick.

encounter, Morgan was compelled to give way ; but a regiment was ordered to assist him, and the action became more general. The commanders on both sides supported and re-enforced their respective parties ; and about four o'clock, Arnold, with nine continental regiments and Morgan's corps, was completely engaged with the whole right wing of the British army. The engagement began at three o'clock in the afternoon, and continued till after sunset, when the Americans thought proper to retire, and leave the British masters of the field of battle. The loss on each side was nearly equal, six hundred being killed and wounded on the part of the British, and the same number on the side of the Americans. No advantages resulted to the British troops from this encounter ; while the conduct of the Americans fully convinced every one, "that they were able to sustain an attack in open plains with the intrepidity, the spirit, and the coolness of veterans. For four hours they maintained a contest hand to hand ; and when they retired, it was not because they were conquered, but because the approach of night made a retreat to their camp absolutely necessary."* Both armies lay some time in sight of each other, each fortifying its camp in the strongest manner possible. Meanwhile, the difficulties of the British general were daily increasing ; his auxiliary Indians deserted him soon after the battle of Stillwater ; and his army, reduced to little more than five thousand men, was limited to half the usual allowance of provisions ; the stock of forage also was entirely exhausted, and his horses were perishing in great numbers ; the American army had become so augmented as to render him diffident of making good his retreat ; and, to aggravate his distress, no intelligence had yet been received of the approach of General Clinton, or of any diversion in his favour from New York. In this exigen-

cy, General Burgoyne resolved to examine the possibility of dislodging the Americans from their posts on the left, by which means he would be enabled to retreat to the lakes. For this purpose he drew out fifteen hundred men, which he headed himself, attended by Generals Phillips, Reidesel, and Fraser. This detachment had scarcely formed, within less than half a mile of the American intrenchments, when a furious attack was made, which, though bravely resisted, was decidedly to the advantage of the assailants. General Burgoyne now became convinced that it was impossible to conduct any further offensive operations, and endeavoured to make good his retreat to Fort George. Artificers were accordingly despatched, under a strong escort, to repair the bridges, and open the roads, but they were compelled to make a precipitate retreat. The situation of General Burgoyne becoming every hour more hazardous, he resolved to attempt a retreat by night to Fort Edward ; but even this retrograde movement was rendered impracticable. While the army was preparing to march, intelligence was received that the Americans had already possessed themselves of the fort, and that they were well provided with artillery. No avenue to escape now appeared. Incessant toil and continual engagements had worn down the British army ; its provisions were nearly exhausted, and there were no means of procuring a supply ; while the American army, which was daily increasing, was already much greater than the British in point of numbers, and almost encircled them. In this extremity, the British general called a council of war ; and it was unanimously resolved to enter into a convention with General Gates. Preliminaries were soon settled, and the royal army, to the number of five thousand seven hundred and fifty, surrendered prisoners of war.†

* Steadman, vol. i. p. 337.

† Burgoyne had, on his entrance into the territory of New York, published a manifesto, which did not evince that good taste for which the general had been distinguished ; but probably he mistook the taste and feelings of those he came to subdue. This manifesto was answered by Washington in a very forcible manner. This answer contains satire and argument conveyed in the most elegant language. Its spirit is also fine and bold ; the gasconade of the English commander is met with manly defiance, and he was worsted before the battle commenced, in a way he hardly expected. Burgoyne was said to have been a natural son of Lord Bingley ; some, however, think that he had still more important relations. In 1762, he had a command in Portugal. After his return to England, he was chosen a member of parliament, and became a privy counselor. Gallant, gay, learned, eloquent, and in the full sunshine of patronage, he had taken the command of the northern army, and indulged the hope of a brilliant campaign. The fates were against him, and he was obliged to give up all his splendid visions of glory, and prepare to defend himself before his king and country. In this he was able ; and one would think that he had offered a sufficient excuse for every thing but his ignorance of the foe he was to meet, and his staying so long on the frontiers after St. Clair's retreat ; but for this also he had a plausible excuse. The British ministry were mortified and distressed at this unexpected failure ; and to turn the popular indignation from themselves, they were obliged to sacrifice their favourite. They ordered him to return forthwith to America as a prisoner ; but this was not insisted upon ; yet, he was obliged to resign all his offices and emoluments, which were very considerable. He was still returned to parliament, or held his seat there from a previous election, and joined in the opposition to the continuance of the war, warmly contending that America would prevail. From the peace of 1763, he lived a retired life, until the 4th of August, 1792, when he died, as it was stated in the papers of that day, by a fit of the gout in the stomach. An American royalist, who was in England, and resided within a few doors of his dwelling, informed me that he fell by his own hand, a prey to disappointment and neglect. There never arose a man in Great Britain, who for a time held so many important offices, and on whom so much reliance was placed, of whom the world knew so little. A mystery hung about him from the cradle to the grave, and that, too, in a country where there are but few secrets of any domestic or political nature.

The American army engaged in this enterprise, contained many fine officers. Schuyler was a man of great good sense and experi-

The capture of an entire army was justly viewed as an event that must essentially affect the contest between Great Britain and America; and while it excited the highest joy among the Americans, it could not but have a most auspicious influence on their affairs in the cabinet and in the field. The thanks ence, having been an officer in the war of 1755 to 1763. He preferred to assist in saving his country, rather than to put it in jeopardy by resentment at losing the honour of commanding the army in the campaign of 1777, after he had prepared the forces for it. General Morgan, the bold and intrepid Virginian, was there, and most efficient in the discharge of his duties, as he was throughout the whole war. Arnold was also one of the most intrepid soldiers in the campaign. Lincoln was there also; he was one of the most bold and discreet of the revolutionary generals. Brooks, whose share in this event every historian of the war has celebrated, and with whose merits the present generation have been made acquainted, lived to give us many minute circumstances of the taking of Burgoyne, which otherwise would have been lost; Dearborn and Hull had their share in the honours of that day; and many more who deserve the meed of honour from the future historians, who may arise to give to distant ages the deeds of the men who fought and bled to achieve the liberties we now enjoy.—American Editor.

* The following is from a tour of General Hoyt, of Massachusetts, made to the battle ground forty-eight years after the surrender of Burgoyne. It was given to the American editor in 1825. It is the best description of the affair extant, in a military point of view.

From Troy we proceeded up the Hudson, in an extra stage, through Waterford, Mechanicville, and Stillwater village, to Ketchum's tavern, at Bemis' Heights, the position taken up by General Gates' army, September 12th, 1777, where we found good accommodations. At this place there are now several houses, and among others, the handsome residence of Dr. Willard, of Albany, standing near the site of Bemis' house, which gave name to Gates' camp.

Resolving to give the battle grounds a thorough reconnaissance, in the morning we set out on foot, and traversed the fields in various directions. My companion, one of the heroes of the battle of the 7th of October, appeared alive to the many associations connected with that important event. We first traced the lines of Gates' camp, which in some places still furrow the ground, particularly on the extreme left, where the curtains and bastions are distinctly to be seen. The old red house, not far from the centre of the camp, now fast going to decay, where Gates had his headquarters, was not passed without notice. This my companion well recollected, and he pointed to the spot where he had been planted as a sentinel. A small distance east of the house, at the time of the battles, stood a barn, in which many of the wounded were deposited; but the foundation only remains to mark the spot. The fields adjacent, once the scene of bustle and military preparation, now present a calm and solitary aspect; and here the bones of many a patriot, who died of wounds received in the two actions of the 19th of September and 7th of October, rest in obscurity. My companion pointed out the spot where twenty-eight of these heroes were interred in one grave; and near this spot, the veteran Colonel Breyman and Sir Francis Clark, Burgoyne's aid-de-camp, mortally wounded and taken prisoners in the second action, mixed their remains with their brave conquerors.

After noticing the ground occupied by the different regiments and brigades, and listening to the many anecdotes of my companion, we continued our route across Nelson's farm, on an eminence, in advance of Gates' camp, the frequent post of Morgan's riflemen, and passing a ravine and an open field beyond, we reached a wood, where his regiment was drawn up, on the right of Gates' line, where they hove up a slight work of logs, in the battle of the 7th of October. From this point, crossing other fields, westerly, and a bridge over a rill, we rose to higher ground, Burgoyne's point of appui in the same battle; and a little further north, formed en potence, and crowning a height, stood Major Ackland's British grenadiers, the most sanguinary point of the contest.

The British line extended from this point, westerly, about a third of congress were voted to General Gates and his army; and a medal of gold, in commemoration of this splendid achievement, was ordered to be struck, to be presented to him by the president, in the name of the United States.*

Gen. Burgoyne's surrender, is certainly, in a con-of a mile, crossing two open fields and an intervening copse of wood, to some high grounds within view; the right occupied by Brigadier-General Fraser's elite, consisting of the twenty-fourth regiment and Lord Balcarras' light-infantry; the centre and left of the British and German troops of the line, under Generals Phillips and Reidesel. Eight pieces of cannon, two of which were twelve pounders, were posted along the line, besides two howitzers, in front of Fraser's elite. On the south, in front of the line, the ground falls off to a rill, then covered with brush, from which the American columns debouched, as they advanced to the attack, under a heavy fire from the British artillery.

The battle at this place commenced on the British left, by General Poor's brigade, and soon after on the right, by Colonel Morgan's and Major Dearborn's corps, and the whole line was soon engaged. Morgan and Dearborn having turned and broken the right flank of Balcarras' infantry, and Ackland's grenadiers on the left, being hard pressed by Poor, Burgoyne despatched orders for Fraser's elite to retire from the right, and form a second line to support the left. In executing this order, Fraser having arrived in the rear of the left, followed by Morgan, received a mortal wound, and was carried off the field.

Mr. Walker, who resides a little distance in the rear of the ground occupied by the British line, pointed out to us the site of two huts which stood near the centre of the left, and here my companion recollected to have seen the ground covered with dead the morning after the action. Near this spot, Major Williams, of the artillery, and Captain Money, D. Q. M. General, and several other officers, were captured by the Americans, and eight pieces of cannon were taken.

The ground occupied by the left of the British line, may be known by a solitary poplar tree, standing on the side of the road, marked with the initials of some person's name, near which the ground falls off to the east.

After viewing this sanguinary spot, and analyzing the movements of the different corps, we passed along the road, northerly, to the point where General Fraser received his wound. Walker's blacksmith's shop is about twenty rods north of the place, and not far from the same, Sir Francis Clark, Burgoyne's aid-de-camp, also received his wound, as he was conveying orders from Burgoyne to Phillips and Reidesel.

Proceeding northerly, forty or fifty rods, we arrived at the house of the younger Walker, situated on an eminence, which, with several others, extending northerly, were occupied by Fraser's elite during most of the battle of the 19th of September.

Here General Larned's brigade and Marshall's regiment were engaged towards the close of the battle of that day, and near Walker's barn, situated a little east of his house, stood the British grenadiers opposed to Marshall's regiment, as darkness commenced. Near the barn, Walker had just discovered and disinterred the skeleton of a man killed in the action, by a ball which perforated the back of the skull, and a circular piece, cut out by the ball, was found, exactly fitting the perforation. The bones indicated a man of a large size, from which, and knowing the ground to have been the position of the British grenadiers in the first action, we concluded he must have been one of that corps. Further to the right, and westward of Walker's house, we noticed the spot where the late Governor Brooks, of Massachusetts, then lieutenant-colonel of Jackson's regiment, sustained his nocturnal attack from Breyman's German grenadiers. [See Gordon, vol. 2, letter 8th.]

Continuing our route northerly, along Fraser's heights, we turned to the right, across lower ground, and rose a gentle hill, covered with trees of a recent growth, the fortified position of Colonel Breyman, in the action of the 7th of October. This fortification was a temporary work of logs and rails, and has disappeared. Every inch of this ground presents interesting associations, and with eager siderable degree, to be attributed to the want of co-operation both on the part of General Carleton, in Canada, and of Sir H. Clinton, at New York. The steps we traversed the hill to find some relic or trace of the gallantry of the men who fought on this spot; but all marks are obliterated. With deep sensations we now surveyed the open field, over which Lieutenant-Colonel Brooks led on Jackson's regiment, under a heavy fire, in his gallant charge on these works, in the battle of the 7th of October, and penetrated them a few moments before General Arnold galloped in through a sally port, and received his wound. Other regiments then advancing, the post was carried at every point, and about two hundred of the enemy made prisoners, while the remainder escaped into the woods in the rear, leaving two pieces of cannon in the hands of the Americans.

Passing over the hill, we descended to a beautiful opening on the east side, the camp of Breyman's German brigade; back of which is a ravine and rill, where Breyman was found by the victors, mortally wounded, taken up and sent to Gates' camp, where he died. This post formed the right flank of the British fortified camp, and its capture exposed other points to an attack in the rear. Sensible of its importance, Burgoyne, on first hearing that it was carried, gave orders for its recovery; but though they were positive, they were not obeyed, and Larned's brigade held the post unmolested through the night.

General Wilkinson states, in his memoirs, that Arnold, during the attack on Breyman's post, turned its right, at the head of a few riflemen, and threw himself into the rear, where his leg was broken, and his horse killed under him. The general was not an eye witness to the event, and probably, through misinformation, has given it erroneously. That Arnold was wounded within the works, after passing the sally port, has been repeatedly asserted by Governor Brooks, as well as others, who saw the whole.

Quitting this interesting spot, we passed on, southerly, over the ground where stood the two block houses so gallantly stormed by detachments from Brooks' regiment, in the same action, and the commanders, Lieutenants Wiley and Goodrich, and many of their men, killed; and turning easterly, through a copse of wood, reached a road in the rear of Freeman's field. Along this road, still flanked by woods, Burgoyne formed the 9th, 21st, 62d, and 20th regiments, (this was the order from right to left,) and Captain Jones' brigade of grenadiers, previous to the sanguinary contest on the 19th of September, while Major Forbes, with the British van, pressed into the field, was attacked by Morgan, near Freeman's hut, and driven back to the British line in the woods, and Morgan, in turn, broken and forced back into the woods south of the field.

Continuing southerly in the road, and crossing a small ravine, we entered Freeman's bloody field, and a few rods south, the house of Mr. Leggett, who now resides on the farm embracing the field of battle. At the time of the battle, the field was an oblong, of from seventy to eighty rods in length, east and west, by about thirty in breadth, inclosed by a worm fence, and surrounded by woods. Near the centre is an elevation, extending from Leggett's house, nearly at right angles, across the field, upon which a hut and small barn were situated, and near the latter, the elevation terminated, at a narrow ravine, extending parallel to the field. South of this ravine are other elevations, sloping off gently to level ground, south, the whole then covered with woods, in which the Americans were drawn up in the first part of the battle of the 19th of September.

No part of the ground we had traversed, presents more interesting associations than this field. Here British valour and veteran skill, were successfully opposed by native bravery and patriotic ardour; and here it was, that the proud Briton was compelled to acknowledge the fallacy of his boasted declaration, "that the Americans would fight only under cover of woods and intrenchments, and that they were incapable of sustaining a fair and equal conflict in the open field."

While at Leggett's, we were presented with balls, and several fractured implements of muskets, found on the field, among which was part of a brass guard, numbered XX, supposed to belong to that regiment.

We were now upon the ground occupied by the 62d British regiment, indeed, performed a service, which, if effected a little earlier, might possibly have relieved Burgoyne. With nearly three thousand men, convoyed by some giment, commanded by Colonel Anstruther, during most of the battle of the 19th, flanked on the right by the 21st, and on the left by the 20th regiments, the whole under Brigadier-General Hamilton; the 9th of the same brigade being drawn off, and posted in the rear of the field, as a corps de reserve; and here this brigade, with the artillery under Captain Jones, bore the brunt of the battle for about four hours, hand to hand, with the Americans, and human life was profusely expended.

A few rods southerly of Leggett's barn, we noticed the ground where Morgan and Dearborn attacked the British when under Major Forbes; and here the regiments of Silley and Scammel, of Poor's brigade, a battalion under Major Hull, Morgan's and Dearborn's corps, renewed the battle on Hamilton's brigade, which was vigorously maintained on both sides, each alternately giving and gaining the ground; and here, about three o'clock in the afternoon, the remainder of Poor's brigade, with some other regiments, came up on the left, and pressed into action, and the fire was continued with alternate advantage on both sides, until the smoke and night-fall rendered objects undiscernible, when the action terminated precisely on the ground where it commenced.

Among the officers who fell at this place, on the part of the Americans, were Lieutenant-Colonel Colburn, of Silley's, and Lieutenant-Colonel Adams, of Hale's New Hampshire regiments. The 62d British regiment was literally cut to pieces; after the action, it did not exceed sixty men, and five or six officers, fit for duty. Colonel Anstruther, and his major, Harnage, were wounded. During the contest, the field presented a scene of horror appalling even to veteran troops; the British officers were constantly falling under the fatal fire, or carried off the field wounded; the ranks thinned, and the artillery men nearly annihilated. Out of forty-eight men stationed at the guns under Captain Jones, who fell, thirty-six were killed or badly wounded; and among the officers, only one lieutenant escaped, and he with a shot through his hat.

Passing the small ravine south of Leggett's barn, we rose an elevation, the post with another on a knoll a little further west, strongly fortified, and the woods cleared off by Burgoyne after the battle of the 19th. These elevations were occupied by Lord Balcarras' light-infantry, after their retreat from the first position, south of the elder Walker's, in the battle of the 7th of October; and here, towards the close of the day, Arnold, with Poor's and Patterson's brigades, made his desperate attack, and was repulsed, and he, with his horse, entangled in the surrounding abattis, from which, with the utmost difficulty, he extricated himself, while under a heavy fire of grape and cannister from the British batteries. "A more determined perseverance," says the British commander, "than the Americans showed in this attack upon the lines, though they were finally repulsed by the corps under Lord Balcarras, I believe is not in any officer's experience." Had the assailants been less embarrassed with the abattis, probably they would have covered the works, though manned with Burgoyne's best troops.

From this elevation, we had a fair view of the greatest part of the battle grounds, and the line of Burgoyne's camp taken up subsequently to the battle of the 19th, and in which the principal part of the army continued until that of the 7th of October. North and east of Leggett's house, was the camp of Fraser's elite, flanked on the left by Hamilton's brigade, and further on the left, extending to the river hills, that of the German troops, under Reidesel, excepting Breyman's command, which was to the right of Fraser, formed en potence to the main line; the whole covered by temporary works, which are now nearly obliterated. In the meadow in the rear of the left of Reidesel's German corps, was the British hospital camp, protected by several batteries, and three redoubts on the projecting points of as many hills, overlooking the meadow.

The grounds adjacent, at the time of the battles, were covered with woods, but now present, in some parts, fields under cultivation. North of Freeman's field, the woods are still standing, exhibiting the exact features of 1777, and the road through them, where Burgoyne first formed the four regiments of Hamilton's brigade, is still distinctly seen.

ships of war under Commodore Hotham, he conducted an expedition up Hudson's River, in October, against the forts Montgomery and Clinton. When arrived

In passing over these sanguinary fields, my companion appeared to be highly excited by the many recollections which rushed upon his mind, and the circumstance of our visit happening on the 48th anniversary of the battle of the 7th of October, presented the various scenes in a most striking point of view. Nor did my own feelings remain "indifferent and unmoved."

To walk with callous indifference over ground once the scene of blood and carnage, of occasional fear and triumph, and these heightened by the recollection, that many of our acquaintance shared in them, may comport with minds steeled to sensibility; but those of a different stamp, in which are included a majority of the reflecting part of mankind, will be differently affected. Nor are lessons drawn from such scenes destitute of utility. They fix the mind on the characters of the heroes who perished in the cause of our country; stimulate to noble exploits, and fill the mind with just reflections on the value of our dear bought liberties. With a portion of these feelings, we returned to Ketchum's tavern, passing again over part of Gates' camp.

On our route to our quarters, we fell in with a Quaker gentleman who resides in the vicinity, with whom we had some conversation on the scenes that had been exhibited in these fields; and notwithstanding his aversion to military exploits, he appeared to be interested, on hearing that my companion was one of the men who have fought for his country. And in traversing over the battle grounds, we were welcomed to the hospitable mansions of several of these people, who evinced an interest in our researches, and gave us their aid in pointing out the most remarkable places on the battle fields. An elderly lady remarked, that she resided on a farm in the vicinity of Saratoga Lake, at the time of the battle, and heard the terrible roar of the dreadful cannon; and that British reconnoitering parties frequently visited her house, from whom she received very civil treatment, and gave them, in return, such refreshments as her mansion furnished.

Before we left Ketchum's, we reconnoitered the banks of the Hudson, and my companion pointed out the spot where Gates threw over a bridge to connect with the left bank, and the ground where he recollected to have seen a tribe of American Indians encamped.

The freight boats constantly passing along the canal, within a few yards of our traverse, afforded us a passage about 2 1-2 miles, up to Smith's tavern, the cottage in which the unfortunate General Fraser died of his wounds, the morning after the battle of the 7th of October, where we arrived at dark, after making half a dozen very submissive bows to the bridges stretching across the canal; an embarrassment we had not anticipated, and which requires some caution to avoid a broken head. On this route, we passed the left flank of the British camp, on the west of the eminence, and the ravine from which the British sharp shooters wounded General Lincoln, the day succeeding the last battle on the heights.

Smith's house, which stood at the foot of the hill, at the period of the battles, and has been drawn forward to the road on the bank of the river, is situated in a handsome meadow, bordering on the Hudson, the same embraced by Burgoyne's hospital camp, and taken up by his whole army, in the night succeeding the second battle. In the morning we traversed over the ground, noticing the places most remarkable for interesting events, and among others, the elevated hill on which General Fraser was buried, under the fire of the American artillery posted in a meadow below, so elegantly described by Burgoyne, in his account of his expedition. A few yards below the great ravine, so called by the British officers, we noticed the point where Burgoyne's bridge of boats was thrown across the Hudson, at the head of which, on the left bank, are the remains of his tele de pont. The bed of the great ravine, through which a road formerly led from the hospital camp to that on the height, is now flowed by the water of the canal. South of the ravine are the heights on which Balcarras' light-infantry was posted, during the 8th of October; and here several skirmishes took place between the British and American sharp shooters, in one of which General Lincoln was wounded, as has been noted. Of the three within a mile of the place of destination, the troops separated into two columns; the one, consisting of nine hundred men, under Lieutenant Campbell, was redoubts on the hills adjoining the meadow, little or no remains are to be seen, excepting that in the centre, where Fraser was buried, which is still distinct. The remains of another work may be traced in the meadow, a short distance south of Smith's, near which was posted the park of artillery. In the bar room of Smith's tavern, General Fraser breathed his last; and there, says Madam Reidesel, who quartered at the same place, "I often heard him exclaim with a sigh, 'Oh, fatal ambition! Poor General Burgoyne O, my poor wife!'"

Several late tourists, through a very natural mistake, have called Smith's house, Sword's house; the latter, it appears by Burgoyne's plans, was situated about a mile above, at his camp, taken up on the 17th of September; the house is now demolished.

In the early part of the day, we left the hospital camp, and in a stage proceeded up the river six miles, to Schuylerville, at Fish Creek, in Saratoga, the scene of Burgoyne's last struggles, passing, on the route, the British camp at Sword's house, and the elevated ground on which the British army halted on its retreat, on the morning of the 9th of October, at what was then called Davocote, or Van Vechtin's Creek. This spot is rendered memorable from the interesting relation Burgoyne has given of Lady Harriet Ackland, who here embarked in a boat, and descended to Gates' camp, attended by Mr. Brudenel, chaplain of the artillery. A short distance south of the site of the old church, at Schuylerville, we noticed the place where the right of Gates' camp rested, on the 10th of October.

The retreat of the British army, from the hospital camp, to Fish Creek, was attended with many embarrassments. It commenced about nine o'clock in the evening, and as it was apprehended that the Americans would pass upon the rear, a strong body of the best troops, under General Phillips, was ordered to cover the march; General Reidesel commanded the van. From the nature of the country, and the darkness of the night, the movement was difficult as well as critical; the artillery and such baggage as could not be embarked in boats, were to be dragged along a narrow road, composed of argillaceous soil, over which the stoutest horses could with difficulty draw an ordinary load; and with the emaciated and jaded animals of the army, an empty carriage was a burden almost beyond their power. Besides, the army was liable to an attack at every step, from the woods on the left; nor were the boats less exposed in stemming the river, from the attacks of the militia posted along the left bank, who were secure during the darkness, from annoyance from the artillery. To add to these difficulties, a heavy rain commenced, which converted the road into perfect quagmire, and rendered the march of the baggage and artillery next to impossible, and their total loss was apprehended. General Phillips was ordered to bend his whole attention to the covering of the army, by taking a position that would enable it to form in order of battle, without regarding the column of baggage, and to rely exclusively on the bayonet. Under such embarrassments, the loss of several provision boats, and baggage wagons, is not surprising.

After a short respite at the stage house in Schuylerville, we prepared for a reconnoissance of Burgoyne's camp, which extended along the heights, from Lemson's, now Bushett's house, the same occupied by Madam Reidesel, (see her narrative,) nearly opposite to the mouth of the Butterhill, to an eminence about three fourths of a mile, southwest of our tavern, and here was Burgoyne's head quarters; the strongest point of his position. On an elevation in the meadow, northeast of the village, the park of artillery was posted, under the cover of some temporary works. Excepting two or three open fields, the position of the army was principally covered with woods; but the meadow was open, cultivated ground. At the mouth of Fish Creek, on the north side, are the ruins of Fort Hardy, built in the French war, by many erroneously supposed to be the work of Burgoyne, and through the meadow, now passes the northern canal, presenting an extensive triangular basin on the north of Fish Creek; and over this is an aqueduct. South of the creek is Schuyler's house, standing nearly on the site of General Schuyler's, burnt by Burgoyne. The old church, which stood on destined for the attack on Fort Montgomery; the other, under the immediate command of Sir Henry Clinton, was to storm the stronger post of Fort Clinthe height, southwest of this house, in 1777, is demolished, and a handsome new one is now pleasantly situated in a recess of a grove, on the height west of the village.

Arriving at the works on the elevation, at the extreme right of Burgoyne's camp, the lines, encompassing several acres, were easily traced, presenting salient and recruiting angles, and here were posted the 9th, 21st, and 24th regiments, the British grenadiers, Balcarras' light-infantry, Captain Fraser's rangers, and the American volunteers. The left of the camp, on a ridge, north of the village, nearly parallel to the river, was occupied by Reidesel's Germans; and the central ground, by the 20th, 47th, and 62d British regiments, the German grenadiers, and Barnes' corps, partially covered by intrenchments. Farther west, in the margin of the woods, were the Yagers and Canadians. Their out-posts extended along the north side of Fish Creek, from its mouth to the right of the camp. The position here described is that held at the time of the convention. The right of Gates' camp, was about a mile south of Fish Creek, and the line extended into the woods over elevated ground, opposite to Burgoyne's right, and the advanced posts were near the creek opposite to those of the British.

In passing over the right of the British camp, my companion found himself on interesting ground, and with hasty steps, we proceeded to the spot where his regiment, commanded by Colonel Woodbridge, of Massachusetts, was drawn up in the woods, within a few yards of the British intrenchment, prepared for an assault on the morning of the 11th October, 1777. To comprehend this movement, it is necessary to recur to details. On the night of the 10th, Gates was led to believe that Burgoyne, leaving his fires burning under the care of a few pickets, had left his camp and retreated up the Hudson, on which he gave orders for a forward movement, to seize the abandoned camp. At day break the next morning, being very foggy, Patterson's and Larned's brigades, with Morgan's corps and Woodbridge's regiment, were put in motion towards the British right; and Nivon's and Glover's brigades; at the same time, moved up the meadow, and the former crossed Fish Creek, and surprised a British picket, in old fort Hardy. The fog at this time dispersing, the British army was found in their position, ready for an attack, and the park of artillery immediately opened a fire upon the American column, threw it into some disorder, and compelled it to reoccupy the creek; the two brigades then returned to camp. Finding that Gates had ordered the movement under a misapprehension of the position of the British army, Adjutant-General Wilkinson, who had attended the movement of Nixon and Glover, immediately put spurs to his horse, pushed up the creek, and crossing over at a mill, about three quarters of a mile above Schuyler's, found Morgan's, Patterson's, and Larned's brigades, with Woodbridge's regiment, on the right, advancing through the woods, and approximating the British lines. In front for about twenty yards, the trees had been felled, and sharpened to a strong abattis, and Woodbridge's regiment had laid down their packs and approached within ten yards of the opening; the British lying close under the intrenchment, ready to open their fire, as soon as their assailants were uncovered by the woods. At this moment Wilkinson rode up, and directed the Colonel to fall back, on which the regiment came about, and retired about thirty yards to a depression in the ground, where the men were covered from the direct fire of the enemy. With a temerity truly characteristic of young troops, individuals then advanced, and posting themselves behind trees, opened a scattering fire upon the enemy, who were now indistinctly seen through the fog, and received theirs in return. My companion pointed me to a large pine, not exceeding thirty yards from the British works, behind which he, with several others, covered themselves, while eagerly popping at the enemy's heads, seen over the parapet; while here he barely escaped a shot, aimed at an uncovered part of his body; and having expended several cartridges, the party fell back to the regiment, and soon after the whole retired to Fish Creek, opposite to the mills, where they were ordered to throw up defensive lines. In the mean time, Patterson's and Larned's brigades, with Morgan's corps on the left, approached ton. The garrison, when summoned, having refused to surrender, the assault was made on both forts at the same instant. These fortresses, which were se-

the British lines, and were on the point of opening their fire, when Wilkinson rode up and informed Larned, who commanded in the absence of Patterson, of the result of the movement in the meadow, and advised an immediate retreat, on which the line came about and retired; but before they were masked by the woods, the enemy opened a fire of artillery and musketry, and several were killed. The two brigades continued their retreat to an open field, where they hove up lines, and remained until Burgoyne surrendered; Morgan at the same time took a position in the woods, in the rear of the British right.

As a striking illustration of the indifference with which soldiers regard danger, and soon become callous to the tender feelings, common to a life of domestic tranquillity, I cannot omit to notice a fact given by my companion. The men composing the regiment, had been in service but a few months, but in general they had been habituated to hardships, and were strangers to the delicacies of affluent life. When the regiment had retired the short distance of sixty yards from the British intrenchments, to lower ground, where the men were covered from the fire of the enemy, they sat down at their ease, and entered into familiar conversation; in one instance, he noticed a soldier leisurely combing the head of his messmate, while the bullets of the enemy were whistling over their heads, and cutting the limbs of the trees.

Passing from the British right, to the mill on Fish Creek, my companion noticed the spot where one of their advanced sentinels shot a woman, who had left the British camp to procure water from a brook, winding through a little ravine, on the bank of which the sentinel was posted. She had been challenged but refused to comply with the strict orders of the sentinel, on which he fired, and gave her a fatal shot.

Reaching the creek, we passed it on floating timber, resting against the mill dam, and my companion remembered that his regiment passed the mill pond in the same manner, and at the same place, as they advanced to attack the British lines, as has been related; and continuing our route along a road on the right bank of the creek, we came to the salient point of a hill near Schuyler's house, where a picket, of which he was one, was attacked by a party of the British, in the night of the 10th of October; but after a little random firing, and a few discharges of a field piece, which advanced to the spot, the enemy fell back.

Proceeding thence to the meadow, near fort Hardy, and looking over the ground where Burgoyne piled his arms on the 17th of October, we returned to our quarters, where we were shown several cannon balls, taken from the ground, in excavating the canal.

Bushett's house, near the left of the German camp, in which Madam Reidesel had her quarters while the British army lay at this place, has been repaired by its present owner; and he informed me that the marks of the cannon balls, mentioned in the narrative of that lady, were to be seen when first occupied by him. The American battery from which the house was cannonaded, was planted on the opposite bank of the Hudson, above the mouth of the Butterhill. It is justly due to the officer who directed the fire, the Honourable Major-General Ebenezer Mattoon, and since Adjutant-General of the militia of Massachusetts, then a lieutenant in the artillery, to state, that the unfortunate condition of the people in the house was unknown; and that it was supposed to be the quarters of some of the enemy's general officers.

The country embracing the operation of the armies under Generals Gates and Burgoyne, is daily becoming more interesting to travellers, and many resort there for the gratification of a laudable curiosity. As time elapses, it will be sought with more avidity, and future generations may in vain seek for the scenes of these important events, unless they are marked by some durable memorial. As a taste for monuments is now increasing in our country, it is to be hoped that the events connected with the capture of the British army, the pivot on which our revolutionary struggle turned, will not be neglected.

The elevation on the Freeman farm, presents a favourable site for a monument, on which should be engraven the names of the principarated from each other by a creek only, were commanded by Governor Clinton, a brave and intelligent officer, who made a gallant resistance from four in the afternoon, when the attack began, until dark; but, the post having been designed principally to prevent the passing of ships, the works on the land side were incomplete and untenable, and the assailants entered them with fixed bayonets. Most of the garrison, however, effected their escape, under cover of the thick smoke and darkness.

Having noticed the most important features of the military operations of the year 1777, it will be proper, before entering on those of the following years, to afford the reader some information on two very important points—the progress made by the Americans in their foreign relations, and the steps which had been taken to consolidate the general government. In both cases it will be necessary, in order to give a clear and comprehensive view of the subject, slightly to deviate from strict chronological order.

The contest between Great Britain and her colonies had not long commenced, before congress directed their attention to the possibility of attaining foreign assistance. Towards the close of the year 1775, a committee was appointed to hold secret correspondence with the friends of America, both in Europe and other parts of the world.* Early in the year 1776, the committee, seeing little prospect of an accommodation, and well aware that France would be disposed to make great sacrifices to reduce the power of Great Britain by the separation of her North American colonies, sent Silas Deane, as a commercial and political agent, to the French court.† Mr. Deane arrived in Paris about the 1st of July, and was indefatigable in pursuing the objects of his mission; and through Dr. Dubourg, a friend to America, was in a few days introduced to Vergennes. His arrival at Paris was immediately known in London, and Lord Stormont was sent express to Paris to watch his movements. Mr. Deane stated to the French minister the objects of his mission, agreeably to his instruction, and in his first conference he touched upon the subject of forming treaties with the Americans in case of their declaring themselves independent. The American agent was favourably received by the French minister, and was asked many questions in relation to American affairs. Vergennes informed Mr. Deane, that though the French court estimated highly the importance of American commerce, yet, considering the good understanding between the courts of Versailles and London, they could not openly encourage the shipping of warlike stores; but no obstructions of any kind, he said, would be given. On the subject of independence, he observed, that was an event in the womb of time, and it would be highly improper for him to say any thing on that point until it had actually taken place. This first conference with the French minister ended much to the satisfaction of the American agent.

As soon as the question of independence was decided in the affirmative, congress took the subject of foreign affairs into their own hands; and, on the 11th of June, appointed a committee to prepare a plan of treaties with foreign powers.‡ In the month of September, congress appointed Dr. Franklin, Mr. Deane, and Mr. Jefferson, commissioners to proceed to France.§ Dr. Franklin and Mr. Lee arrived at Paris in December, and the objects of their mission were soon made known to the French court. The court was not yet prepared to acknowledge the independence of the United States, to form treaties with them, or openly to espouse the cause of the Americans; to prove, however, his good wishes towards the United States, the king ordered two millions of livres to be paid to them by quarterly payments, which should be augmented as the state of his finances would permit. The most profound secrecy, in relation to this donation, was enjoined. The course of policy France intended to pursue, in the contest between Great Britain and her colonies, was now obvious; and with her views of the subject, was perhaps, as it regarded herself at least, a very natural as well as seemed to indicate, it would be most proper to obtain and cultivate her friendship. That in such case, the commercial advantages formerly enjoyed by Great Britain, would be transferred to France. That the Americans were in want of clothing and arms for twenty-five thousand men, with a suitable quantity of ammunition, and a hundred field pieces. Mr. Deane was also directed to sound the French minister with regard to forming an alliance with the colonies, in case they should be forced to declare themselves independent.”—Pitkin, vol. i. p. 387. The instructions will be found at length in the Diplomatic Correspondence of the American Revolution, edited by S. Sparks, vol. i. p. 5—9.

* The committee consisted of Mr. Harrison, Dr. Franklin, Mr. Johnson, Mr. Dickinson, and Mr. Jay.

† “He was to appear in the character of a merchant, and was directed, among other things, immediately after his arrival at Paris, to solicit an interview with the Count De Vergennes, the French minister, and to inform him, that congress, being unable to obtain for America the quantity of arms and ammunition necessary for its defence, had despatched him to apply to some of the European powers for a supply. That he was instructed to make his first application to France, from an opinion that, in case of a total separation of America from Great Britain, which every circumstance seemed to indicate, it would be most proper to obtain and cultivate her friendship. That in such case, the commercial advantages formerly enjoyed by Great Britain, would be transferred to France. That the Americans were in want of clothing and arms for twenty-five thousand men, with a suitable quantity of ammunition, and a hundred field pieces. Mr. Deane was also directed to sound the French minister with regard to forming an alliance with the colonies, in case they should be forced to declare themselves independent.”—Pitkin, vol. i. p. 387. The instructions will be found at length in the Diplomatic Correspondence of the American Revolution, edited by S. Sparks, vol. i. p. 5—9.

wise course, as she evidently entertained serious doubts whether the States would be able to form a lasting union among themselves, or to persevere in maintaining their independence. Although the court were thus undecided, the cause of the United States was extremely popular in France, both among the people and the army, and many French officers sought an opportunity of engaging in their service. Among these, the young Marquis de la Fayette was most conspicuous for his rank, and most distinguished for his ardour and enthusiasm. At an early period he communicated to the American agents his wish to join the republican armies. At first they encouraged his zeal, but learning the disasters which preceded the victory at Trenton, they, with honourable frankness, communicated the information to him, and added, that they were so destitute of funds, that they could not even provide for his passage across the ocean. "If your country," replied the gallant youth, "is indeed reduced to this extremity, it is at this moment that my departure to join her armies will render her the most essential service." He immediately hired a vessel to convey him to America, where he arrived in the spring of 1777. He was received with cordial affection by the people, became the bosom friend of Washington, solicited permission to serve without pay, and was appointed major-general in the army.

The disastrous state of American affairs at the close of the year 1776, induced congress to attend more seriously to the subject of securing foreign aid; and a new committee was appointed. Some of the members of this committee were disposed to make great sacrifices to obtain the aid of France, and were almost prepared to offer her the same monopoly of American commerce as had been enjoyed by Great Britain.* On the 30th of December, congress came to the resolution of sending commissioners to the courts of Vienna, Madrid, and Berlin, and to the grand duke of Tuscany.† These commissioners were instructed to assure the courts to which they were sent, that the Americans were determined to maintain their independence, notwithstanding the suggestions of the British to the contrary.

The success of the arms of the United States by the capture of the army of General Burgoyne, gave a new aspect to their affairs in France, and indeed throughout Europe. The American commissioners at Paris now stood on commanding ground. The French court, aware of the views of the British ministry in relation to the colonies, no longer hesitated about accepting the propositions of the American envoys. M. Gerard informed the American commissioners, on the 16th of December, "that after a long and mature deliberation upon their propositions, his majesty had determined to recognise the independence of, and to enter into a treaty of commerce and alliance with, the United States of America; and that he would not only acknowledge their independence, but actually support it with all the means in his power; that perhaps he was about to engage himself in an expensive war upon this account, but that he did not expect to be reimbursed by them; in fine, the Americans were not to think that he had entered into this resolution solely with a view of serving them, since, independently of his real attachment to them and their cause, it was evidently the interest of France to diminish the power of England, by severing her colonies from her."‡ On the 6th of February, 1778, a treaty of commerce was signed by Franklin, Deane, and Lee, on the part of the United States, and by M. Gerard on the part of France, together with a treaty of defensive alliance, in case war should be the consequence of this commercial connexion. The essential and direct end of this alliance was, "to maintain the liberty, sovereignty, and independence, absolute and unlimited, of the United States, as well in matters of government as of commerce."

Before leaving this subject, it is necessary to state, that as, previous to the recognition of independence by the court of France, it was imperative that the intercourse with the American agents should be conducted indirectly and with the utmost secrecy, the French government rendered their secret assistance

* "To induce France to embark in the war, the American envoys were authorized to stipulate, that all the trade between the United States and the West India islands, should be carried on either in French or American vessels; and were specially instructed to assure the French king, that if, by their joint efforts, the British should be excluded from any share in the cod-fishery of America, by the reduction of the islands of Newfoundland and Cape Breton, and ships of war should be furnished, at the expense of the United States, to reduce Nova Scotia, that the fishery should be enjoyed equally between them, to the exclusion of all other nations; and that one half of Newfoundland should belong to France, and the other half, with Cape Breton and Nova Scotia, to the United States. Should these proposals be insufficient to induce France to join in the war, and the commissioners were convinced that the open co-operation of France could not otherwise be obtained, they were directed to assure his most Christian Majesty, that such of the West India islands as might, in the course of the war, be reduced, should be yielded to him in absolute property."—Pitkin, vol. i. p. 392.

† William Lee was appointed commissioner to the courts of Vienna and Berlin, Ralph Izard to the Duke of Tuscany, and Dr. Franklin to Spain. Arthur Lee was afterwards appointed, in the room of Dr. Franklin, to the Spanish court. While Mr. Lee was at Berlin, his papers were stolen from his lodgings in a most extraordinary manner, and the British envoy at the Prussian court was implicated in this transaction.

through the agency of M. Beaumarchais, who appears to have been more desirous of serving himself than the Americans. The mode in which he converted the gratuitous aid of the French court into articles of charge in his accounts with the congress, and especially his retaining in his hands a million of livres out of the subsidy granted by the French king, are circumstances too extraordinary to be entirely passed over, but our limits compel us to refer the reader for the details to that very able work, Pitkin's Civil and Political History,* and to the volumes of Diplomatic Correspondence already alluded to.

During the first stages of the revolution, the universal enthusiasm of the people, directed to one common object, in some measure supplied the place of a general legislative and executive power. The congress had hitherto possessed no powers but such as were conferred by the instructions given by the state legislatures to their respective delegates; but on the 11th of June, 1776, the day following that in which the resolution in favour of independence had been adopted, congress determined to appoint a committee to prepare and digest the form of a confederation. This committee, on the 12th of July following, reported a plan of confederacy, consisting of twenty articles, and on the 22d of the same month it was discussed in committee of the whole house, and was under consideration until the 20th of August, when an amended draft was reported. The difficulty in agreeing upon the details of the system, as well as the gloomy aspect of American affairs at this period, prevented congress from resuming this subject until April, 1777, when they resolved that two days in each week should be employed upon it, "until it shall be wholly discussed." The amended draft was considered and debated accordingly until the 26th of June, when it was again postponed to the 2d of October, and was not finally adopted by congress until the 15th of November. The outlines of the system were, that the thirteen states formed a confederacy, under the style and name of "the United States of America;" by which they entered "into a firm league of friendship with each other, for their defence, the security of their liberties, and their mutual and general welfare, binding themselves to assist each other against all force offered to or attacks made upon them, or any of them, on account of religion, sovereignty, trade, or any other pretence whatever."† This plan of union was to be proposed to the legislatures of all the states, and, if approved, they were advised to authorize their delegates in congress to ratify the same; this being done, it was to be conclusive.‡

† The following is a summary of the points embraced in the articles of confederation:—Each state to retain its sovereignty and independence, and every power, jurisdiction, and right, which is not expressly delegated by this confederation to the United States in congress assembled. The states enter into a firm league of friendship with each other for their common defence, the security of their liberties, and their mutual and general welfare; binding themselves to assist each other against all force offered to or attacks made upon them or any of them on account of religion, sovereignty, trade, or any other pretence whatever. The free inhabitants of the different states in this union to be entitled to all privileges and immunities of free citizens in the several states; and the people of each state to have free ingress and regress to and from any other state, and to enjoy therein all the privileges of trade and commerce, subject to the same duties, impositions, and restrictions, as the inhabitants thereof respectively. Any person guilty of or charged with treason, felony, or other high misdemeanor in any state, fleeing from justice, and found in any of the United States, upon demand of the governor or executive power of the state from which he fled, to be delivered up and removed to the state having jurisdiction of his offence. For the more convenient management of the general interests of the United States, delegates to be annually appointed, in such manner as the legislature of each state shall direct, to meet in congress on the first Monday in November in every year, with a power reserved to each state to recall its delegates, or any of them, and to send others in their stead. No state to be represented in congress by less than two nor by more than seven members; and no person to be capable of being a delegate for more than three years in any term of six years; nor is any person, being a delegate, to be capable of holding any office under the United States, for which he, or any other for his benefit, receives any salary, fees, or emolument of any kind. In determining questions in congress, each state to have one vote. No state, without the consent of the United States in congress, to send an embassy to, or receive any embassy from, or enter into any conference, agreement, alliance, or treaty, with any king, prince, or state. The United States in congress assembled to have the sole and exclusive right and power of determining on peace and war, except in cases of actual or threatened invasion; of sending and receiving ambassadors; entering into treaties and alliances; of establishing rules for deciding, in all cases, what captures on land or water shall be legal; of granting letters of marque and reprisal; appointing courts for the trial of piracies and felonies committed on the high seas. The United States in congress to be the last resort on appeal in all disputes and differences between two or more states concerning boundary, jurisdiction, or any other cause whatever; also to have the sole and exclusive right and power of regulating the alloy and value of coin struck by their own authority, or by that of the respective states; of fixing the standard of weights and measures throughout all the United States; regulating the trade, and managing all affairs with the Indians, not members of any of the states; establishing and regulating post-offices from one state to another throughout all the United States; appointing all the officers of the naval forces, and commissioning all officers whatever in the service of the United States; making rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces, and directing their operations. By the last article of the Confederation, every state to abide by the determination of the United States in congress assembled, on all questions which by this confederation are submitted to them. And the articles of this confederation to be inviolably observed by every state, and the union to be perpetual; no alteration at any time hereafter to be made in any of them, unless such alteration be agreed to in a congress of the United States, and be afterwards confirmed by the legislatures of every state.

‡ The following circular letter to the states accompanied this system:—

"Congress having agreed upon a plan of confederacy for securing the freedom, sovereignty, and independence of the United States, authentic copies are now transmitted for the consideration of the respective legislatures. The business, equally intricate and important, has in its progress been attended with uncommon embarrassments and delay, which the most anxious solicitude and persevering diligence could not prevent.

The plan was considered by the legislatures of the several states in the winter of 1777-8, and by some was adopted without amendments, by others various amendments were proposed.

The effect produced on the British cabinet, and on the nation at large, by the intelligence of the surrender of General Burgoyne and his army, can scarcely be described. The most brilliant success had been anticipated; the most ignominious result had occurred. The pride of the nation was humbled, and those who had disapproved of the war poured upon the ministry a torrent of invective; while the embarrassments of the ministry were increased by the intelligence of the course which the hereditary enemy and rival of Great Britain had resolved to pursue. Under these circumstances, it was determined in the cabinet to grant to America all that she had demanded in the beginning of the contest. An act was passed, declaring that parliament would not, in future, impose any tax upon the colonies; and commissioners were sent over, authorized to proclaim a repeal of all the offensive statutes, and to treat with the constituted authorities of America. The commissioners, arriving at Philadelphia in the spring, communicated to congress the terms offered by Great Britain, which were, however, unanimously rejected.*

In consequence of the treaties concluded with her revolted colonies, Great Britain declared war against France; and the ministry, presuming that assistance would be sent to the Americans, transmitted orders by the commissioners, that Philadelphia should be evacuated, and the royal troops concentrated at New York. The execution of these orders devolved upon Sir Henry Clinton, who had been appointed commander in chief on the resignation of General Howe. On the 18th of June the enemy quitted the city, and marched slowly eastward. Washington, leaving his huts in the forest, hung upon the rear of the British army, watching for a favourable opportunity to offer battle. On arriving at Monmouth, in New Jersey, General Lee, who had lately been exchanged, was ordered to take the command of five thousand men, and, early in the morning of the 28th, to commence an attack, being assured that he should be supported by the whole army. Lee made dispositions to attack accordingly, but perceiving the main body of the English returning to meet him, he began to retreat.

add weight and respect to our councils at home, and to our treaties abroad.

"In short, this salutary measure can no longer be deferred. It seems essential to our very existence as a free people; and without it, we may soon be constrained to bid adieu to independence, to liberty, and safety; blessings which, from the justice of our cause, and the favour of our Almighty Creator, visibly manifested in our protection, we have reason to expect, if, in an humble dependance on his divine providence, we strenuously exert the means which are placed in our power. To conclude, if the legislature of any state shall not be assembled, congress recommend to the executive authority to convene it without delay; and to each respective legislature it is recommended to invest its delegates with competent powers ultimately, in the name and behalf of the state, to subscribe articles of confederation and perpetual union of the United States, and to attend congress for that purpose on or before the 10th day of March, 1778."

* The letter communicating the refusal was signed by the president; and it illustrates the character of congress, and the history of this year. "I have received the letter from your excellencies, dated the 9th instant, with the enclosures, and laid them before congress. Nothing but an earnest desire to spare the further effusion of human blood could have induced them to read a paper containing expressions so disrespectful to his most Christian Majesty, the good and great ally of these states, or to consider propositions so derogatory to the honour of an independent nation. The acts of the British parliament, the commission from your sovereign, and your letter, suppose the people of these states to be subjects of the crown of Great Britain, and are founded on the idea of dependance, which is utterly inadmissible. I am further directed to inform your excellencies, that congress are inclined to peace, notwithstanding the unjust claims from which this war originated, and the savage manner in which it hath been conducted. They will therefore be ready to enter upon the consideration of a treaty of peace and commerce, not inconsistent with treaties already subsisting, when the king of Great Britain shall demonstrate a sincere disposition for that purpose. The only solid proof of this disposition will be an explicit acknowledgment of these states, or the withdrawing his fleets and armies."—Journals of Congress, vol. iv. p. 383.

"To form a permanent union, accommodated to the opinion and wishes of the delegates of so many states, differing in habits, produce, commerce, and internal police, was found to be a work which nothing but time and reflection, conspiring with a disposition to conciliate, could mature and accomplish. Hardly is it to be expected that any plan, in the variety of provisions essential to our union, should exactly correspond with the maxims and political views of every particular state. Let it be remarked, that, after the most careful inquiry and the fullest information, this is proposed as the best which could be adapted to the circumstances of all, and as that alone which affords any tolerable prospect of general ratification. Permit us, then, earnestly to recommend these articles to the immediate and dispassionate attention of the legislatures of the respective states. Let them be candidly reviewed under a sense of the difficulty of combining in one general system the various sentiments and interests of a continent divided into so many sovereign and independent communities, under a conviction of the absolute necessity of uniting all our councils and all our strength to maintain and defend our common liberties. Let them be examined with a liberality becoming brethren and fellow-citizens surrounded by the same imminent dangers, contending for the same illustrious prize, and deeply interested in being for ever bound and connected together by ties the most intimate and indissoluble.

"And finally, let them be adjusted with the temper and magnanimity of wise and patriotic legislators, who, while they are concerned for the prosperity of their own more immediate circle, are capable of rising superior to local attachments, when they may be incompatible with the safety, happiness, and glory of the general confederacy.

"We have reason to regret the time which has elapsed in preparing this plan for consideration. With additional solicitude, we look forward to that which must be necessarily spent before it can be ratified. Every motive loudly calls upon us to hasten its conclusion.

"More than any other consideration, it will confound our foreign enemies, defeat the flagitious practices of the disaffected, strengthen and confirm our friends, support our public credit, restore the value of our money, enable us to maintain our fleets and armies, and

Washington, advancing to render the promised support, saw him retiring, rode forward, and addressed him in language implying disapprobation of his conduct.* He then directed him to form his men on ground which he pointed out, and there oppose the progress of the enemy. A warm engagement ensued, and Washington, arriving with the main body of his army, compelled the British to fall back. The day had been intensely hot, and the troops were greatly fatigued,† yet General Washington resolved to renew the engagement; but there were so many impediments to be overcome, that before the attack could be commenced it was nearly dark. It was therefore thought most advisable to postpone further operations until morning, and the troops lay on their arms in the field of battle.‡ General Washington, who had been exceedingly active through the day, and entirely regardless of personal danger, reposed himself at night in his cloak, under a tree, in the midst of his soldiers. His intention of renewing the battle was, however, frustrated; the British troops marched away about midnight in such profound silence, that the most advanced posts knew nothing of their departure until morning. The American general, declining all further pursuit of the royal army, detached some light troops to attend its motions, and drew off his soldiers to the borders of the North River. Sir Henry Clinton, after remaining a few days on the high grounds of Middletown, proceeded to Sandy Hook, whence he passed his army over to New York.

The British having entered New York, Washington conducted his army to White Plains. Congress returned to Philadelphia; and in July received, with inexpressible joy, a letter from the Count D'Estaing, announcing his arrival on the coast of Virginia, with twelve sail of the line and six frigates, with about four thousand troops on board. The count had intended to surprise Admiral Howe in the Delaware, but adverse winds detained him on the passage, until the British fleet had sailed for New York. He appeared before that harbour, but on sounding, found that his largest ships could not pass the bar. By the advice of Washington, a combined attack upon the British forces at Newport, in Rhode Island, was resolved on. Gen.

Sullivan, who had been appointed to command the troops, called upon the militia of New England to aid him in the enterprise. His army soon amounted to ten thousand men, and, as he was supported by the fleet, he felt confident of success. On the 9th of August, he took a position on the north end of Rhode Island, and afterwards moved nearer to Newport. Admiral Howe having received a re-enforcement, now appeared before the harbour, and the count instantly put to sea to attack him. A furious storm, however, came on, which damaged and dispersed both fleets. As soon as the weather permitted, each commander sought the port from which he had sailed; but great was the disappointment of the Americans when D'Estaing announced his intention of proceeding to Boston to refit; they earnestly remonstrated, but the count was inflexible. Deserted by the fleet, the army could remain no longer with safety on the island. General Sullivan, therefore, immediately retreated to his first position. He was pursued and attacked by the enemy; but they were gallantly resisted and repulsed with loss. The next day the two armies cannonaded each other, and the succeeding night the American general, deceiving the enemy by a show of resistance to the last, made a skilful retreat to the continent. It was a remarkable escape. The delay of a single day would probably have been fatal to the Americans; for Sir Henry Clinton, who had been impeded by adverse winds, arrived with a re-enforcement of four thousand men the very next day, when a retreat, it is presumed, would have been impracticable.

At this period of the war, hostilities were carried on with more than usual acrimony. In several instances the British troops, and their allies, the Americans and native Indians, exhibited a barbarity deeply to be lamented, wantonly destroying the property and injuring the persons of peaceful unarmed inhabitants. While asleep in a barn at Tappan, Colonel Baylor's troop of light dragoons were surprised by General Grey, who commanded his soldiers to use the bayonet only, and to give the rebels no quarter. Incapable of defence, they sued for mercy; but the most pathetic supplications were

* Lee, irritable and proud, could not forget the manner in which Washington had addressed him, and in two passionate letters demanded reparation. A court-martial was instituted; he was found guilty of misconduct on the day of battle, and of disrespect to the commander in chief, and was suspended from command for one year. He never afterwards joined the army, but died in seclusion just before the close of the war.

† In consequence of heat and fatigue, fifty-nine British soldiers perished without a wound; and several of the American soldiers died through the same cause.

‡ The loss of the Americans in this battle was eight officers and sixty-one privates killed, and about a hundred and sixty wounded. Among the slain, and much regretted, were Lieutenant-Colonel Bonner, of Pennsylvania, and Major Dickenson, of Virginia. The loss of the British army, in killed, wounded, and missing, is stated to have been three hundred and fifty-eight men, including officers. Among their slain was Lieutenant-Colonel Monckton, who was greatly and deservedly lamented. About a hundred were taken prisoners; and nearly a thousand soldiers, principally foreigners, many of whom had married in Philadelphia, deserted the British standard during the march.

heard without awakening compassion; nearly one half of the troop were killed. To many, repeated thrusts were barbarously given as long as signs of life remained; while some, who had nearly a dozen stabs through the body, and were left for dead, afterwards recovered. A few escaped, and forty were saved by the humanity of a British captain, who dared to disobey the orders of his general. With feelings of revenge yet more barbarous, Wyoming, a happy and flourishing settlement, on the eastern branch of the Susquehannah, in Pennsylvania, was attacked by a band of tories and Indians. The conditions of the capitulation were entirely disregarded by the British and savage forces, and after the fort was delivered up, all kinds of barbarities were committed by them. The village of Wilkesbarre, consisting of twenty-three houses, was burnt; men and their wives were separated from each other and carried into captivity; their property was plundered, and the settlement laid waste. The remainder of the inhabitants were driven from the valley, and compelled to proceed on foot sixty miles through the great swamp, almost without food or clothing. A number perished in the journey, principally women and children—some died of their wounds, others wandered from the path in search of food and were lost, and those who survived called the wilderness through which they passed "The Shades of Death," an appellation which it has since retained. Many other instances might be adduced; but it is better to suffer the record of them to perish.*

In the campaign of 1778, little on either side was accomplished. The alliance with France gave birth to expectations which events did not fulfil; but the presence of her fleets on the coast deranged the plans of the British; induced them to relinquish a part of their conquests; and prevented their making any progress in the accomplishment of their designs.

* We insert the following as an antidote to the feelings with which the "glory" of war is apt to inspire the breasts even of the generous and noble:—"A short distance below the battle ground, there is a large island in the river, called Monockonock Island. Several of the settlers, while the battle and pursuit continued, succeeded in swimming to this island, where they concealed themselves among the logs and brushwood upon it. Their arms had been thrown away in their flight, previous to their entering the river, so that they were in a manner defenceless. Two of them, in particular, were concealed near and in sight of each other. While in this situation, they observed several of the enemy, who had pursued and fired at them while they were swimming the river, preparing to follow them to the island with their guns. On reaching the island they immediately wiped their guns and loaded them. One of them, with his loaded gun, soon passed close by one of these men, who lay concealed from his view, and was immediately recognised by him to be the brother of his companion who was concealed near him, but who, being a tory, had joined the enemy. He passed slowly along, carefully examining every covert, and directly perceived his brother in his place of concealment. He suddenly

The close of this year was distinguished by a change of the theatre of war from the northern to the southern section of the confederacy. The country, weak by its scattered population, the multitude of slaves, and the number of tories, presented a prospect of easy victory. In the end of November, Lieutenant-Colonel Campbell, with two thousand five hundred men, sailed from New York to the coast of Georgia. Having landed his troops, he marched towards Savannah, the capital; and defeating a small body of Americans whom he met on his route, he immediately took possession of the city. After the fall of the capital, Sunbury surrendered at discretion; and these were the only military posts in Georgia.

The campaign of 1779 was opened by General Lincoln, who had been appointed to the command of the American troops in the southern department. In April, leaving South Carolina, he marched into the interior of Georgia; upon which the British army, entering the state he had left, invested Charleston, the capital. Lincoln hastened back to its defence; and on his approach, the British retired to Stono ferry, where an action was fought, and a few days afterwards they continued their retreat to Savannah. The heat of the season suspended further operations until September; when Count D'Estaing, with a fleet carrying six thousand troops, arrived on the coast. The two armies, in concert, laid siege to Savannah. At the expiration of a month, the count, impatient of delay, insisted that the siege should be abandoned, or that a combined assault upon the enemy's works should immediately be made. General Lincoln determined upon the latter course. Great gallantry was displayed by the French and American troops, but the British repulsed the assailants, killing and wounding nearly a thousand men,† while on their part the loss was small. The next day the stopped and said, 'So it is you, is it?' His brother, finding that he was discovered, immediately came forward a few steps, and, falling on his knees, begged him to spare his life, promising to live with him and serve him, and even to be his slave as long as he lived, if he would only spare his life. 'All this is mighty good,' replied the savage-hearted brother of the supplicating man; 'but you are a d—d rebel;' and, deliberately presenting his rifle, shot him dead upon the spot. The other settler made his escape from the island, and having related this fact, the tory brother thought it prudent to accompany the British troops on their return to Canada."—History of Wyoming, p. 127.

† Count Pulaski was mortally wounded in this assault; and congress resolved that a monument should be erected to his memory. He was a Polishman of high birth, who, with a few men, had carried off King Stanislaus from the middle of his capital. The king, after being some time a prisoner, made his escape, and soon after declared Pulaski an outlaw. Thus proscribed, he came to America, and offered his service to congress, which honoured him with the rank of brigadier-general.

In September, 1779, the French fleet, under Count D'Estaing, siege was raised, the French returning home, and the Americans to South Carolina.

The operations of the British in the more northern parts of America were predatory rather than military. In May, a naval and land force, commanded by Sir George Collier and General Matthews, made a descent on Virginia. On their arrival, they took possession of Portsmouth and of Norfolk; destroyed the houses, vessels, naval stores, and a large magazine of provisions, at Suffolk; made a similar destruction at Kemp's Landing, Shepherd's, Gosport, Tanner's Creek, and other places in the vicinity: and, after setting fire to the houses and other public buildings in the dockyard at Gosport, embarked with their booty for New York. A similar expedition was soon after undertaken from New York against Connecticut, arrived on our coast, and General Lincoln marched to the relief of Savannah. The Georgia and South Carolina militia had orders to rendezvous in the neighbourhood. Before the arrival of General Lincoln, Count D'Estaing summoned the garrison at Savannah to surrender; but the British protracted the time, and with great exertions strengthened their works, under that accomplished engineer, Major Moncrieff; and at length bid the count defiance. Lincoln now arrived, and on the 4th of October the place was regularly besieged. Nine mortars and thirty-seven cannon from the land side, and fifteen pieces on the water side, were opened upon the city. But the French were impatient. The officers of D'Estaing's fleet insisted upon raising the siege, and taking the place by storm. No step could be more unadvisable. A short time, with the power brought to bear upon the besieged, would have forced a surrender at discretion. Lincoln remonstrated with the count, but the hot-headed young marine officers in the navy,—many of them belonging to distinguished families,—had great influence over the admiral, and brought him to decide on an attack.

On the 9th of October, at the dawn of the day, while two feints were made with the militia, a real attack was made by a gallant force of French and American troops. The French force consisted of three thousand five hundred, and the Americans of six hundred continentals, and three hundred and fifty citizens of Charleston. The gallant Frenchman at the head of his column, marched up to the lines, and Lincoln at the head of his troops, went pari passu. A tremendous fire from the British galleys threw the front of the column into confusion; not from fear, but from the difficulty of disposing of the dead and wounded, in order to fill up their places. The places being supplied, with desperate energy, the column marched on to a redoubt, where a conflict took place as fierce and close as ever was fought before the invention of gunpowder. The gate of the redoubt was most gallantly defended by Captain Fawse, who fell in the gate-way with his sword in the body of an assailant. They were lying side by side. This was the third the brave defender of the works had slain with his own hand. For an instant the French and American standards were seen in the smoke, floating on the parapet; but it was for a few moments only. The air was rent with acclamations; but the enemy's fire was too destructive; a retreat was ordered, after the combined armies had stood their ground for nearly an hour. The ground was heaped with the dead and the wounded. In this short time, nearly nine hundred of the allied armies were killed and wounded. The contest seemed to be, who would most readily dare to die. Six hundred and thirty-seven Frenchmen, and two hundred and forty-one Americans, were slain or wounded. The gallant D'Estaing was severely wounded; and mortified at the result, and at the loss of so many brave young officers, he embarked for some more fortunate shore. The militia soon scattered themselves without the consent of the general—they had seen too much of war. The Americans felt their losses most deeply, for among the slain fell the Polish count, Pulaski. He had about two hundred by Governor Tryon, with two thousand six hundred land forces, supported by Brigadier-General Garth, and accompanied by Sir George Collier with armed vessels to cover the transports. Though checked in their march, they entered New Haven about one in the afternoon, from which time until eight in the evening the town was subjected to almost indiscriminate ravage and plunder. The royal army also plundered and burned the town of Fairfield, and the greatest part of the neighbouring village of Green Farms. A few days afterward they laid the town of Norwalk in ashes.

Early in the season, Colonel Clarke, of Virginia, who was stationed at Kaskaskia, on the Mississippi, achieved an enterprise conspicuous for boldness of design, and evincing uncommon hardihood in its horse in the battle. He saw that desperation was the order of the day, and he started at full gallop to pass between the redoubts, and to charge the enemy in the rear, the most judicious movement of the day; but in executing it, he fell, mortally wounded, at the head of his column. The melancholy event spread a gloom over the whole army.

Joseph Pulaski Storasto, of Warka, was descended from a long line of illustrious ancestors. He received a first rate education in his own country, which was improved by foreign travel. He had prepared himself to serve his country as a judge, by making himself acquainted with the Justinian code; as a soldier, by making himself master of ancient and modern military tactics; as a statesman, by a free intercourse with the liberal of all countries, and by acquiring a deep knowledge of the laws of nations. Elevated by all that was noble in man, he mourned over the degraded state of his country, and resolved to see her free, if freedom was to be gained by any sacrifice that a patriot could make, of fortune, children, home, and life. He was a lover of his country's ancient fame, and deeply read in her history. He could not bear the thought of seeing her throne filled by a minion of the Semiramis of the North,—a wolf prowling for prey among surrounding nations, and making them feel her power from the Caspian to the Baltic, and from Kamschatka to Constantinople.

Stung by his country's wrongs, he flew to arms, and for several years, by the weight of his character, and the energies of his mind, he stemmed the torrent of corruption, and thus checked the progress of the arms of Russia, from 1768 to 1771. With a small army, he contended with a large one; with a few patriotic followers, he hewed down myriads of the instruments of despotic power. He revived, after a defeat, with almost miraculous suddenness; and when his enemies thought him for ever subdued, he came upon them like a bolt of lightning! He dispersed the wicked with a look, and brought together the virtuous by a smile. Avarice stood abashed at his sacrifices of property, and selfishness could not reach the elevation and purity of his motives. There were men who thought him ambitious, and that he aspired to the direction of the affairs of Poland; but they could not fathom the depth of his mind, nor measure the expansion of his soul! A weak and timid monarch charged him with attempts on his life, when his only object was to secure his person for a season, in order to make better terms for those who had incurred the royal displeasure. He formed himself on no recent models—the heroes of antiquity filled his mind. The justice of Aristides, the patriotism and martial character of Epaminondas, were for ever before him. Born to affluence, he only used his riches for the purpose of doing good; and he valued power, hereditary and acquired, only as an instrument of making others happy. The cause of liberty was his cause, wherever found; he was ordained, in early life, as a priest at her altar; and it was the decree of heaven that he should die a martyr in her cause!—American Editor.

execution. With only one hundred and thirty men, he penetrated through the wilderness to St. Vincent's, a British post on the Wabash, in the heart of the Indian country. His route lay across deep swamps and morasses; and in one instance the party waded through water, often as high as the breast, for nearly five miles. After a march of sixteen days, they reached the town, which, having no intimation of their approach, surrendered without resistance; and a short time after, the fort capitulated. This fortunate achievement arrested an expedition which the enemy had projected against the frontiers of Virginia, and detached several tribes of Indians from the British interest.

Congress, though its measures toward the Indians were conciliatory, could not secure the western frontiers. The Six Nations had been advised by that body, and had promised, to observe a neutrality in the war; but, excepting the Oneidas, and a few others who were friendly to the Americans, those Indians took a decided part against them. The presents and promises of Sir John Johnson and other British agents, with the desire of plunder, induced them to invade the frontiers; and wherever they went, they carried slaughter and devastation. An expedition was therefore ordered against them, and General Sullivan, to whom the conduct of it was intrusted, marched into their country. The Indians, on hearing of the projected expedition, collected their strength, took possession of proper ground, and fortified it with judgment. General Sullivan attacked them in their works, and they sustained a cannonade more than two hours; but they then gave way, and, after their trenches were forced, they fled with precipitation. The victorious army, penetrating into the heart of their country, laid it desolate. Their villages, their detached habitations, their corn fields, their fruit trees and gardens, were indiscriminately destroyed.

The campaign of this year, though barren in important events, was distinguished by one gallant enterprise, which reflected much honour on the American arms. Stony Point, a fortress on the North River, had been taken from the Americans, and strongly fortified by the British. It was at this time garrisoned by about six hundred men, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Johnson. General Washington, having obtained precise information of the condition of the works, the nature of the ground in their vicinity, the strength and arrangements of the garrison, and the disposition of the guards, and having in person reconnoitred the post, resolved to attempt the surprise of it. The execution of the plan was intrusted to General Wayne, and the troops employed on this service were chiefly from New England. At half past eleven on the night of the 15th of July, the columns moved on to the charge at opposite points of the works, the van of each with unloaded muskets and fixed bayonets; and at twenty minutes after twelve, both columns rushed forward under a tremendous fire of musketry and grape-shot, entered the works at the point of the bayonet, and, arriving in the centre of them at nearly the same instant, compelled the garrison to surrender at discretion. A more gallant exploit has seldom been performed, and the humanity of the victors was equal to their valour. Notwithstanding the devastations in Connecticut, and the butchery of Baylor's troop, the scene of which was near, not an individual suffered after resistance had ceased.

On the approach of the inclement season, the American army built themselves huts for winter quarters. Positions were chosen most favourable for the defence of the most important posts, and for covering the country. The army was formed into two divisions; one of these erected huts near West Point, and the other at Morristown, in New Jersey. The head quarters of the commander in chief were with the last division. Great distress was felt this winter on account of the deranged state of the American finances. General Greene and Colonel Wadsworth, gentlemen in every respect qualified for the duties of their respective stations, were yet at the head of the quarter-master and commissary departments, but the credit of the country was fallen; they had not the means to make prompt payment for articles of supply; and they found it impossible to lay up large magazines of provisions, and extremely difficult to obtain supplies to satisfy the temporary wants of the army. Large sums had been annually raised and expended, and the ability of the people to pay taxes had progressively decreased. To supply deficiencies, paper money, to the amount of about a hundred and fifty millions of dollars, had been issued; but this was depreciated, and at the close of 1779, thirty dollars in paper were of no more value than one in specie. To purchase provisions with this money was therefore first difficult, and then impossible, and congress now found their funds and their credit exhausted. Before the month of January expired, the soldiers were put upon allowance, and before its close the whole stock of provision in store was exhausted, and there was neither meat nor flour to be distributed to the troops. To prevent the dissolution of the army, the commander in chief was reluctantly driven to very vigorous measures: he apportioned to each county in the state of New Jersey a quantity of meat and flour, according to the ability of each, to be brought into camp in the course of six days. At the same time he wrote to the magistrates, stating the absolute necessity of the measure, and informing them, that unless the inhabitants voluntarily complied with the requisition, the exigency of the case would force him to obtain it by military exaction. To the honour of the inhabitants of New Jersey, harassed as their country had been, the full quantity of provisions required was cheerfully and seasonably afforded.

CHAPTER II.

FROM THE CAMPAIGN OF 1780 TO THE TERMINATION OF THE WAR OF THE REVOLUTION.

DURING the year 1780, the contest between Great Britain and her ancient colonies was carried on chiefly in the southern states. As soon as Sir Henry Clinton ascertained that Count D'Estaing had left the American coast, he hastened to despatch an expedition against South Carolina, leaving the garrison at New York under the command of General Knyphausen. Early in February the troops landed within thirty miles of the capital. Governor Rutledge, to whom the assembly of South Carolina had recently given extraordinary powers, ordered the militia to rendezvous, but the repulse at Savannah, at the close of the preceding campaign, had produced such a dispiriting effect, that but few complied. The defences of Charleston consisted of a chain of redoubts, lines, and batteries, extending from Ashley to Cooper river, on which were mounted upwards of eighty pieces of artillery, and on all sides of the town where a landing was practicable, batteries were erected and covered with artillery. General Lincoln, trusting to these defences, and expecting large re-enforcements, remained in Charleston at the earnest request of the inhabitants, and, with the force under his command, resolved to defend the place. On the 21st of March the British fleet crossed the bar, and anchored in Five Fathom Hole. Commodore Whipple, who commanded the American vessels, finding it impracticable to prevent the enemy from passing over the bar, fell back to Fort Moultrie, and afterwards to Charleston. In a few days the town was invested by sea and land, and the British commanders summoned General Lincoln to surrender; the demand was, however, met with a firm refusal. The batteries of the first parallel were now opened upon the town, and soon made a visible impression; and to prevent the reception of the re-enforcements which General Lincoln expected, Sir H. Clinton detached Lieutenant-colonel Webster, with fourteen hundred men, by the advanced guard of which detachment, the American cavalry, with the militia attached to them, were surprised in the night of the 14th of April, and completely routed and dispersed. The British now extended themselves to the eastward of Cooper river; and about this time Sir Henry Clinton received a re-enforcement of three thousand men from New York. The garrison having no reasonable hope of effecting a retreat, an offer was made of surrendering the town; but the proposed conditions were rejected by the British commanders. The besiegers in the mean time were daily advancing their works, and had now completed their third parallel; the garrison of Fort Moultrie surrendered; and the broken remains of the American cavalry under Colonel White were again surprised by Colonel Tarleton, and the whole either killed, taken, or dispersed. Sir Henry Clinton, thus successful in every operation, renewed his former offers to the garrison in case of their surrender; but the terms, so far as they respected the citizens, not being satisfactory, hostilities recommenced. The batteries of the third parallel now opened on the town, and did great execution; several houses were burned; numbers of the besieged were killed at their guns; and the British prepared to make a general assault by land and water. At length a great number of citizens of Charleston addressed General Lincoln in a petition, requesting his acceptance of the terms which had been previously offered. A capitulation was consequently signed on the 12th of May, and the next day Major-General Leslie took possession of the town.*

The capital having surrendered, measures were adopted to overawe the inhabitants of the country, and induce them to return to their allegiance to the king. Garrisons were placed in different parts of the state, and two thousand men were despatched towards North Carolina, to repel several parties of militia, who were hastening to the relief of Charleston. Colonel Tarleton, making a rapid march of a hundred and five miles in fifty-four hours, met, at

* By the articles of capitulation, the garrison were to march out of the town, and to deposit their arms in front of the works; but the drums were not to beat a British march, nor the colours to be uncased. The continental troops and seamen were to keep their baggage, and remain prisoners of war until exchanged. The militia were to be permitted to return home as prisoners on parole; and, while they should adhere to their parole, were not to be molested by the British troops, in person or property. The inhabitants of all conditions were to be considered as prisoners on parole, and to hold their property on the same terms with the militia.

the Waxhaws, and attacked one of these parties, commanded by Colonel Buford. The Americans, being defeated by his superior forces, implored quarter; but nearly the whole of them were either killed or too badly wounded to be removed from the field. This sanguinary conduct spread dismay throughout the country, and imparted a similar character to future conflicts.

Indignant at the treatment they received, great numbers of the inhabitants seized their arms, and resolved on a vindictive war with their invaders. A party who had taken refuge in North Carolina, chose Colonel Sumpter their leader. At the head of these he returned to his own state, attacked and defeated several scattered detachments from the British army; and by a succession of gallant enterprises he kept alive a spirit of determined hostility to Great Britain in every part of the state. His exertions were rendered the more effective by the approach of four thousand men, principally continentals, under the command of General Gates. Lord Cornwallis, whom Sir Henry Clinton, on his return to New York, had left chief in command, hastened to oppose the conqueror of Burgoyne. On the night of the 15th of August, he marched, with his whole force, to attack the Americans in their camp at Clermont. They at the same hour began to move towards Camden, where Lord Cornwallis had his head-quarters. As the two armies were marching on the same road, in opposite directions, their advanced guards met and fired on each other about half-past two in the morning. From some prisoners made on both sides, the commanders learned each other's movements. Both armies halted, and were formed, and the firing soon ceased, as if by mutual consent. The ground on which the two armies thus accidentally met, was exceedingly favourable to Lord Cornwallis. A swamp on each side secured his flanks, and narrowed the ground in front, so as to render the superiority of the Americans in numbers of less consequence. In the morning a severe and general action was fought. The charge of the British was made with such vigour, that the Virginia militia threw down their arms, and fled with the utmost precipitation; and the greatest part of the North Carolina militia soon followed their example. The American reserve was now brought into action, and General Gates, in conjunction with General Caswell, endeavoured to rally the militia at advantageous passes in the rear of the field of action, but in vain. On the left and in the centre the contest was more obstinately maintained by the Americans, whose artillery did considerable execution; but by the flight of the militia their left flank was exposed, and the continentals after a brave resistance of nearly three quarters of an hour, were thrown into confusion, and forced to give way. The Americans lost the whole of their artillery, the greatest part of their baggage, several hundred men, and some very valuable officers; the loss of the British was also severe.

Sumpter, who had lately been victorious in a skirmish, retreated precipitately on hearing of the defeat of Gates; but supposing he was beyond danger, he halted at the Catawba ford to refresh his troops. Here his sentinels unhappily slept at their posts, and Tarleton's legion rode into his camp before preparations could be made for defence. Between three and four hundred were killed or wounded. The remainder were dispersed in the woods, three hundred British prisoners were released, and all the baggage and stores fell into the power of the victors.

Apprehending the state to be subdued, Cornwallis adopted measures of extreme severity to suppress every latent inclination to revolt. He directed that all who, having once submitted, had lately given aid to the armies of congress, should be deprived of their property and imprisoned; and that all who had once borne arms with the British, and afterwards joined the Americans, should suffer death. In consequence of these orders, several were executed, and many were reduced to poverty and wretchedness. In these times of confusion and distress, the mischievous effects of slavery in facilitating the conquest of the country became apparent. As the slaves had no interest at stake, the subjugation of the state was a matter of no consequence to them. Instead of aiding in its defence, they, by a variety of means, threw the weight of their influence into the opposite scale.

Although his corps had been dispersed, General Sumpter speedily re-collected a band of volunteers, and kept the field in South Carolina for three months, when there was no continental army in the state. Varying his position along the Evoree, Broad, and Tyger rivers, he had frequent skirmishes with the enemy, whom he incessantly harassed. In November he was attacked at Broad river by Major Wemys, commanding a corps of infantry and dragoons, but the British were defeated, and their commanding officer taken prisoner; and in a few days afterward he was attacked near Tyger river by Colonel Tarleton, who finding himself unable to dislodge the Americans, retreated with considerable loss, and left Sumpter in possession of the field. The zeal, activity, and bravery of this officer, at that trying period, procured him the thanks of congress and the applause of his country.

While the affairs of the south were in a state by no means encouraging to the cause of independence, the general army under the command of Washington was in a state of insufferable destitution, and of consequent mutiny. Two hundred millions of dollars in paper currency were at this time in circulation upon the credit of the United States. Congress had the preceding year solemnly pledged the faith of government not to issue more than this sum, and the national treasury was now empty. Congress, the head of the nation, had, therefore, no further command of the resources of the country. The power of taxation, and of every coercive measure of government, was vested in the state sovereignties, and a system which in its execution required the conjoint agency of thirteen sovereignties, was too complex for the prompt operations of a military body. In the course of the winter forage had failed, and

* Destitute of arms and ammunition, without a single ship of war, and without the means of procuring them, no resource was left, to enable them to resist the mighty force brought against them, but a paper medium.

During the year 1775, bills of credit, to the amount of three millions of dollars, were issued by congress, in addition to those issued by some of the individual states. By new emissions, at different times, this sum was increased at the close of the year 1778, to more than one hundred millions.

From the peculiar situation of the United States, without commerce, the union incomplete, the state governments imperfectly organized, congress deemed it imprudent to call for taxes, until November, 1777. At this time, they recommended to the several states, to raise by taxes, the sum of five millions of dollars, for the succeeding year. This sum was apportioned among the states, having reference, generally, to the supposed number of inhabitants in each. [To New Hampshire, 200,000; Massachusetts, 820,000; Rhode Island, 100,000; Connecticut, 600,000; New York, 200,000; New Jersey, 270,000; Pennsylvania, 620,000; Delaware, 60,000; Maryland, 520,000; Virginia, 800,000; North Carolina, 250,000; South Carolina, 500,000; Georgia, 60,000.] The sums so apportioned, however, were not to be considered as the final quota of any state; but the amount paid by each, was to be placed to its credit, bearing an interest of six per cent. from the time of payment, until the quotas should be finally adjusted, agreeably to the confederation, to be adopted and ratified by the states. If, on such adjustment, any state had paid more than its quota, it was to receive interest on the surplus; if less, then to pay interest on the deficiency, until, by a future tax, such surplus or deficiency should be adjusted.

Depreciation of this paper was the natural consequence of such large emissions. This was seriously felt, in the beginning of 1777; and to provide a remedy, congress, in January of that year, made it a tender in payment of all public and private debts; and a refusal to receive it, was declared to be an extinguishment of the debt itself. And they thought proper to declare, that whoever should refuse to receive it, in exchange for any property, as gold and silver, should be deemed an enemy to his country. They, at the same time, resorted to the extraordinary expedient of regulating the prices of all articles necessary for the army; and if any persons refused to sell the surplus of what was wanted for the annual support of their families, the purchasing commissaries were authorized to take such surplus at the prices so fixed.

These extraordinary measures tended to increase rather than diminish the evil. The bills still continued to depreciate rapidly, and some more effectual remedy than tender and regulating laws, was necessary. In 1779, congress attempted to establish a fund for sinking the bills then in circulation, by calling on the states to many of the horses attached to the army had died, or were rendered unfit for use. General Washington therefore struggled with almost insuperable difficulties in supplying the army. The pay of the officers also had now scarcely more than a nominal value; and the officers of whole lines belonging to some of the states, in a body, gave notice, that on a certain day they should resign their commissions, unless provision was made for their honourable support. Congress possessed not the means to apply adequate remedies to these threatening evils. They passed a resolution, indeed, "That congress will make good to the line of the army, and to the independent corps thereof, the deficiencies of their original pay, which had been occasioned by the depreciation of the continental currency;"* but the promise of future compensation from a country whose neglect was conceived to be the source of all their sufferings, they deem-pay their quotas of fifteen millions of dollars for that year, and six millions annually for the eighteen succeeding years.

These calls upon the states were made in vain; little was paid into the public treasury; and new bills were issued, which swelled the amount in September, 1779, to one hundred and sixty millions. At this time, congress thought it necessary to declare, that the issues, on no account, should exceed two hundred millions. Nor did they then despair of their ultimate redemption at par. In a circular address to their constituents, they, with apparent sincerity and zeal, endeavoured to prove, that the United States had the ability, as well as disposition, eventually to redeem their bills. After stating the probable future resources of the country, from an increase of population, a vast increase of agricultural productions, the avails of the western lands, &c., they say, "whoever examines the force of these and similar observations, must smile at the ignorance of those, who doubt the ability of the United States to redeem the bills." They indignantly repelled the idea of a violation of the plighted faith of the nation.

"The pride of America," they observed, "revolts at the idea; her citizens know for what purpose these emissions were made, and have repeatedly plighted their faith for the redemption of them; they are to be found in every man's possession, and every man is interested in their being redeemed; they must therefore entertain a high opinion of American credulity, who suppose the people capable of believing, on due reflection, that all America will, against the faith, the honour, and the interest of all America, be ever prevailed upon to countenance, support, or permit so ruinous, so disgraceful a measure."

While every one must applaud the spirit of these observations, few, we believe, will not regret to find in the same address, remarks on the supposed advantages of paper money, calculated to make them doubt, at least, whether congress were not trifling with the public, on so interesting and important a subject.

"Let it be remembered," they remarked, "that paper money is the only kind of money which cannot 'make unto itself wings and fly away.' It remains with us, it will not forsake us, it is always ready and at hand for the purpose of commerce or taxes, and every industrious man can find it."

The continued failures of the states to comply with the requisitions made upon them, and the increasing wants of the country, increased the issues (notwithstanding the resolution of congress to the contrary) to more than three hundred millions; and the idea of redeeming the bills at their nominal value, was at length abandoned. In March, 1780, the states were required to bring them in at forty for one. The bills, when brought in, were to be cancelled, and new ones to issue in lieu of them, not exceeding one twentieth part of their nominal amount. The new bills were to be redeemable in six years, to bear an interest of five per cent., to be ed a feeble basis of dependance, at the moment they were severely pressed by privations of every kind. Murmurs at length broke out into actual mutiny. Two of the Connecticut regiments paraded under arms, announcing their intention to return home, or by their arms to obtain subsistence; but by the spirited and prudent exertions of the officers, the ringleaders were secured, and the regiments brought back to their duty.

This disaffection was reported to New York, with the customary exaggerations of rumour. General Knyphausen, the commanding officer at that post, supposing the American citizens and soldiers ripe for revolt, passed over into New Jersey with five thousand men, to avail himself of favourable events; but the behaviour of the Americans soon convinced him he had been deceived in the report of their disaffected disposition. The troops detached from the army to oppose his progress fought with obstinate bravery; and the inhabitants, seizing their arms with alacrity, emulated the spirit and persevering courage of the regular soldier. The general, finding he must encounter serious opposition, retreated to Elizabeth Point, opposite to Staten Island. In the mean time, Sir Henry Clinton, returning with his victorious troops from Charleston, ordered a re-enforcement to Knyphausen, who, with the whole body, advanced a second time towards Springfield. The British were now opposed by General Greene with a considerable body of continental troops, and a severe action was fought, but the Americans were forced, by superior numbers, to retire. General Greene took post with his troops on a range of hills, in the hope of being attacked; but the British, having burned the town, retreated, and the next day set out on their return to New York.

Late in the spring the Marquis La Fayette returned from France with the pleasing intelligence that issued on the credit of the individual states, and their payment guarantied by the United States.

The new system of finance was equally unavailing. The old bills were not brought in, and of course few new ones issued. The general treasury was empty, the army without pay or clothing, and often without provisions. The states were called upon for supplies in specific articles. To keep the army together, congress were obliged to raise money, by drawing bills on their ministers in Europe, without any assurance of their payment.

The continental bills, at last, became of so little value, that they ceased to circulate; and in the course of the year 1780, quietly died in the hands of the possessors.

In addition to this, the campaign of 1780 was unfortunate for America. The cities of Charleston and Savannah were taken, and the states of South Carolina and Georgia were in possession of the enemy. In this situation, congress had no other means of providing for the next campaign, but foreign loans. To obtain these, they, on the 22d of November, addressed a letter to their ally, the king of France, stating their embarrassments, and declaring that a foreign loan of at least twenty-five millions of livres, his government had resolved to assist the United States, by employing this year a respectable land and naval force in America. This grateful information reanimated the public mind, and gave a new stimulus to the activity of congress, and of the governments of the several states, that preparation might be made to co-operate with the French armament on its arrival. Vigorous measures were in consequence adopted by congress and by the states to recruit the army, to lay up magazines, and to enable their general to comply with the reasonable expectations of their allies; but the agency of different bodies was necessary to carry these public measures into effect, and their operation was dilatory.

Early in July the first division of French troops reached the American shore, consisting of between five and six thousand men, with a large train of battering and field artillery. These forces were commanded by Count de Rochambeau, whose government had placed him under the command of General Washington. The count brought information that a second division would follow him as soon as transports could be fitted out to bring them. The principal French and American officers assiduously cultivated a mutual affection between the two armies; and the commander in chief recommended to the officers of the United States to engraft on the American cockade a white relief, as an emblem of the alliance of the two powers. On the arrival of the French, the Americans were unprepared to act with them, nor did the American general know what force would ultimately be brought into the field; and before any thing could be effected, information was brought that the second armament destined for America was blocked up in the harbour of Brest, and would not this season reach the American continent. The flattering prospect of terminating the war by the conquest of the British posts in a moment was indispensably necessary for a vigorous prosecution of the war. Dr. Franklin was specially instructed, "to employ his unremitted and utmost abilities" to procure the aids required. At no time since the campaign of 1776, had the affairs of the United States worn so gloomy an aspect, as at the close of this year. General Washington, in a circular letter to the governors of the states, in October, says, "our finances are in an alarming state of derangement. The public credit is almost arrived at its last stage. The people begin to be dissatisfied with the feeble mode of conducting the war, and with the ineffectual burdens imposed on them, which, though light in comparison with what other nations feel, are, from their novelty, heavy to them. They lose their confidence in government apace."

The absolute necessity of obtaining foreign loans, induced congress, in December, 1780, to send a special minister to France. Colonel John Laurens, one of the aids of General Washington, and son of Henry Laurens, then a prisoner in the tower of London, was selected for this important mission.—Pitkin's Political and Civil History, vol. ii. p. 154—158.

In this season of difficulty, of embarrassment, and of gloom, a circumstance occurred which excited the deepest interest throughout both armies, and indeed in the breast of the inhabitants of all the states. The American army was stationed in the strongholds of the high lands on both sides of the North River; and for the defence of this position, and to keep command of the river, a fortress had been built at West Point, which was deemed impregnable, and had acquired the appellation of the Gibraltar of America. Of this post General Arnold solicited the command, and General Washington, far from suspecting any sinister views in an officer who had been so zealous and active in the cause of his country, complied with the solicitation. Arnold had, however, no sooner become invested with the command, than he carried on a negotiation with Sir Henry Clinton, by which it was agreed, that he should make such a disposition of his forces, as would enable the British general effectually to surprise West Point. The agent employed in this negotiation was Major Andre, adjutant-general of the British army; and to favour the communications, the Vulture, a British sloop of war, had been previously stationed in North River, as near Arnold's posts as could be without exciting suspicion. On the night of the 21st of September, a boat was sent from the shore to fetch Major Andre, and Arnold met him at the beach, without the posts of both armies. Their business not being finished until it was too near morning for Andre to return to the Vulture, Arnold, telling him he must be concealed until the next night, conducted him within one of the American posts, where he continued with him the following day. The Vulture having in the mean time been compelled to alter her position, Andre could return to New York in no other way than by land; changing his uniform, therefore, which he had worn under a surtout, for a plain dress, he set out on horseback, under the name of John Anderson, with a passport, signed by Arnold, "to go to the lines of White Plains, or lower if he thought proper, he being on public business." When advanced a great part of the way, he was stopped by three of the New York militia, and several papers, containing exact returns of the state of the forces, ordnance, and defences at West Point, were found in his boots. The captors, disdaining a proffered bribe of a purse of gold, and permanent provision and promotion, on condition of their conveying and accompanying him to New York, delivered him a prisoner to Lieutenant-Colonel Jameson, who commanded the out-posts. Andre, with the incautious permission of Jameson, procured a letter to be sent to Arnold, informing him of his detention, which gave the traitor opportunity to escape on board the Vulture,* in which he reached New York in safety. At this very hour Washington arrived, on his return from a conference with the French general at Hartford. He repaired, without delay, to the fort of West Point, where, however, he could learn nothing of a decisive import. But some orders, issued by Arnold the day before, redoubled his suspicions; he returned to the quarters of the general, and at this instant Jameson's messenger presented himself, and delivered the packet with which he was charged. Washington seemed for the moment overwhelmed by the discovery of a crime which ruined the fame of an American general, and wounded the honour of the American army. Those who were near him anxiously interrogated his looks in silence, which he broke by saying, "I thought

* General Arnold early and warmly embraced the American cause. His enterprising spirit, his invincible fortitude, his heroic and persevering ardour in battle, had exalted his military character in his own country and in Europe. Being incapacitated for the duties of the field by the wounds he received before Quebec and at Saratoga, he was appointed commandant in Philadelphia when the British evacuated that city. In this flattering command, he adopted a style of living above his means, and soon found himself loaded with debt. To relieve himself he entered into various schemes of speculation, and was unsuccessful in all. Hollow at heart, he had recourse to fraud and peculation. These practices rendered him odious to the citizens, and gave offence to government. At length, formal complaints were lodged against him, and congress ordered his trial by a court-martial. By this court he was found guilty, and sentenced to be reprimanded by the commander in chief. The sentence was approved by congress, and carried into execution by General Washington. In the gold that was to reward his treason, Arnold expected relief from his pecuniary embarrassments; and his implacable spirit sought its revenge of his country by betraying into the hand of her enemy the Gibraltar of America. Upon his establishment in the army of Great Britain, he found it necessary to make some exertions to secure the attachment of his new friends. With the hope of alluring many of the discontented to his standard, he published an address to the inhabitants of America, in which he endeavoured to justify his conduct. This was followed by a proclamation, addressed "to the officers and soldiers of the continental army, who have the real interest of their country at heart, and who are determined to be no longer the tools and dupes of congress and of France." These proclamations did not produce the effect designed; and in all the hardships, sufferings, and irritations of the war, Arnold remains the solitary instance of an American officer who abandoned the side first embraced in the contest, and turned his sword upon his former companions in arms. He survived the war but to drag on, in perpetual banishment from his native country, a dishonourable life. He transmitted to his children a name of hateful celebrity. He obtained only a part of the debasing stipend of an abortive treason, and his complaints soon caused it to be known, that all the promises by which he had been inveigled were not fulfilled. He enjoyed, however, the rank of brigadier-general, but the officers of the British army manifested a strong repugnance to serve with him. He possessed their esteem while he fought against them; they loaded him with contempt when treason brought him over to their side. He resided principally in England after the conclusion of the war, and died on the 14th of June, 1801.

that an officer of courage and ability, who had often shed his blood for his country, was entitled to confidence, and I gave him mine. I am convinced now, and for the rest of my life, that we should never trust those who are wanting in probity, whatever abilities they may possess. Arnold has betrayed us." Meanwhile, the precautions required by the occasion were every where taken. General Heath, a faithful and vigilant officer, was substituted for Arnold at West Point; the commanders of the other posts were admonished to be on their guard; Greene, who had been invested with the command of the army during the absence of Washington, recalled within the forts the garrisons which the traitor had dispersed, and marched a strong division near to the lines. General Washington referred the case of Andre to the examination and decision of a board, consisting of fourteen officers, who founded their report on his own statements; they reported it as their unanimous opinion, "that Major Andre ought to be considered as a spy, and that, agreeably to the laws and usages of nations, he should suffer death;" and he was, in accordance with their sentence, hung as a spy.*

When the winter of 1780 commenced, the troops of the northern army retired to the quarters which they had last occupied. Again they endured distress at which patriotism feels indignant and humanity weeps. The harvest had been abundant; plenty reigned in the land, while want was still felt in the camp of its defenders. Lassitude had succeeded enthusiasm, in the breasts of the people, and congress exerted its powers with too little vigour to draw forth the resources of the country. The soldiers of the Pennsylvania line stationed at Morristown, New Jersey, complained that, in addition to sustaining sufferings common to all, they were retained in service contrary to the terms of their enlistments. In the night of the 1st of January, thirteen hundred, on a concerted signal, paraded under arms, and declared their intention of marching to Philadelphia, and demanding of congress a redress of their grievances. The officers strove to compel them to relinquish their purpose. In the attempt, one was killed, and several were wounded. General Wayne presented his pistols, as if intending to fire. They held their bayonets to his breast; "We love and respect you," said they; "but if you fire you are a dead man. We are not going to the enemy. On the contrary, if they were now to come out, you should see us fight under your orders with as much alacrity as ever. But we will be amused no longer; we are determined to obtain what is our just due." They elected temporary officers, and moved off in a body towards Princeton. General Wayne, to prevent them from plundering the inhabitants, forwarded provisions for their use. The next day he followed, and requested them to appoint a man from each regiment, to state to him their complaints; a conference was accordingly held, but he refused to comply with their demands. They then proceeded in good order to Princeton, where three emissaries from Sir Henry Clinton met them, and made liberal offers to entice them from the service of congress. The offers were indignantly rejected, and the emissaries seized and executed as spies. Here they were also met by a committee of congress, and a deputation from the state of Pennsylvania; and the latter, granting a part of their demands, succeeded in persuading them to return to their duty. This mutiny, and another in the Jersey line, which was instantly suppressed, aroused the attention of the states to the miserable condition of their troops. The amount of three months' pay was raised and forwarded to them in specie; it was received with joy, as affording an evidence that their country was not unmindful of their sufferings.

The year on which we now enter decided the important contest, which engaged the attention of Europe and of all the civilized world, in favour of liberty, and, we must add, of justice. The boon of independence was not, however, gained without adding to the long list of widows and orphans, nor without augmenting the catalogue of cruelties more horrid than those of the Indian tribes, because perpetrated by those who had no accumulated antipathy

* The general officers who reported his case lamented the necessity they were under to advise that as a spy he should be hung, and the heart of General Washington was wrung with anguish when he signed his death warrant. But the fatal wound that would have been inflicted on the country had Arnold's treason succeeded, made the sacrifice necessary for the public safety. The American officers universally discovered a sympathy for the unfortunate sufferer, and the sensibility of the public was greatly excited on the occasion. His character is thus beautifully painted by the late General Hamilton, who without envy might have contemplated his eminent qualities, for they were not equal to his own. "There was something singularly interesting in the character of Andre. To an excellent understanding, well improved by education and travel, he united a peculiar elegance of mind and manners, and the advantages of a pleasing person. It is said that he possessed a pretty taste for the fine arts, and had himself attained some proficiency in poetry, music, and painting. His knowledge appeared without ostentation, and embellished by a diffidence that rarely accompanies so many talents and accomplishments, which left you to suppose more than appeared. His sentiments were elevated, and inspired esteem,—they had a softness that conciliated affection. His elocution was handsome, his address easy, polite, and insinuating. By his merit he had acquired the unlimited confidence of his general, and was making rapid progress in military rank and reputation. But in the height of his career, flushed with new hopes from the execution of a project the most beneficial to his party that could be devised, he is at once precipitated from the summit of prosperity, sees all the expectations of his ambition blasted, and himself ruined." A handsome monument is erected of his memory in Westminster Abbey.

of ages to palliate their hostility, but who only yesterday were friends and brothers. The inhabitants of the Carolinas endured calamity and distress from which humanity revolts. About equally divided in political sentiments, village was opposed to village, and neighbour to neighbour; and their hostility became embittered by attack and reprisal, until pillage, burning, and murder, became familiar to all.* Each party aimed at the extirpation of the other, and the whole country presented a scene of slaughter and of blood. Justice compels the record that the American generals seized every occasion to discountenance such vindictive and barbarous conduct, while, with few exceptions, the British permitted and even accelerated their perpetration.

The reduction of Savannah and Charleston, encouraged the British to a vigorous invasion of North Carolina. The whole army of General Greene, which had at the close of last year advanced from Hillsborough to Charlottetown, consisted of about two thousand men, more than half of whom were militia. With this inconsiderable body of troops, miserably provided, General Greene took the field against a superior regular force, which had already marched in triumph two hundred miles from the point of its debarkation. Soon after Greene took the command, he divided his force, and sent General Morgan with a respectable detachment to the western extremity of South Carolina, where the tories were destroying the whigs without mercy, and without restraint, and marched with the main body to Hick's Creek, on the north side of the Pedee. On the entrance of General Morgan into the district of Ninety-Six, Lord Cornwallis, who was preparing for the invasion of North Carolina, that he might not leave an enemy in his rear, ordered Colonel Tarleton to proceed with about eleven hundred men, and drive him from his position. Tarleton had two field pieces, and a superiority both of infantry and cavalry. With these advantages, he engaged Morgan at the Cowpens, near Pacolet river, on the 17th of January. The British, led to the attack by Tarleton himself, advanced with a shout, and poured in an incessant fire of musketry. The American militia, though they received the charge with firmness, were soon compelled to fall back in the rear of their second line; and this line, in its turn, after an obstinate conflict, was compelled to retreat to the cavalry. At this juncture Lieutenant-Colonel Washington made a successful charge on Captain Ogilvie, who, with about forty dragoons, was cutting down the retreating militia; Lieutenant-Colonel Howard almost at the same moment rallied the continental troops and charged with fixed bayonets, and the militia instantly followed the example. By these sudden and unexpected charges, the British, who had considered the fate of the day decided, were thrown into confusion, and driven from the ground with great slaughter. Howard and Washington pressed the advantage which they had respectively gained, until the artillery and a great part of the infantry had surrendered.† Seldom has a victory, achieved by so small a number, been so important in its consequences. It deprived Cornwallis of one fifth of his force, and disconcerted his plans for the reduction of North Carolina. He sought, however, to repair, by active exertions, the loss which he had suffered, and determined, if possible, to intercept Morgan, and compel him to restore the trophies of his victory. This resolution led to a military race, which may be, without exaggeration, termed

* The following instance will illustrate the horrible spirit of these times:—"In the hour of festivity, one Brown had indulged himself in indiscreet censure of the revolutionary party. He had done worse,—he had committed a fault less easily forgiven,—he had ridiculed them. Being apprised that their resentment was excited, he attempted to escape; but he was closely pursued, brought back to Augusta, tried before a committee of surveillance, and sentenced to be tarred and feathered and carted, unless he recanted, and took the oath of allegiance prescribed by the administration of Georgia. Brown was a firm man, and resisted with a pertinacity that should have commanded the respect of his persecutors. But the motions of a mob are too precipitate to admit of the intrusion of generous feeling. After undergoing the painful and mortifying penance prescribed by the committee without yielding, it is too true that he was doomed to have his naked feet exposed to a large fire, to subdue his stubborn spirit: but in vain; and he was at length turned loose by a group of men who never once dreamed that the simple Indian trader would soon reappear an armed and implacable enemy. He first visited the loyalists of Ninety Six, concerted his measures with them, then made his way to St. Augustine, received a colonel's commission, placed himself at the head of a band of desperate refugees, and accompanied Provost in his irruption into Georgia. His thirst for revenge appeared afterward insatiable, and besides wantonly hanging many of his prisoners, he subjected the families of the whigs who were out in service to accumulated sufferings and distress. It was not long after he was left in command at Augusta by the British general, that Colonel Clarke, with a determined party of the militia, whose families he had persecuted, aimed a well-directed blow at his post. But Brown proved himself a man of bravery and conduct, and he well knew that at all times he was fighting for his life. After a severe and partially successful contest, the approach of a party of Indians obliged Clarke to retreat, and leave his wounded behind him, with a letter addressed to Brown, requesting that he would parole them to their plantations. But Brown's thirst for revenge knew no bounds. It had been irritated in this instance by a wound which confined him to his bed. The unhappy prisoners, twenty-eight in number, were all hung; thirteen of them were suspended to the railing of the staircase, that he might feast his eyes with their dying agonies."—Johnson's Life of General Greene.

† Upwards of three hundred of the British were killed or wounded, and above five hundred taken prisoners; eight hundred muskets, two field pieces, two standards, thirty-five baggage wagons, and one hundred dragoon horses, fell into the hands of the conquerors. Of the Americans, twelve men only were killed, and sixty wounded. Congress, in honour of the good conduct of General Morgan, presented him a gold medal; to Lieutenant-Colonels Washington and Howard, medals of silver; and to Colonel Pickens, a sword.

one of the most celebrated in history. Each army strove to precede the other at the fords of the Catawba, from which both were equally distant. The American troops endured almost incredible hardships, being sometimes without meat, often without flour, and entirely destitute of spirituous liquors. A large portion of the troops were without shoes, and, marching over frozen ground, marked with blood every step of their progress. On the twelfth day after the engagement, Morgan reached the fords and crossed the Catawba; and two hours afterwards Cornwallis arrived, and, it being then dark, encamped on the bank. During the night, a heavy fall of rain made the river impassable, which gave Morgan an opportunity to remove the prisoners beyond the reach of his pursuer.

The movements of the royal army induced General Greene immediately to retreat from Hick's Creek; and, leaving the main army under the command of General Huger, he rode a hundred and fifty miles through the country to join the detachment under General Morgan, that he might be in front of Lord Cornwallis, and so direct both divisions of his army as to form a speedy junction between them. Lord Cornwallis, after three days' delay, effected the passage of the Catawba, and recommenced the pursuit. The Americans, continuing their expeditious movements, crossed the Yadkin on the 3d of February, and secured their boats on the north side; but the British, though close in their rear, were incapable of crossing it through the rapid rising of the river from preceding rains, and the want of boats. This second remarkable escape confirmed the impression on the minds of the Americans, that their cause was favoured by Divine Providence. After a junction of the two divisions of the American army at Guilford court-house, it was concluded, in a council of officers called by General Greene, that he ought to retire over the Dan, and to avoid an engagement until he should be re-enforced. Lord Cornwallis kept the upper countries, where only the rivers are fordable, and attempted to get between General Greene and Virginia, to cut off his retreat, and oblige him to fight under many disadvantages; but the American general completely eluded him. So urgent was the pursuit of the British, that, on the 14th of February, the American light troops were compelled to retire above forty miles; and on that day General Greene, by indefatigable exertions, transported his army over the Dan into Virginia. Here again the pursuit was so close, that the van of the British just arrived as the rear of the Americans had crossed. The continental army being now driven out of North Carolina, Earl Cornwallis left the Dan, and proceeded to Hillsborough, where he set up the royal standard. Greene, perceiving the necessity of some spirited measure to counteract his lordship's influence on the inhabitants of the country, concluded, at every hazard, to recross the Dan. After manœuvring in a very masterly manner to avoid an action with Cornwallis three weeks, his army was joined by two brigades of militia from North Carolina, and one from Virginia, and also by four hundred regulars. This re-enforcement giving him a superiority of numbers, he determined no longer to avoid an engagement, and, on the 15th of March, he accepted battle; but at the first fire the North Carolina militia, who were in the front line, fled; the second line was also routed. The continentals, who composed the third, fought with their usual bravery, and for an hour and a half maintained the conflict with great firmness. They at length gave way, but retreated in good order; the slaughter they had made in the enemy's ranks preventing pursuit. The victory, won by a far inferior force, was more glorious than advantageous to the British army. Soon after the action, Lord Cornwallis began a march toward Wilmington. General Greene, on receiving intelligence of this movement, put his army in motion to follow him, and continued the pursuit to Ramsay's Mill, on Deep River. Cornwallis, having halted and refreshed his men about three weeks at Wilmington, marched across the country to Petersburg, in Virginia.

Before General Greene was aware that Lord Cornwallis intended to enter Virginia, he had formed the bold resolution of returning into South Carolina. Marching towards Camden, where nine hundred men, under the command of Lord Rawdon, were posted, he took a position on Hobkirk's-hill, about a mile from the British entrenchments. Here the Americans were attacked on 25th of April. In the beginning of the action their bravery gained advantages which, in its progress, were lost by the premature retreat of two companies, occasioned by the death of their officers. At this reverse of fortune, Greene retired a few miles from the field, both armies having sustained nearly an equal loss.

Several British posts in South Carolina speedily fell into the power of the brave and active partisans, who, with small bodies of troops, were ever present where oppression was to be resisted or glory won. Marion and Lee invested and took Fort Watson. Orangeburgh and Fort Motte surrendered to Sumpter. Lee captured Fort Granby, and Marion drove from Georgetown the troops stationed to defend it. Immediately after the surrender of Fort Granby, Lieutenant-Colonel Lee marched to Augusta, and joined Brigadier-General Pickens, who, with a body of militia, had some time before taken post in the vicinity; and these two able officers jointly carried on their approaches against Fort Cornwallis. Two batteries were erected within thirty yards of the parapet which overlooked the fort; and from them the American riflemen shot into the inside of the works with effect. The garrison almost entirely burying themselves underground, obstinately refused to capitulate until resistance became useless, and then the fort, with about three hundred men, surrendered on honourable terms of capitulation. The Americans, during the siege, had about forty men killed and wounded. On the 22d of May, General Greene laid siege to Ninety-Six, which was defended by Lieutenant-Colonel Cruger with upwards of five hundred men. The works of the besiegers were carried forward with indefatigable industry and success until the 18th of June,* when, on intelligence of the approach of Lord Rawdon for the relief of the place, it was concluded to attempt its reduction by assault. The assailants displayed great resolution; but, failing of success, General Greene raised the siege, and retreated over the Saluda.

Lord Rawdon having returned to England, the command of the British troops in South Carolina devolved upon Lieutenant-Colonel Stewart; who, in the beginning of September, took post at Eutaw Springs. General Greene marched against him from the hills of Santee. The rival forces were equal, amounting on each side to two thousand men. On the 8th an attack was made by the Americans; a part of the British line, consisting of new troops, broke, and fled; but the veteran corps received the charge of the assailants on the points of their bayonets. The hostile ranks were for a time intermingled, and the officers fought hand to hand; but Lieutenant-Colonel Lee, who had turned the British left flank, charging them at this instant in the rear, their line was soon completely broken, and driven off the field. They were vigorously pursued by the Americans, who took upwards of five hundred of them prisoners. The British, on their retreat, took post in a large three-story brick house, and in a picketed garden; and from these advantageous positions renewed the action. Four six-pounders were ordered up before the house; but the Americans were compelled to leave these pieces and retire. They formed again at a small distance in the woods; but General Greene, thinking it inexpedient to renew the desperate attempt, left a strong picket on the field of battle, and retired with his prisoners to the ground from which he had marched in the morning. In the evening of the next day, Lieutenant-Colonel Stewart, leaving seventy of his wounded men, and one thousand stand of arms, moved from Eutaw towards Charleston. The loss of the British, inclusive of prisoners, was supposed to be not less than eleven hundred men. The loss of the Americans, in killed, wounded, and missing, was about half that number. This battle was attended by consequences very advantageous to the Americans, and may be considered as closing the revolutionary war in South Carolina.*

* Congress passed a vote of thanks to every corps in the army, and a resolution for presenting to Major-General Greene, "as an honourable testimony of his merit, a British standard, and a golden medal emblematic of the battle and of his victory."

Most votaries of fame earn their honours by long and painful labours, in whatever walk of life they select to seek them. The orator has no permanent reputation, until he has secured it by appearing frequently before his fellow-citizens, and proving his claims to distinction by many vigorous efforts of intellectual superiority. Nor does a judge on the bench obtain a character for wisdom until he has trimmed the midnight lamp for many years; and even most warriors do not gain distinction and promotion, until gray hairs peer from under their helmets, in contrast to their sun-burnt faces. But there are exceptions to this rule, for sometimes a hero starts into life at once. The subject of this memoir was one of these brilliant exceptions. He was hardly known twenty miles from his native state, when he was seen marching into Cambridge, on the sixth of June, 1775, at the head of the Rhode Island troops, with the rank of major-general. He had under him three regiments of brave and effective men, and several excellent officers. The first impression of every one in camp, was favourable to the unknown Rhode Island general; and when Washington arrived, the next month, to take command of the army, the sagacious citizen-soldiers united the names of Washington and Greene together, as fit leaders of the brave, and they are never to be separated. Washington had been known as a warrior; he had gained imperishable laurels when Braddock fell at Monongahela; but Greene "had never set a squadron in the field;" nor had his name been heard of in the halls of congress; but the sagacious statesmen of Rhode Island did know him. They had watched him from the cradle, and to inquiries made at the time, who is General Greene? were ready with an answer:—He is the son of one of the society of Friends; was born at Warwick, on the 22d day of May, 1742; his father was a blacksmith, engaged in making anchors and heavy iron work for ships, forges, &c.; his education was scanty in childhood, but he was well instructed in moral duties; he early felt his want of information, and set about self-instruction; he had a strong mind, and soon made rapid acquisitions in the fields of science and letters. He was particularly fond of military history, and the biography of heroes; his military ardour was kindled up in poring over the pages of Plutarch, and, Quaker as he was, he loved to dwell upon the deeds of the great men of antiquity, more than upon those around him. He saw that the winds were up, and that the storm of revolutionary war was gathering, and he sat about preparing himself to be useful. He read constitutional and common law sufficiently to understand the great principles of the rights of man, and the duties of nations. His own state had been vexed with fewer restraints than other colonies under Great Britain. The soul of Roger Williams, the founder of it, had not departed from among his sons; they were brave, but had not much military skill to aid them. Greene studied military science, and this he found easy, as he had made considerable progress in mathematics and geometry; and, at the same time, the manual exercise became familiar to him by frequent practice. In 1770, he was sent to the legislature of the state, and soon became distinguished in that body for his good sense and intrepid spirit. The Boston massacre had taken place, and every soul was roused with a spirit of resentment. In no bosom did it burn with more intensity than in the heart of

Brilliant as were the successes of General Greene in the Carolinas, it was in Virginia that the last great stroke in favour of American independence was to be effected. In spite of the pacific sentiments of the religious order to which he belonged, in opposition to parental influence, he came forward and enrolled himself as a private in a military corps, called the KENTISH GUARDS. In this body he was a model of obedience to orders, and attention to duties; all eyes were turned on him, and his fellow-citizens marked him out for some high calling, and their affection for him was not diminished, but perhaps increased, when they knew he was read out of the pale of his order for taking up arms.

After the battle of Lexington, on the 19th of April, 1775, Rhode Island raised three regiments of soldiers, and by common consent put Greene at their head, and sent them to the general camp at Cambridge, in the vicinity of Boston.

While with Washington, in the anxious summer, autumn, and winter of 1775-6, when the American army were besieging the British in Boston, the merits of General Greene became known to the commander in chief, and he persuaded Greene to accept of a brigadier-general's commission in the continental army, the highest grade he could at that time offer him, but with a promise of promotion as soon as possible; this was accepted, and he was made a major-general on the 26th of August, 1776.

When the American army followed the enemy to New York, after the evacuation of Boston, the forces encamped partly in New York and partly on Long Island. The division upon the island was under the command of Greene, but he was severely ill when the unfortunate battle was fought there, and the command had devolved on the brave Sullivan.

Greene was with Washington when he crossed the Delaware, on the night of the 26th of December, 1776, and made an attack on the Hessians at Trenton, on the morning of that day. With signal success, Greene commanded the left wing of the army, and was the first to enter the town. He was with Washington at Princeton, and shared in the honours of that day. This was a bold and masterly manœuvre, which raised the sinking spirits of the nation, and stamped our commanders with the reputation of consummate soldiers abroad, and made Britain think that our leaders were not merely rebel braves, but sagacious generals.

Greene was also at the battle of Brandywine, and covered the retreat. The next month he commanded the left wing at the battle of Germantown, and his were the only troops who did all that was expected of them, in that battle. His reputation was raised by that day's conduct. He was next sent to prevent Cornwallis from getting supplies in the Jerseys; but Washington, finding that the enemy had received re-enforcements, recalled him.

The next spring, Greene was induced to accept the appointment of quarter-master-general of the army, as the whole commissariat was out of joint for want of resources, and from the irregularity of the aids afforded. His acceptance was on condition of having two assistants, and of retaining his rank in the line, and the right to resume his command in time of action.

In the month of June, 1777, he led the right wing at the battle of Monmouth, and mainly contributed to the partial success of the American army on that day.

From this battle ground he was sent to join General Sullivan at Newport, Rhode Island, who, with Count D'Estaing, was preparing to attack the English, then in possession of that place. The enterprise failed, but not for the want of American bravery, for that was sufficiently conspicuous. Greene covered the retreat of the army with a much smaller number than he had to oppose. The next place of his command was at Springfield, in the Jerseys, when he was attacked by Sir Henry Clinton, one of the greatest captains of the day. The Americans behaved with great bravery, and the enemy was repulsed.

After the defection of Arnold, Greene was appointed to the command of West Point; but he was there but a few days, when he was ordered to the command of the southern army. He was now the master of his own actions, in a great measure; or, at least, was chiefly to depend upon his own resources, and was personally responsible for all he did. Here the great powers of his indomitable soul were developed; here he displayed the talents of a consummate general. He arrived at Charlotte on the 2d of December, 1780, with the gallant Morgan, who had greatly distinguished himself in the battles which led to the capture of Burgoyne, and which gave the death blow to British power in the north. The southern army was a mere skeleton, with only skin and sinews sufficient to hold it together. The men were without supplies, and there was no chance of immediate relief. The British army was well equipped and well fed; but their officers committed a great error in supposing the southern country prostrated and conquered, because they could not find any forces to meet them. The fires of patriotism seemed quenched, when they were only concealed; and they found them, to their cost, bursting out in every quarter. Cornwallis at length saw that the influence of royalty was waning, while that of patriotism was increasing, and he was determined on striking a blow, and crushing the American forces at once; for this purpose he sent his gallant master of the horse, Tarleton, to destroy that part of the American army under General Morgan. Tarleton had a thousand men, of the flower of the British troops, when he was sent to give an account of Morgan and his men. The attack was made on the American forces at the Cowpens, on the 17th of January, 1781. The battle was severe, and the British were beaten, with considerable loss of lives. Five hundred of the enemy laid down their arms, and were made prisoners; eight hundred stand of arms, two field pieces, and thirty-five baggage wagons, were the spoils from the enemy to the victors; while the loss on the part of the Americans was very trifling, only twelve killed, and sixty wounded. This brilliant affair raised the drooping spirits of the south, and disconcerted all the magnificent plans of Cornwallis. He followed Morgan with great spirit, to cover and redeem Tarleton's defeat; but Morgan was too rapid for him, having formed a junction with the main army before Cornwallis could overtake him. The southern army was still inferior to the British, and was obliged to make a northward movement.

In the beginning of March, Greene effected a junction with a continental regiment, and two bodies of Virginia and Carolina militia. He was now determined to give the enemy a proof of his spirit, knowing that, if fortune should prove kind, the enemy would be injured; but if he was beaten, that he should recover, as he was gaining strength every day. In this battle, a part of the militia fled as cowards, while other portions of them behaved well; so it will happen in every army. The victory was in favour of the British; but it was a dear one to them, they having lost more men than the American army. This battle crippled Cornwallis, and he was obliged to return to Wilmington, two hundred miles from the scene of action.

Soon after this battle of Guilford court-house, General Greene resolved to return to South Carolina, and to expel, if possible, the British from that state. His first object was to attempt the reduction of Camden, where Lord Rawdon was posted, with nine hundred men. With the small force Greene had, he did not think it prudent to attack Lord Rawdon, but encamped near him, and endeavoured to cut off his supplies. Rawdon bravely sallied out, and attacked Greene, and so vigorously as to compel him to retreat; but he lost more men in the attack than Greene did in the defence, and reaped no substantial advantage by his success, for he was soon obliged to retreat in turn, leaving behind him a number of the sick and wounded. The British ascendancy was now very rapidly declining, and most of their forts fell into the hands of the Americans.

On the 22d of May, General Greene set down before Ninety-Six, with the main part of his small army, and carried on the siege so spiritedly, that Rawdon was on the point of surrendering, when a re-enforcement relieved the post, but not before the American general had attempted to carry it by storm. This did not discourage Greene, who declared, at this gloomy moment, that he would recover the country, or die in the attempt. In the following months of July and August, there was some skirmishing between the two armies; but in September following, General Greene, happily suppressed. Deplorably deficient of provisions and supplies, and promised re-enforcements being grievously delayed, Washington still remained undiscouraged, and determined, in conjunction with the French fleet, to resume vigorous operations. New York was the destined point of the combined attack; but the large re-enforcements which had recently arrived there, and other unfavourable circumstances, induced the commander in chief, so late as August, entirely to change the plan of the campaign, and to resolve to attempt the capture of the army of Lord Cornwallis, which had now taken up a position at Yorktown, in Virginia. The defence of West Point, and of the other posts on the Hudson, was committed to General Heath, and a large portion of the troops raised in the northern states was for this service left under his command.

General Washington resolved in person to conduct the Virginia expedition. The troops under Count Rochambeau, and strong detachments from the American army, amounting to more than two thousand men, and consisting of the light infantry, Lamb's ar-

being about two thousand strong, proceeded to attack Colonel Stewart, at Eutaw Springs. This battle was, on the whole, admirably fought, and the result was unequivocally in favour of our army. This broke the power of Cornwallis in the south, and disappointed all the calculations of British statesmen. They were dreaming that, having conquered the south, their forces would soon be able to proceed to the north, and beard the lion in his den. This battle of Eutaw Springs was indeed memorable. According to Greene's account—and who ever doubted his veracity?—he had three hundred men without arms, and a still greater number stark naked, who pushed their bayonets into the bodies of their enemies, as fearlessly as if they themselves had been covered with a coat of mail. No man, of ancient or modern days, ever had greater difficulties to contend with, than General Greene in this campaign; and no one ever met them with greater heroism. "We have (says he) three hundred men without arms, and more than one thousand so naked, that they can be put on duty only in cases of a desperate nature. We have been all winter in want of arms and clothing. The subsistence of the army is wretched, and we are without rum, or any kind of spirits." And at another time he declares, "I have been seven months in the field, without taking off my clothes." Greene himself was astonished at his own situation, and looked forward to contemplate what posterity would say in considering it. "At the battle of Eutaw Springs, (says he,) hundreds of my men were as naked as they were born. Posterity will scarcely believe that the bare loins of many brave men, who carried death into the enemy's ranks at the Eutaw, were galled by their cartouch boxes, while a folded rag, or a tuft of moss, protected the shoulders from sustaining the same injury from the musket. Men of other times will inquire, by what magic was this army kept together? By what supernatural power was it made to fight?"

While amidst these difficulties of the southern campaign, when destitute of every article of subsistence, or nearly so, some murmurings were heard in the camp, and treason was suspected; and the enemy had made their calculations to end the whole campaign at a blow, assisted by treason among the American ranks. Greene struck at the root of the evil, by an energy that astonished both friends and foes. He put his forces in battle-array, brought the accused to a court-martial, executed the offender in face of the army, and quelled the treason at a breath. No one murmured; all were full of admiration at his energetic course; and even the culprit who suffered did not complain; but, in his dying speech, tillery, and several other corps, were destined for it. By the 25th of August the whole body, American and French, had crossed the North River. An intercepted letter of General Washington's, in which he communicated, as the result of a consultation with the French commanders, the design to attack New York, had excited the apprehensions of the British general for the safety of that city. This apprehension was kept alive, and the real object of the Americans concealed, by preparations for an encampment in New Jersey, opposite to Staten Island, by the route of the American army, and other appearances, indicating an intention to besiege New York; and the troops had passed the Delaware, out of reach of annoyance, before Sir Henry suspected their destination. General Washington pressed forward with the utmost expedition, and at Chester he received the important intelligence that Count de Grasse had arrived with his fleet in the Chesapeake, and that the Marquis St. Simon had, with a body of three thousand land forces, joined the Marquis de la Fayette. Having directed the route of his army from the head of the

Colonel Whigglesworth, one of the most accomplished of the great men of that age, a scholar, factor, sea-captain, merchant, and soldier, to whom was familiar the history of ancient and modern times, often observed, that General Greene was the most extraordinary man in the American army, or that he had ever met with in his travels, and he had seen much of the world. "He had," said that shrewd observer of man, "the caution of Fabius, and the energy of Julius Cesar. He rose from disaster as fresh as if he had gained a victory, always cool, scientific, and prompt; no officer ever said Greene has made a mistake, but every one gave him credit for almost supernatural sagacity, precisely when it was wanted."

This great commander had fought all his battles, and filled up the measure of his military glory, before he had finished his fortieth year—younger than Nelson, when he fell at Trafalgar, in the arms of victory; or Sir John Moore, when he was "left alone in his glory," in the ramparts of Corunna. He combined the physical courage of the former, and his prescience of events, with the high feelings and moral daring of the latter, and his labours were more difficult than those of either.

Historians of no ordinary renown in the literary world, have arisen to narrate his deeds, and praise his virtues; but this is not all: there is a feeling of admiration and gratitude in the hearts of his countrymen, at the mention of his name, which is beyond the pen of the biographer, or the muse of the epic bard. It is a lambent flame of the heart, which was kindled up in those days of lofty feeling and patriotic ardour, which has descended to us as an heir-loom of the affections, from our father's bosoms, and will go down, in all its purity, to the remotest posterity. Not to us and our posterity only, will his name be dear, but to the general reader of history, who will as intimately connect this warrior's name with prudence, bravery, decision of character, and every soldierly attribute and manly virtue, as justice now is with the name of ARISTIDES.

"Oh! who shall lightly say that FAME
Is nothing but an empty name!
When memory of the mighty dead,
To earth-worn pilgrim's wistful eye
The brightest rays of cheering shed,
That point to immortality." American Editor.

Elk, he, accompanied by Rochambeau, Chatelleux, Du Portail, and Knox, proceeded to Virginia. They reached Williamsburg on the 14th of September, and immediately repaired on board the Ville de Paris, to settle with Count de Grasse the plan of operations. The whole body of American and French troops reached Williamsburg by the 25th of September. At this place the allied forces were joined by a detachment of the militia of Virginia, under the command of Governor Nelson, and preparations were soon made to attack the intrenchments of Lord Cornwallis.

Yorktown, the head-quarters of Lord Cornwallis, is a village on the south side of York River, the southern banks of which are high, and where ships of the line may ride in safety. Gloucester Point is a piece of land on the opposite shore, projecting considerably into the river. Both these posts were occupied by the British; and a communication between them was commanded by their batteries, and by several ships of war. The main body of Lord Cornwallis's army was encamped on the open grounds about Yorktown, within a range of outer redoubts and field-works; and Lieutenant-Colonel Tarleton, with a detachment of six or seven hundred men, held the post at Gloucester Point.

The legion of the Duke de Lauzun, and a brigade of militia under General Weedon, the whole commanded by the French general De Choise, were directed to watch and restrain the enemy on the side of Gloucester; and the grand combined army, on the 30th of September, moved down to the investiture of Yorktown. On the night of the 6th of October, advancing to within six hundred yards of the English lines, they began their first parallel, and laboured with such silence and diligence, that they were not discovered until morning, when the works they had raised were sufficient to protect them. On the 9th, several batteries being completed, a heavy cannonade was begun. Many of the British guns were dismounted, and portions of their fortifications laid level with the ground. On the night of the 11th, the besiegers commenced their second parallel, three hundred yards in advance of the first. This approach was made so much sooner than was expected, that the men were not discovered at their labour until they had rendered themselves secure from all molestation in front. The fire from the new batteries was still more furious and destructive. From two British redoubts, in advance of their main works, and flanking those of the besiegers, the men in the trenches were so severely annoyed, that Washington resolved to storm them. The enterprise against one was committed to an American force under the Marquis de la Fayette, that against the other to a French detachment. Colonel Hamilton, who led the van of the former, made such an impetuous attack, that possession was soon obtained, with little slaughter. The French detachment was equally brave and successful, but sustained greater loss. On the 16th, a sortie was made from the garrison by a party of three hundred and fifty, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Abercrombie, who forced two batteries, and spiked eleven pieces of cannon; but the guards from the trenches immediately advancing on them, they retreated, and the pieces which they had hastily spiked were soon rendered fit for service. In the afternoon of the same day the besiegers opened several batteries in their second parallel; and in the whole line of batteries nearly one hundred pieces of heavy ordnance were now mounted. The works of the besieged were so universally in ruins as to be in no condition to sustain the fire which might be expected the next day. In this extremity, Lord Cornwallis boldly resolved to attempt an escape by land with the greater part of his army. His plan was to cross over, in the night, to Gloucester Point, and forcing his way through the troops under De Choise, to pass through Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Jersey, and form a junction with the royal army at New York. In prosecution of this desperate design, one embarkation of his troops crossed over to the opposite point; but a violent storm of wind and rain dispersed the boats, and frustrated the scheme.

On the morning of the 17th the fire of the American batteries rendered the British post untenable. Lord Cornwallis, perceiving further resistance to be unavailing, about ten o'clock beat a parley, and proposed a cessation of hostilities for twenty-four hours, that commissioners might meet to settle the terms on which the posts of York and Gloucester should be surrendered. General Washington, in his answer, declared his "ardent desire to spare the effusion of blood, and his readiness to listen to such terms as were admissible;" but to prevent loss of time, he desired "that, previous to the meeting of the commissioners, the proposals of his lordship might be transmitted in writing, for which purpose a suspension of hostilities for two hours should be granted." The terms proposed by his lordship were such as led the general to suppose that articles of capitulation might easily be adjusted, and he continued the cessation of hostilities until the next day. To expedite the business, he summarily stated the terms he was willing to grant, and informed Earl Cornwallis, that if he admitted these as the basis of a treaty, commissioners might meet to put them into form. Accordingly, Viscount de Noailles and Lieutenant-Colonel Laurens, on the part of the allies, and Colonel Dundas and Major Ross, on the part of the English, met the next day, and adjusted articles of capitulation, which were to be submitted to the consideration of the British general. Resolving not to expose himself to any accident that might be the consequence of unnecessary delay, General Washington ordered the rough draft of the commissioners to be fairly transcribed, and sent to Lord Cornwallis early next morning, with a letter expressing his expectation that the garrison would march out by two o'clock in the afternoon. Hopeless of more favourable terms, his lordship signed the capitulation, and surrendered the posts of York and Gloucester, with their garrisons, to General Washington; and the shipping in the harbour, with the seamen, to Count de Grasse. The prisoners, exclusive of seamen, amounted to more than seven thousand, of which between four and five thousand only were fit for duty. The garrison lost, during the siege, six officers and five hundred and forty-eight privates in killed and wounded. The privates, with a competent number of officers, were to remain in Virginia, Maryland, or Pennsylvania. The officers not required for this service were permitted on parole to return to Europe, or to any of the maritime posts of the English on the American continent. The terms granted to Earl Cornwallis were, in general, the terms which had been granted to the Americans at the surrender of Charleston; and General Lincoln, who on that occasion resigned his sword to Lord Cornwallis, was appointed to receive the submission of the royal army. The allied army, to which Lord Cornwallis surrendered, amounted to sixteen thousand; seven thousand French, five thousand five hundred continental troops, and three thousand five hundred militia. In the course of the siege they lost, in killed and wounded, about three hundred. The siege was prosecuted with so much military judgment and ardour, that the treaty was opened on the eleventh, and the capitulation signed on the thirteenth day after ground was broken before the British lines.*

The capture of so large a British army excited universal joy, and on no occasion during the war did the Americans manifest greater exultation. From the nature and duration of the contest, the affections of many had been so concentrated upon their country, and so intense was their interest in its fate, that the news of this brilliant success produced the most rapturous emotions, under the operations of which, it is said, some were even deprived of their reason, and one aged patriot in Philadelphia expired. The day after the capitulation, General Washington ordered, "that those who were under arrest should be pardoned and set at liberty;" and announced, that "Divine service shall be performed to-morrow in the different brigades and divisions. The commander in chief recommends, that all the troops that are not upon duty do assist at it with a serious deportment, and that sensibility of heart which the recollection of the surprising and particular interposition of Providence in our favour claims." Congress, as soon as they received General Washington's official letter giving information of the event, resolved to go in procession to the Dutch Lutheran church, and return thanks to Almighty God for the signal success of the American arms; and they issued a proclamation, recommending to the citizens of the United States to observe the 13th of December as a day of public thanksgiving and prayer.

While these successful operations had been carrying on in Virginia, Sir Henry Clinton endeavoured, if possible, to recall Washington, or at least to divert his attention, by some daring enterprise in the north. Giving to the traitor Arnold, who had just returned from his destructive expedition to Virginia, the command of a strong detachment, he sent him against New London, a flourishing city situated upon the river Thames, in his native state. Nearly opposite, on a hill in Groton, stood Fort Griswold, which was then garrisoned by militia, hastily summoned from their labours in the field. Against this fort Arnold despatched a part of his troops. It was assaulted on three sides at the same moment. The garrison, fighting in view of their property and their homes, made a brave and obstinate resistance. By their steady and well-directed fire many of the assailants were killed. Pressing forward with persevering ardour, the British entered the fort through the embrasures. Immediately all resistance ceased. Irritated by gallantry which should have caused admiration, a British officer inquired who commanded the fort. "I did," said Colonel Ledyard, "but you do now;" and presented him his sword. He seized it, and, with savage cruelty, plunged it into his bosom. This was the signal for an indiscriminate massacre. Of a hundred and sixty men, composing the garrison,

* Congress, on receiving intelligence of this important victory, passed resolutions, returning the thanks of the United States to the commander in chief, to the Count De Rochambeau, to the Count De Grasse, and to the officers of the different corps, and the men under them. It was also resolved, that a marble column should be erected at Yorktown, with emblems of the alliance between the United States and his most Christian Majesty, and inscribed with a succinct narrative of the surrender of Earl Cornwallis.

all but forty were killed or wounded, and most of them after resistance had ceased. Seldom has the glory of victory been tarnished by such detestable barbarity. The British then entered New London, which was set on fire and consumed. The property destroyed was of immense value. Perceiving no other object within the reach of his force, Arnold led back his troops to New York.

A circumstance which evidently exercised a very favourable influence on American affairs during this period should not be omitted—the institution of a national bank. The plan of it was projected by Robert Morris, one of the delegates of Pennsylvania, a man of high reputation, and well versed in affairs of commerce and finance, whom congress had appointed treasurer. He assigned to this bank a capital of four hundred thousand dollars, divided in shares of four hundred dollars each, in money of gold or silver, to be procured by subscriptions. Twelve directors were to manage the bank, which was denominated by congress, “The President, Directors, and Company of the Bank of North America.” To the financial skill and indefatigable efforts of Mr. Morris in the treasury department, it has been thought his country was scarcely less indebted, than to the valour of her soldiers, and the wisdom of her statesmen. Under his auspices, public credit revived; the army was pacified; and a new impulse given to every operation in the field and the cabinet.

During this fortunate year also the compact of the confederation was rendered complete. Much difficulty had been experienced in obtaining its ratification. Various and sometimes conflicting amendments had been proposed by the states respectively; but they had successively yielded to the opinion that a federal compact would be of vast importance in the prosecution of the war. One of the greatest impediments had hitherto been, that within the chartered limits of several states there were immense tracts of vacant territory, which, it was supposed, would constitute a large fund of future wealth; and the states not possessed of this advantage insisted on considering this territory as a joint acquisition, to be applied to the common benefit. The cession made by Virginia, the preceding year, of its north-west territory, was now accepted by congress, and, to the great joy of America, the confederation was completed.*

The result of the last campaign convinced the British nation that America could not be subdued by force; and led to a change of administration and pacific overtures. Parliament met on the 27th of November, 1781; and though the speech from the throne still breathed a spirit of hostility, and answers from both houses were procured in accordance with it, yet not long after the recess, the ministers found themselves in a minority in the house of commons. On the 22d of February, 1782, General Conway moved an address to the king, praying, “that the war on the continent of North America might no longer be pursued for the impracticable purpose of reducing that country to obedience by force; and expressing their hope, that the earnest desire and diligent exertion to restore the public tranquillity, of which they had received his majesty’s most gracious assurances, might, by a happy reconciliation with the revolted colonies, be forwarded and made effectual; to which great end his majesty’s faithful commons would be ready to give their utmost assistance.” This motion being lost by a single vote only, was, five days after, renewed, by the same gentleman, in a form somewhat different, and was carried; and an address in pursuance of it presented to the king. Not yet satisfied with the triumph obtained over the ministry, and considering the answer of the king not sufficiently explicit, the house of commons, on the 4th of March, on the motion of General Conway, declared, that all those who should advise, or by any means attempt, the farther prosecution of offensive war in America, should be considered as enemies to their king and country. In this state of things it was impossible for the ministry longer to continue in power, and on the 19th they relinquished their places. A new administration was soon after formed—the Marquis of Rockingham was placed at the head of the treasury, and the Earl of Shelburne and Mr. Fox held the important places of secretaries of state.

Soon after their appointment, the new ministers sent a Mr. Oswald to France, to sound the French court, as well as Dr. Franklin, on the subject of peace. In a conference with the Count de Vergennes, Mr. Oswald was informed that the French court were disposed to treat for peace, but could do nothing without the consent of their allies; and the count expressed a wish that Paris might be the place of meeting for entering upon this important business. About the 18th of April the British agent went back to London, and on the 4th of May returned to France with the assent of the British cabinet to treat of a general peace, and for that purpose to meet at Paris.

One of the first measures of the new administration, was to appoint Sir Guy Carlton commander in chief in America, in the room of Sir Henry Clinton, and to authorize Admiral Digby and himself to treat for peace. One object of conferring this power was to induce congress to agree to a separate treaty. Sir Guy Carlton arrived in America on the 5th of May, and two days afterwards informed General Washington that he and Admiral Digby were authorized to treat for peace, and requested a passport for their secretary, as the bearer of despatches to congress on the subject. A copy of this letter was forwarded by the general to that body; but the members being determined not to negotiate without their allies, refused the passport. The same commissioners, on the 2d of August following, sent a second letter to the American commander, informing him that negotiations for a general peace had commenced at Paris, and that Mr. Grenville had full powers to treat with all the parties at war, and that, by his instructions, "the independency of the thirteen provinces was to be pro-

* One of the reasons assigned by Mr. Fox for his resignation, was, that the cabinet, under the influence of Lord Shelburne, had departed from the principles adopted by the preceding administration, on the great question of American independence. In vindication of himself, Lord Shelburne, early in July, declared in parliament, that he had been, and yet was of opinion, that whenever parliament should acknowledge the independence of America, the sun of England's glory was set for ever. Such, he said, were the sentiments he possessed on a former day, and such were the sentiments he still held. That other noble lords thought differently; and as the majority of the cabinet supported them, he acquiesced in the measure, dissenting from the idea; and the point was settled to bring the matter before parliament. That if independence were to be granted, he foresaw, in his own mind, that England was undone. He wished to God, he declared, that he had been deputed to the congress, that he might plead the cause of that country, as well as of this; and that he might exercise whatever powers he possessed, as an orator,* to save both from ruin, by bringing the congress to a conviction, that, if their independence was signed, their liberties were gone for ever. This declaration of the prime minister, after the statements made by Mr. Grenville and Sir Guy Carlton on the subject of American independence, as before mentioned, excited no little astonishment in France, as well as in America.

It was supposed, that, with a view of attempting some arrangement agreeable to his wishes, Lord Shelburne contemplated sending Mr. Jones, afterwards Sir William Jones, to America. Certain it is, that about the last of June, Mr. Jones, in company with a gentleman by the name of Paradise, went to Paris; and it was publicly given out, they were on their way to America, on business of a private nature; Mr. Paradise, to recover an estate belonging to him, and Mr. Jones as his counsel. While at Paris, the latter frequently saw and conversed with Dr. Franklin and Mr. Jay, and as a matter of curiosity, presented to the former, with whom he had been acquainted in England, what he called "a fragment of Polybius, from his treatise on the Athenian government." He took this singular mode, no doubt, of sounding the American commissioners, on the great question of peace: and no one can read this supposed fragment of a celebrated ancient historian, purporting to give a brief account of a contest between Athens and her colonies, without being satisfied as to its real object.

"Athens," says this fragment, "had long been an object of universal admiration, and consequently of envy; her navy was invincible, her commerce extensive; Europe and Asia supplied her with wealth; of her citizens, all were intrepid, many virtuous; but some too much infected with principles unfavourable to freedom. Hence an oligarchy was, in a great measure, established; crooked counsels were thought supreme wisdom; and the Athenians having lost their true relish for their own freedom, began to attack that of their colonies, and of the states which they had before protected! Their arrogant claims of unlimited dominion, had compelled the Chians, posed by him, in the first instance, instead of being made a condition of a general treaty."

A majority of the new British cabinet very early determined to offer America unlimited unconditional independence, as the basis of a negotiation for peace, and so instructed their minister, Mr. Grenville. This was a favourite measure with the Marquis of Rockingham; on this point, however, the cabinet was divided. The Earl of Shelburne, though he acquiesced, was still opposed, and it was one of the last measures to which the king would assent. The illness of the Marquis of Rockingham, and his death, which happened on the 1st of July, produced no little delay and difficulty in the negotiations. The appointment of Lord Shelburne as first lord of the treasury produced an open rupture in the cabinet.*

Coans, Rhodians, Lesbians, to join with nine other small communities in the social war, which they began with inconceivable ardour, and continued with industry surpassing all example, and almost surpassing belief.

"They were openly assisted by Mausoleus, king of Caria, to whose metropolis the united islands had sent a philosopher named Eleutherion, eminent for the deepest knowledge of nature, the most solid judgment, most approved virtue, and most ardent zeal for the cause of general liberty. The war had been supported for three years with infinite exertions and valour on both sides, with deliberate firmness on the part of the allies, and with unabated violence on the part of the Athenians, who had, nevertheless, despatched commissioners to Rhodes, with intent to propose terms of accommodation; but the states (perhaps too pertinaciously) refused to hear any proposal whatever, without a previous recognition of their total independence, by the magistrates and people of Athens. It was not long after this that an Athenian, who had been a pupil of Isaeus, together with Demosthenes, and began to be known in his country as a pleader of causes, was led, by some affair of his clients, to the capital of Caria. He was a man, unauthorized, unemployed, unconnected, independent in his circumstances as much as in his principles; admitting no governor, under providence, but the laws; and no laws, but which justice and virtue had dictated, which wisdom approved, which his country had freely enacted. He had been known at Athens to the sage Eleutherion, and their acquaintance being renewed, he sometimes took occasion, in their conversations, to lament the calamities of war, and to express his eager desire of making a general peace on such terms as would produce the greatest good from the greatest evil; 'for this,' said he, 'would be a work not unworthy the divine attributes, and if mortals could effect it, they would act like those beneficent beings, whom Socrates believed to be the constant friends and attendants of our species.'"

The Athenian, in these conversations, is also represented as endeavouring to persuade Eleutherion not to insist on such terms of peace, as would wound the pride of Athens, without any substantial benefit to the colonies, and particularly not to insist on an express acknowledgment of their independence. "Let the confederates," he said, "be contented with the substance of that independence which they have asserted, and the word will necessarily follow.

"Let them not hurt the natural, and, perhaps, not reprehensible pride of Athens, nor demand any concession, that may sink in the eyes of Greece a nation to whom they are and must be united in language, in blood, in manners, in interest, in principles. Glory is to a nation, what reputation is to an individual; it is not an empty sound, but important and essential. It will be glorious in Athens to acknowledge her error in attempting to reduce the islands; but an acknowledgment of her inability to reduce them (if she be unable) will be too public a confession of weakness, and her rank among the states of Greece will instantly be lowered."

Lord John Cavendish, Mr. Fox, and some others, resigned their places. In consequence of this, William Pitt was made chancellor of the exchequer, and Thomas Townshend and Lord Grantham secretaries of state. There can be little doubt that the king, as well as Lord Shelburne, still entertained a distant

The Athenian declared, that whatever his own advice might be, he knew and positively pronounced, that Athens would never expressly recognise the independence of the islands; that an express acknowledgment of it was merely formal with respect to the allies; but the prejudices of mankind had made it substantial with respect to Athens.

"There is a natural union," he said, "between Athens and the islands which the gods had made, and which the powers of hell could not dissolve. Men, speaking the same idiom, educated in the same manner, perhaps in the same place; professing the same principles; sprung from the same ancestors in no very remote degree; and related to each other in a thousand modes of consanguinity, affinity, and friendship; such men (whatever they may say through a temporary resentment) can never in their hearts consider one another as aliens."

The Athenian then proposed "the general ground work and plan of a treaty," the substance of which was, that the Carians should be included in the pacification on advantageous terms, that the archon, senate, and magistrates of Athens, should make a complete recognition of rights of all the Athenian citizens, of all orders whatever, and all laws for that purpose be combined in one—"there should not be one slave in Attica." That there should be a perfect co-ordination between Athens and the thirteen United Islands; they considering her not as a parent, whom they must obey, but as an elder sister, whom they could not help loving, and to whom they should give pre-eminence of honour and co-equality of power. The new constitutions of the confederate islands to remain. On every occasion requiring acts for the general good, there was to be an assembly of deputies from the senate of Athens and the congress of the islands, who should fairly adjust the whole business, and settle the ratio on both sides; this committee to consist of fifty islanders and fifty Athenians, or of a smaller number chosen by them. A proportionable number of Athenian citizens, if thought necessary, were to have seats, and the power of debating and voting on questions of common concern, in the great assembly of the islands, and a proportionable number of the islanders to sit, with like power, in the assembly at Athens. No obligation to make war, but for the common interest—commerce to flow in a free course, for the general advantages of the united powers, and a universal unlimited amnesty to be proclaimed, in every part of Greece and Asia.

"This," said the ingenious Athenian, "is the rough sketch of a treaty founded on virtue and liberty."

"The idea of it still fills and expands my soul; and if it cannot be realized, I shall not think it less glorious, but shall only grieve more and more at the perverseness of mankind."

"May the Eternal Being, whom the wise and virtuous adore, and whose attribute it is to convert into good, that evil, which his unsearchable wisdom permits, inspire all ranks of men to promote this or a similar plan! If this be impracticable, O human nature! But I am fully confident that if—more at large—happiness of all."

"No more is extant," Mr. Jones added, "of this interesting piece, upon which the commentary of the sage Polybius would have been particularly valuable in these times."

The allusions in this singular and ingenious communication, were too obvious to be misunderstood, and left little doubt on the minds of the American commissioners, that the real object of Mr. Jones, in his visit at Paris, as well as his intended voyage to America, was, if possible, to effect a reconciliation on terms short of an express and open acknowledgment of the independence of America. Mr. Jay was the more confirmed in this, by seeing in a pamphlet put into his hands by Mr. Jones, containing an account of the proceedings of the "Society for constitutional information," a communication made to the society by Mr. Jones himself, in which he an-

hope that some arrangement might be made with the Americans short of an open and express acknowledgment of their independence; and the views of the latter on this point, probably, had no little influence in placing him at the head of the administration.* Parliament adjourned on the 11th of July, nounced his intention of leaving England speedily, "on a mission connected with the interest and welfare of his country."

These suspicions were communicated to congress both by Dr. Franklin and Mr. Jay. In a letter to the secretary of foreign affairs, the latter particularly stated his suspicions with respect to Mr. Jones; and on the 28th of June, Dr. Franklin, in a letter to the same, says, "It looks as if, since their late success in the West Indies, they a little repented of the advances they had made in their declarations respecting the acknowledgment of our independence; and we have good information, that some of the ministry still flatter the king with the hope of recovering his sovereignty over us, on the same terms as are now making with Ireland. However willing we might have been, at the commencement of this contest, to have accepted such conditions, be assured that we can have no safety in them at present."

"There are," he added, "as reported, great divisions in the ministry on other points, as well as this; and those who aim at engrossing the power, flatter the king with this project of re-union; and it is said, have much reliance on the operations of private agents sent into America to dispose minds in favour of it, and to bring about a separate treaty there, with General Carleton."

The noble biographer of Sir William Jones, however, declares, that the object of his intended journey to America was "professional," and that the "surmises and insinuations" circulated to the contrary, were without foundation.

Yet the situation of the British cabinet at that time, the opinion of the Earl of Shelburne on the question of American independence, as declared in parliament, the circumstance that Mr. Jones was his particular friend, and above all, the internal evidence arising from the extraordinary communication made to Dr. Franklin; a communication, novel, indeed, in the annals of diplomacy, but certainly, in its style and manner, well calculated to disclose his supposed object, leave little doubt but that this eminent scholar was requested, by high authority, to sound Dr. Franklin, in a secret manner, as to terms of peace and reconciliation with America, the least wounding to British pride. Nor is it impossible, that Mr. Jones himself alluded to this transaction, in a familiar letter to Lord Althorp, of the 5th of October, 1782, mentioned by his biographer, in which he says, "I know not what * * * * * thinks; but this I know, that the sturdy trans-atlantic yeomanry will neither be dragooned or bamboozled out of their liberty." Whatever might have been the real or ultimate views of Mr. Jones, he returned to England without visiting America. The French court again apprehended that the Americans might be induced to make a separate peace, and on terms short of absolute independence. These apprehensions being communicated to the members of congress, in October, 1782, they resolved to adhere to the treaty of alliance, to conclude neither a separate peace nor truce with Great Britain; and that they would prosecute the war with vigour, until by the blessing of God on the united arms, a peace should be happily accomplished; by which the full and absolute sovereignty and independence of the United States having been duly assured, their rights and interests, as well as those of their allies, should be effectually provided for and secured; and that they would not enter upon the discussion of any overtures of pacification, but in confidence and in concert with his most Christian Majesty.—Pitkin's Political and Civil History, vol. ii. p. 126—132.

* Among the papers of Dr. Franklin was found the following memorandum: "Immediately after the death of Lord Rockingham, the king said to Lord Shelburne, 'I will be plain with you; the point next my heart, and which I am determined, be the consequence what it may, never to relinquish but with my crown and life, is, to prevent a total unequivocal recognition of the independence of America. Promise to support me on this ground, and I will leave

The instructions of congress to the American commissioners not to conclude peace without the consent of France, rendered their situation complicated and embarrassing. There were several questions which the Americans deemed of the first importance, in which the French court either felt no interest, or were opposed to the American claims. The principal of these points referred to the right of fishery on the grand bank, and the western boundary of the United States.* On the latter point, Spain, who was also a party to the negotiations, was extremely desirous of limiting as much as possible the extent of the American territory. These circumstances occasioned much difficulty and considerable delay. At length the American commissioners determined to agree to a provisional treaty without the concurrence of the French court. Mr. Oswald, who had succeeded Mr. Grenville, on the part of the British government, strongly urged the propriety of the American loyalists being compensated for the losses they had incurred during the struggle for independence; but this proposition was met by a counter one from Dr. Franklin, that a similar arrangement should be made by Great Britain in favour of the Americans who had suffered in their property from the destruction carried on by the British troops. This point was therefore ultimately waived, and other difficulties being overcome, a provisional treaty was agreed to on the 30th of November; and after great delay, occasioned by the strenuous endeavours of the court of Madrid to procure the cession of Gibraltar by Great Britain, preliminary treaties of peace were signed on you unmolested on every other ground, and with full power as the prime minister of this kingdom.' The bargain was struck."—Franklin's Works, vol. v. p. 326.

* "The suspicions of the American ministers as to the views of the French court, concerning the fisheries and boundaries, were confirmed by a letter from Barbe de Marbois, charge des affaires in America, a copy of which (the original having been intercepted) was, about this time, put into their hands. The policy, as well as intention of France, as disclosed by this letter, evidently was, that the fisheries and western country should be relinquished by the United States as the price of peace; and Monsieur Marbois hints to Vergennes the propriety of taking early measures to prevent any discontents in America in consequence of such relinquishment. After speaking of the different parties in the United States on these subjects, he says, 'There are some judicious persons to whom one may speak of giving up the fisheries and the [boundaries] of the west, for the sake of peace; but there are enthusiasts who fly out at this idea, and their numbers cannot fail of increasing when, after the English are expelled this continent, the burden of the war will scarce be felt.' In conclusion, he says, 'But it is best to be prepared for any discontent, although it should be temporary. It is remarked by some, that as England has other fisheries besides Newfoundland, she may, perhaps, endeavour that the Americans should partake in that of the grand bank, in order to conciliate their

On the 24th of March, intelligence of a general peace reached America by a letter from the Marquis de la Fayette; and orders were immediately issued recalling all armed vessels cruising under the authority of the United States. Congress soon after received official information of the agreement between the ministers of the United States and Great Britain, and of the exchange of ratifications of the preliminary articles between Great Britain and France; and, on the 11th of April, they issued a proclamation, declaring the cessation of arms, as well by sea as by land, agreed upon between the United States and his Britannic majesty, and enjoining its strict observance. On the 19th of April, peace was proclaimed in the American army by the commander in chief, precisely eight years from the day of the first effusion of blood at Lexington.

The independence of the United States was acknowledged by Sweden, on the 5th of February; by Denmark, on the 25th of February; by Spain, on the 24th of March; and by Russia, in July; treaties of amity and commerce were also concluded with each of those powers. On the 8th of June, General Washington addressed a letter to each of the governors of the several states in the union, on the present situation, and what appeared to him the wisest policy, of the United States. In this paternal and affectionate letter he stated four things which he conceived to be essential to their well-being, and even to their existence, as an independent power: "An indissoluble union of the states under one general head; a sacred regard to public justice; the adoption of a proper peace establish-affections, or procure some compensation, or create a jealousy between them and us. But it does not seem likely that she will act so contrary to her interest; and were she to do it, it will be better to have declared at an early period to the Americans, that their pretension is not founded, and that his majesty does not intend to support it."—Franklin's Works. Pitkin, vol. ii. p. 141.

† When these, with the provisional treaty with America, were laid before parliament in February following, they became the subject of violent debates and severe animadversion. The ministry were accused of sacrificing the interests of their country, by making unnecessary concessions to their enemies. One of the resolutions introduced into the house of commons on the subject, by Lord John Cavendish, was, "That the concessions made to the adversaries of Great Britain, by the provisional treaty and preliminary articles, were greater than they were entitled to, either from the actual situation of their respective possessions, or from their comparative strength." This resolution was carried against the ministry by two hundred and seven to one hundred and ninety. The great object of the majority was, to compel Lord Shelburne and some of his adherents to resign their places. This was effected by the extraordinary coalition of Lord North and Mr. Fox, and their friends. On the 2d of April a new administration was formed, at the head of which was placed the Duke of Portland, and Lord North and Mr. Fox were made secretaries of state.

ment; and the prevalence of that pacific and friendly disposition, among the people of the United States, which will induce them to forget their local prejudices and politics, to make those mutual concessions which are requisite to the general prosperity, and, in some instances, to sacrifice their individual advantages to the interest of the community. These," he added, "are the pillars on which the glorious fabric of our independency and national character must be supported." Having requested that each governor would communicate these sentiments to his legislature at their next meeting, and that they might be considered "as the legacy of one who has ardently wished, on all occasions, to be useful to his country, and who, even in the shade of retirement, will not fail to implore the Divine benediction upon it;" he concluded his letter in language becoming a Christian patriot, and worthy of perpetual remembrance: "I now make it my earnest prayer that God would have you, and the state over which you preside, in his holy protection, that he would incline the hearts of the citizens to cultivate a spirit of subordination and obedience to government; to entertain a brotherly affection and love for one another, for their fellow-citizens of the United States at large, and particularly for their brethren who have served in the field; and, finally, that he would most graciously be pleased to dispose us all to do justice, to love mercy, and to demean ourselves with that charity, humility, and pacific temper of mind, which were the characteristics of the Divine Author of our blessed religion, without an humble imitation of whose example in these things we can never hope to be a happy nation."

The definitive treaty of peace between Great Britain and the United States of America was signed at Paris on the 3d of September, by David Hartley, Esq., on the part of his Britannic majesty, and by John Adams, Benjamin Franklin, and John Jay, on the part of the United States. The provisions of the treaty attest the zeal and ability of the American negotiators, as well as the liberal feelings which actuated the British ministry. The independence of the United States was fully acknowledged. The right of fishing on the banks of Newfoundland, and certain facilities in the enjoyment of that right, were secured to them for ever; and territory was ceded to them more extensive than the most sanguine had dared to anticipate or to hope.*

* An abstract of this memorable document will not be deemed unnecessary in a work like the present. By the first article of this treaty, his Britannic Majesty acknowledges the United States, viz. New Hampshire, Massachusetts Bay, Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, to be free, sovereign, and independent states; that he treats with them as such, and for himself, his heirs, and successors, relinquishes all claims to the government, propriety, and territorial rights of the same, and every part thereof. By the second article, the boundaries of the United States are declared and described from St. Croix, in Nova Scotia, to Canada, by the lakes and the river Mississippi, to East Florida. By the third article, it is agreed, that the people of the United States shall continue to enjoy unmolested the right to take fish of every kind on the grand bank, and on all the other banks of Newfoundland, also in the gulf of St. Lawrence, and at all other places in the sea where the inhabitants of both countries used at any time heretofore to fish; and also that the inhabitants of the United States shall have liberty to take fish of every kind on such part of the coast of Newfoundland as British fishermen shall use, (but not to dry or cure the same on that island;) and also on the coasts, bays, and creeks, of all other of his Britannic Majesty's dominions in America; and that the American fishermen shall have liberty to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbours, and creeks of Nova Scotia, Magdalen islands, and Labrador, so long as the same shall remain unsettled; but so soon as the same or either of them shall be settled, it shall not be lawful for the said fishermen to dry or cure fish at such settlement without a previous agreement for that purpose of the inhabitants, proprietors, or possessors of the ground. By the fourth article, it is agreed, that creditors on either side shall meet with no lawful impediment to the recovery of the full value, in sterling money, of all bona fide debts heretofore contracted. By the fifth article, it is agreed, that the congress shall earnestly recommend it to the legislatures of the respective states, to provide for the restitution of all estates, rights, and properties, which have been confiscated, belonging to real British subjects, and also of the estates, rights, and properties, of persons resident in districts in the possession of his majesty's arms, and who have not borne arms against the United States; and that persons of any other description shall have free liberty to go to any part of parts of any of the thirteen United States, and therein to remain twelve months, unmolested in their endeavours to obtain the restitution of such of their estates, rights, and properties, as may have been confiscated; and that congress shall also earnestly recommend to the several states a reconsideration and revision of all acts or laws regarding the premises, so as to render the said laws or acts perfectly consistent not only with justice and equity, but with that spirit of conciliation which, on the return of the blessings of peace, should universally prevail. And that congress shall also recommend to the several states, that the estates, rights, and properties of such last mentioned persons shall be restored to them, they refunding to any persons who may be now in possession the bona fide price (where any has been given) which such persons may have paid on purchasing any of the said lands, rights, or properties, since the confiscation. And it is agreed that all persons who have any interest in confiscated lands, either by debts, marriage settlements, or otherwise, shall meet with no lawful impediment in the prosecution of their just rights. By the sixth article, it is agreed, that there shall be no future confiscations made, nor any prosecutions commenced against any person or persons, for or by reason of the part which he or they may have taken in the present war; and that no person shall on that account suffer any future loss or damage, either in his person, liberty, or property; and that those who may be in confinement on such charges, at the time of the ratification of the treaty in America, shall be immediately set at liberty, and the prosecution so commenced be discontinued. By the seventh article, it is agreed, that there shall be a firm and perpetual peace between his Britannic Majesty and the said states, and between the subjects of the one and the citizens of the other: wherefore, all hostilities, both by sea and land, shall from henceforth cease; all prisoners on both sides shall be set at liberty; and his Britannic Majesty shall, with all convenient speed, and without causing any destruction, or carrying away any negroes or other property of the American inhabitants, withdraw all his armies, garrisons, and fleets, from the said United States, and from every post, place, and harbour, within the same, leaving in all fortifications the American artillery that may be therein; and shall also order and cause all archives, records, deeds, and papers, belonging to any of the said

While the negotiations were pending, the American troops were retained in service, but remained unemployed at their various stations. They saw with pleasure the end of their toils approaching, but apprehended that their country, when she no longer needed their services, would forget with what zeal and fidelity they had been rendered. The officers, especially, dreaded that, after having, for want of pay, expended their private fortunes, and after having exhausted their strength in the performance of arduous and protracted services, they should be dismissed in poverty, without any secure provision for their future support. In the course of the war, a resolution had been adopted by congress, stipulating that the officers, after being disbanded, should receive half-pay for life. This resolution had never been ratified by the requisite number of states, and no safe reliance could therefore be placed upon it. In December, 1782, the officers forwarded to congress a petition, praying that all arrears which were due to them might be discharged, and that, instead of half-pay for life, a sum equal to five years' full pay should be paid or secured to them when disbanded. The delay of congress to comply with this request produced an alarming agitation in that portion of the army stationed at Newburgh. An address to the officers was privately circulated, written with great ability, and admirably well fitted to work upon those passions which recent sufferings and gloomy forebodings had excited in every bosom. The writer boldly recommended that, as all the applications to the sympathy and justice of congress had failed of success, an appeal should be made to their fears. Fortunately, the commander in chief was in the states or their citizens, which in the course of the war may have fallen into the hands of his officers, to be forthwith restored and delivered to the proper states and persons to whom they belong. By the eighth article, the navigation of the river Mississippi, from its source to the ocean, shall for ever remain free and open to the subjects of Great Britain and the citizens of the United States. By the ninth article, in case it should so happen that any place or territory belonging to Great Britain, or to the United States, should have been conquered by the arms of either from the other, before the arrival of the said provisional articles in America, it is agreed, that the same shall be restored without difficulty, and without requiring any compensation. By the tenth article, the solemn ratifications of the present treaty exhibited in good and due form, shall be exchanged between the contracting parties in the space of six months, or sooner, if possible, to be computed from the day of the signature of the present treaty.

* In America, the approach of peace, combined with other causes, produced a state of things alike interesting and critical. The officers who had wasted their fortunes and their prime of life in unrewarded service, fearing, with reason, that congress possessed neither the power nor the inclination to comply with its engagements to the army, could not look with unconcern at the prospect which was opening to them. In December, soon after going into winter quarters, they presented a petition to congress, respecting the money actually due to them, and proposing a commutation of the half-pay stipulated by the resolutions of October, 1780, for a camp. Though conscious that the officers had just cause of complaint, he was aware that duty to his country, and even friendship for them, required that he should prevent the adoption of rash and disorderly expedients to obtain redress. Calling them together, he, by a calm and sensible address, persuaded them to rely still longer upon the disposition of congress to perform for them whatever the limited means of the nation would permit. In a letter to that body, giving an account of these occurrences, he maintained and enforced the claims of the officers with such pathos and strength of reasoning, that their request was granted.

On the 18th of October, congress issued a proclamation for disbanding the army. This document states, "That, in the progress of an arduous and difficult war, the armies of the United States of America have displayed every military and patriotic virtue, and are not less to be applauded for their fortitude and magnanimity in the most trying scenes of distress, than for a series of heroic and illustrious achievements, which exalt them to high rank among the most zealous and successful defenders of the rights and liberties of mankind; and that, by the blessing of Divine Providence on our cause and our arms, the glorious period is arrived when our national independence and sovereignty are established, and we enjoy the prospect of permanent and honourable peace. The United States, in congress assembled, thus impressed with a lively sense of the distinguished merit, and good conduct of the said armies, do give them the thanks of their country for their long, eminent, and faithful services.* And it is our will and pleasure, that such part of the federal sum in gross, which, they flattered themselves, would encounter fewer prejudices than the half-pay establishment. Some security that the engagements of the government would be complied with was also requested. A committee of officers was deputed to solicit the attention of congress to this memorial, and to attend its progress through the house.

Among the most distinguished members of the federal government, were persons sincerely disposed to do ample justice to the public creditors generally, and to that class of them particularly whose claims were founded in military service. But many viewed the army with jealous eyes, acknowledged its merit with unwillingness, and betrayed, involuntarily, their repugnance to a faithful observance of the public engagements. With this question, another of equal importance was connected, on which congress was divided almost in the same manner. One party was attached to a state, the other to a continental system. The latter laboured to fund the public debts on solid continental security, while the former opposed their whole weight to measures calculated to effect that object.

In consequence of these divisions on points of the deepest interest, the business of the army advanced slowly, and the important question respecting the commutation of their half-pay remained undecided, when intelligence was received of the signature of the preliminary and eventual articles of peace, between the United States and Great Britain.

The officers, soured by their past sufferings, their present wants, and their gloomy prospects—exasperated by the neglect which they experienced, and the injustice which they apprehended, manifested an irritable and uneasy temper, which required only a slight impulse to give it activity. To render this temper the more dangerous, an opinion had been insinuated that the commander in chief was restrained, by extreme delicacy, from supporting their interests with that zeal which his feelings and knowledge of their situation had inspired. Early in March, a letter was received from their committee in Philadelphia, showing that the objects they solicited had not been obtained. On the 10th of that month, an anonymous paper was circulated, requiring a meeting of the general and field officers at the public building on the succeeding day at eleven in the morning; and announcing the expectation that an officer from each company, and a delegate from the medical staff, would attend. The object of the meeting was avowed to be, "to consider the late letter from their representatives in Philadelphia, and what measures (if any) should be adopted to obtain that redress of grievances which they seemed to have solicited in vain."

On the same day an address to the army was privately circulated, which was admirably well calculated to work on the passions of the moment, and to lead to the most desperate resolutions. Full justice can not be done to this eloquent paper without inserting it entire.

"To the officers of the army.

"Gentlemen,

"A fellow soldier, whose interests and affections bend him strongly to you, whose past sufferings have been as great, and whose future fortune may be as desperate as yours, would beg leave to address you.

"Age has its claims, and rank is not without its pretensions, to advise; but though unsupported by both, he flatters himself that the plain language of sincerity and experience will neither be unheard nor unregarded.

"Like many of you, he loved private life, and left it with regret. He left it, determined to retire from the field with the necessity that called him to it, and not until then—not until the enemies of his country, the slaves of power, and the hirelings of injustice, were compelled to abandon their schemes, and acknowledge America as terrible in arms as she had been humble in remonstrance. With this object in view, he has long shared in your toils, and mingled in your dangers. He has felt the cold hand of poverty without a murmur, and has seen the insolence of wealth without a sigh. But too much under the direction of his wishes, and sometimes weak enough to mistake desire for opinion, he has until lately—very lately—believed in the justice of his country. He hoped that, as the clouds of adversity scattered, and as the sunshine of peace and better fortune broke in upon us, the coldness and severity of government would relax, and that more than justice, that gratitude would blaze forth upon those hands which had upheld her in the darkest stages of her passage from impending servitude to acknowledged independence. But faith has its limits, as well as temper, and there are points beyond which neither can be stretched without sinking into cowardice, or plunging into credulity. This, my friends, I conceive to be your situation. Hurried to the very verge of both, another step would ruin you for ever. To be tame and unprovoked when injuries press hard upon you, is more than weakness; but to look up for kinder usage without one manly effort of your own, would fix your character, and show the world how richly you deserve those chains you broke. To guard against this evil, let us take a review of the ground upon which we now stand, and from thence carry our thoughts forward for a moment into the unexplored field of expedient.

"After a pursuit of seven long years, the object for which we set out is at length brought within our reach.—Yes, my friends, that suffering courage of yours was active once.—It has conducted the United States of America through a doubtful and a bloody war. It has placed her in the chair of independency; and peace returns again to bless—whom?—A country willing to redress your wrongs, cherish your worth, and reward your services? A country courting your return to private life with tears of gratitude and smiles of admiration—longing to divide with you that independency which your gallantry has given, and those riches which your wounds have preserved? Is this the case? Or is it rather a country that tramples upon your rights, disdains your cries, and insults your distresses? Have you not more than once suggested your wishes and made known your wants to congress? Wants and wishes which gratitude and policy would have anticipated rather than evaded; and have you not lately, in the meek language of entreating memorials, begged from their justice what you could no longer expect from their favour? How have you been answered? Let the letter which you are called to consider to-morrow reply.

"If this then be your treatment while the swords you wear are necessary for the defence of America, what have you to expect from peace, when your voice shall sink, and your strength dissipate by division? When those very swords, the instruments and companions of your glory, shall be taken from your sides, and no remaining mark of military distinction left but your wants, infirmities, and scars? Can you then consent to be the only sufferers by this revolution, and, retiring from the field, grow old in poverty, wretchedness, and contempt? Can you consent to wade through the vile mire of dependency, and owe the miserable remnant of that life to charity which has hitherto been spent in honour? If you can—go—and carry with you the jest of Tories, and the scorn of Whigs;—the ridicule, and, what is worse, the pity of the world. Go,—starve and be forgotten. But if your spirit should revolt at this; if you have sense enough to discover, and spirit enough to oppose, tyranny, under whatever garb it may assume; whether it be the plain coat of republicanism, or the splendid robe of royalty; if you have yet learned to discriminate between a people and a cause, between men and principles,—awake! attend to your situation, and redress yourselves. If the present moment be lost, every future effort is in vain: and your threats then will be as empty as your entreaties now.

"I would advise you therefore to come to some final opinion upon what you can bear, and what you will suffer. If your determination be in any proportion to your wrongs, carry your appeal from the justice to the fears of the government. Change the milk-and-water style of your last memorial. Assume a bolder tone,—decent, but lively, spirited, and determined; and suspect the man who would advise to more moderation and longer forbearance. Let two or three men, who can feel as well as write, be appointed to draw up your last remonstrance; for I would no longer give it the sullen, soft, unsuccessful epithet of memorial. Let it be represented in language that will neither dishonour you by its rudeness, nor betray you by its fears, what has been promised by congress, and what has been performed;—how long and how patiently you have suffered;—how little you have asked, and how much of that little has been denied. Tell them that, though you were the first, and would wish to be the last to encounter danger; though despair itself can never drive you into dishonour, it may drive you from the field;—that the wound often irritated and never healed, may at length become incurable; and that the slightest mark of indignity from congress now must operate like the grave, and part you forever; that in any political event, the army has its alternative. If peace, that nothing shall separate you from your arms but death; if war, that courting the auspices, and inviting the directions of your illustrious leader, you will retire to some unsettled country, smile in your turn, and 'mock when their fear cometh on.' But let it represent also that, should they comply with the request of your late memorial, it would make you more happy and them more respectable. That while war should continue you would follow their standard into the field; and when it came to an end, you would withdraw into the shade of private life, and give the world another subject of wonder and applause;—an army victorious over its enemies, victorious over itself."

Persuaded as the officers in general were of the indisposition of government to remunerate their services, this eloquent and impassioned address, dictated by genius and by feeling, found in almost every bosom a kindred though latent sentiment prepared to receive its impression. Quick as the train to which a torch is applied, the passions caught its flame, and nothing seemed to be required but

day of November next, be absolutely discharged, by virtue of this our proclamation, from the said service."

the assemblage proposed for the succeeding day, to communicate the conflagration to the combustible mass, and to produce an explosion ruinous to the army, and to the nation.

Fortunately, the commander in chief was in camp. His characteristic firmness and decision did not forsake him in this crisis. The occasion required that his measures should be firm, but prudent and conciliatory,—evinced of his fixed determination to oppose any rash proceedings, but calculated to assuage the irritation which was excited, and to restore confidence in government.

Knowing well that it was much easier to avoid intemperate measures than to correct them, he thought it of essential importance to prevent the immediate meeting of the officers; but, knowing also that a sense of injury and a fear of injustice had made a deep impression on them, and that their sensibilities were all alive to the proceedings of congress on their memorial, he thought it more advisable to guide their deliberations on that interesting subject, than to discountenance them.

With these views, he noticed in his orders, the anonymous paper proposing a meeting of the officers, and expressed his conviction that their good sense would secure them from paying any "attention to such an irregular invitation; but his own duty, he conceived, as well as the reputation and true interest of the army, required his disapprobation of such disorderly proceedings. At the same time, he requested the general and field officers, with one officer from each company, and a proper representation from the staff of the army, to assemble at twelve on Saturday, the 15th, at the new building, to hear the report of the committee deputed by the army to congress. After mature deliberation they will devise what farther measures ought to be adopted as most rational and best calculated to obtain the just and important object in view." The senior officer in rank present was directed to preside, and report the result of the deliberations to the commander in chief.

The day succeeding that on which these orders were published, a second anonymous address appeared, from the same pen which had written the first. Its author, acquainted with the discontents of the army, did not seem to despair of impelling the officers to the desired point. He affected to consider the orders in a light favourable to his views:—"as giving system to their proceedings, and stability to their resolves."

But Washington would not permit himself to be misunderstood. The interval between his orders and the general meeting they invited, was employed in impressing on those officers individually who possessed the greatest share of the general confidence, a just sense of the true interests of the army, and the whole weight of his influence was exerted to calm the agitations of the moment, and conduct them to a happy termination. This was a work of no inconsiderable difficulty. So convinced were many that government designed to deal unfairly by them, that only the reliance they placed on their general, and their attachment to his person and character, could have moderated their resentments so far as to induce them to adopt the measures he recommended.

On the 15th, the convention of officers assembled, and General Gates took the chair. The commander in chief then addressed them in the following terms.

"Gentlemen,—

"By an anonymous summons, an attempt has been made to convene you together. How inconsistent with the rules of propriety, how unmilitary, and how subversive of all order and discipline, let the good sense of the army decide.

"In the moment of this summons, another anonymous production was sent into circulation, addressed more to the feelings and passions than to the judgment of the army. The author of the piece is entitled to much credit for the goodness of his pen; and I could wish he had as much credit for the rectitude of his heart; for as men see through different optics, and are induced by the reflecting faculties of the mind, to use different means to attain the same end, the author of the address should have had more charity than to mark for suspicion the man who should recommend moderation and longer forbearance; or, in other words, who should not think as he thinks, and act as he advises. But he had another plan in view, in which candour and liberality of sentiment, regard to justice, and love of country, have no part; and he was right to insinuate the darkest suspicion to effect the blackest design. That the address was drawn with great art, and is designed to answer the most insidious purposes; that it is calculated to impress the mind with an idea of premeditated injustice in the sovereign power of the United States, and rouse all those resentments which must unavoidably flow from such a belief; that the secret mover of this scheme, whoever he may be, intended to take advantage of the passions, while they were warmed by the recollection of past distresses, without giving time for cool deliberate thinking, and that composure of mind which is so necessary to give dignity and stability to measures, is rendered too obvious by the mode of conducting the business to need other proof than a reference to the proceedings.

"Thus much, gentlemen, I have thought it incumbent on me to observe to you, to show upon what principles I opposed the irregular and hasty meeting which was proposed to have been held on Tuesday last, and not because I wanted a disposition to give you every opportunity consistent with your own honour, and the dignity of the army, to make known your grievances. If my conduct heretofore has not evinced to you, that I have been a faithful friend to the army, my declaration of it at this time would be equally unavailing and improper. But as I was among the first who embarked in the cause of our common country; as I have never left your side one moment but when called from you on public duty; as I have been the constant companion and witness of your distresses, and not among the last to feel and acknowledge your merits; as I have ever considered my own military reputation as inseparably connected with that of the army; as my heart has ever expanded with joy when I have heard its praises, and my indignation has arisen when the mouth of detraction has been opened against it; it can scarcely be supposed, at this last stage of the war, that I am indifferent to its interests. But how are they to be promoted? The way is plain, says the anonymous addresser.—If war continues, remove into the unsettled country; there establish yourselves, and leave an ungrateful country to defend itself! But who are they to defend? Our wives, our children, our farms and other property which we leave behind us? Or, in this state of hostile separation, are we to take the two first (the latter can not be removed) to perish in a wilderness with hunger, cold, and nakedness?

"If peace takes place, never sheath your swords," says he, "until you have obtained full and ample justice." This dreadful alternative of either deserting our country in the extremest hour of her distress, or turning our arms against it, which is the apparent object, unless congress can be compelled into instant compliance, has something so shocking in it, that humanity revolts at the idea. My God! what can this writer have in view by recommending such measures. Can he be a friend to the army? Can he be a friend to this country? Rather is he not an insidious foe: some emissary, perhaps, from New York, plotting the ruin of both, by sowing the seeds of discord and separation between the civil and military powers of the continent? And what a compliment does he pay to our understandings, when he recommends measures, in either alternative, impracticable in their nature? But here, gentlemen, I will drop the curtain, because it would be as imprudent in me to assign my reasons for this opinion, as it would be insulting to your conception to suppose you stood in need of them. A moment's reflection will convince every dispassionate mind of the physical impossibility of carrying either proposal into execution. There might, gentlemen, be an impropriety in my taking notice, in this address to you, of an anonymous production,—but the manner in which that performance has been introduced to the army, together with some other circumstances, will amply justify my observations on the tendency of that writing.

"With respect to the advice given by the author, to suspect the man who shall recommend moderate measures and longer forbearance, I spurn it, as every man who regards that liberty, and reveres

General Washington, taking an affectionate leave that justice for which we contend, undoubtedly must; for if men are to be precluded from offering their sentiments on a matter which may involve the most serious and alarming consequences that can invite the consideration of mankind, reason is of no use to us. The freedom of speech may be taken away, and dumb and silent, we may be led like sheep to the slaughter. I can not in justice to my own belief, and what I have great reason to conceive is the intention of congress, conclude this address, without giving it as my decided opinion, that that honourable body entertain exalted sentiments of the services of the army, and, from a full conviction of its merits and sufferings, will do it complete justice. That their endeavours to discover and establish funds for this purpose have been unwearied, and will not cease until they have succeeded, I have not a doubt.

"But, like all other large bodies, where there is a variety of different interests to reconcile, their determinations are slow. Why then should we distrust them? And, in consequence of that distrust, adopt measures which may cast a shade over that glory which has been so justly acquired, and tarnish the reputation of an army which is celebrated through all Europe for its fortitude and patriotism? And for what is this done? To bring the object we seek nearer? No: most certainly, in my opinion, it will cast it at a greater distance. For myself, (and I take no merit in giving the assurance, being induced to it from principles of gratitude, veracity, and justice, and a grateful sense of the confidence you have ever placed in me,) a recollection of the cheerful assistance, and prompt obedience I have experienced from you, under every vicissitude of fortune, and the sincere affection I feel for an army I have so long had the honour to command, will oblige me to declare in this public and solemn manner, that in the attainment of complete justice for all your toils and dangers, and in the gratification of every wish, so far as may be done consistently with the great duty I owe my country, and those powers we are bound to respect, you may freely command my services to the utmost extent of my abilities.

"While I give these assurances, and pledge myself in the most unequivocal manner to exert whatever abilities I am possessed of in your favour, let me entreat you, gentlemen, on your part, not to take any measures which, viewed in the calm light of reason, will lessen the dignity, and sully the glory you have hitherto maintained. Let me request you to rely on the plighted faith of your country, and place a full confidence in the purity of the intentions of congress—that, previous to your dissolution as an army, they will cause all your accounts to be fairly liquidated, as directed in the resolutions which were published to you two days ago; and that they will adopt the most effectual measures in their power to render ample justice to you for your faithful and meritorious services. And let me conjure you, in the name of our common country, as you value your own honour, as you respect the rights of humanity, and as you regard the military and national character of America, to express your utmost horror and detestation of the man who wishes, under any specious pretences, to overturn the liberties of our country, and who wickedly attempts to open the flood gates of civil discord, and deluge our rising empire in blood.

"By thus determining, and thus acting, you will pursue the plain and direct road to the attainment of your wishes; you will defeat the insidious designs of our enemies, who are compelled to resort from open force to secret artifice. You will give one more distinguished proof of unexampled patriotism and patient virtue, rising superior to the pressure of the most complicated sufferings; and you will, by the dignity of your conduct, afford occasion for posterity to say, when speaking of the glorious example you have exhibited to mankind, had this day been wanting, the world had never seen the last stage of perfection to which human nature is capable of attaining."

These sentiments from a person whom the army had been accustomed to love, to revere, and to obey; the solidity of whose judgment, and the sincerity of whose zeal for their interests, were alike unquestioned, could not fail to be irresistible. No person was hardy enough to oppose the advice he had given; and the general impression was apparent. A resolution moved by General Knox, and seconded by Brigadier-General Putnam, "assuring him that the officers reciprocated his affectionate expressions with the greatest sincerity of which the human heart is capable," was unanimously voted. On the motion of General Putnam, a committee, consisting of General Knox, Colonel Brooks, and Captain Howard, was then appointed, to prepare resolutions on the business before them, and to report in half an hour. The report of the committee being brought in and considered, the following resolutions were passed.

"Resolved unanimously, that at the commencement of the present war, the officers of the American army engaged in the service of their country from the purest love and attachment to the rights and privileges of human nature; which motives still exist in the highest degree; and that no circumstances of distress or danger shall induce a conduct that may tend to sully the reputation and glory which they have acquired at the price of their blood, and eight years faithful services.

"Resolved unanimously, that the army continue to have an unshaken confidence in the justice of congress and their country, and are fully convinced that the representatives of America will not disband or disperse the army until their accounts are liquidated, the balances accurately ascertained, and adequate funds established for payment; and in this arrangement, the officers expect that the half-pay, or a commutation for it, shall be efficaciously comprehended.

"Resolved unanimously, that his excellency the commander in chief, be requested to write to his excellency the president of congress, earnestly entreating the most speedy decision of that honourable body upon the subject of our late address, which was forwarded by a committee of the army, some of whom are waiting upon congress for the result. In the alternative of peace or war, this event would be highly satisfactory, and would produce immediate tranquillity in the minds of the army, and prevent any further machinations of designing men, to sow discord between the civil and military powers of the United States.

"On motion, resolved unanimously, that the officers of the American army view with abhorrence and reject with disdain, the infamous propositions contained in a late anonymous address to the officers of the army, and resent with indignation the secret attempts of some unknown person to collect the officers together in a manner totally subversive of all discipline and good order.

"Resolved unanimously, that the thanks of the officers of the army be given to the committee who presented to congress the late address of the army; for the wisdom and prudence with which they have conducted that business; and that a copy of the proceedings of this day be transmitted by the president to Major-General M'Dougal; and that he be requested to continue his solicitations at congress, until the objects of his mission are accomplished."

The storm which had been raised so suddenly and unexpectedly being thus happily dissipated, the commander in chief exerted all his influence in support of the application the officers had made to congress.—Marshall's Life of Washington, vol. 2, p. 41—50.

* The following eulogium from the lips of an eloquent living statesman, when pleading for the relief of the illustrious survivors, conveys a just idea of the honourable conduct of this band of patriots:—"The army was to be disbanded; but it was unpaid. It was to lay down its own power; but there was no government with adequate power to perform what had been promised to it. In this critical moment, what is its conduct? Does it disgrace its high character? Is temptation able to seduce it? Does it speak of righting itself? Does it undertake to redress its own wrongs by its own sword? Does it lose its patriotism in its deep sense of injury and injustice? Does military ambition cause its integrity to swerve? Far, far otherwise. It had faithfully served and saved the country, and to that country it now referred, with unhesitating confidence, its claim and its complaints. It laid down its arms with alacrity; it mingled itself with the mass of the community; and it waited till, in better times, and under a new government, its services might be rewarded, and the promises made to it fulfilled.

commander in chief of the American armies. Then, with a character illustrious throughout the world, he returned to his residence at Mount Vernon, possessing the sincere love and profound veneration of his countrymen.

The momentous contest, the history of which has occupied the preceding chapters, suggests a train of reflections which, were we to indulge them, would lead us to an extent inconsistent with the character of the work. This struggle between despotism and liberty possesses, indeed, some features that are common to all enterprises of a similar character; but there are others which are peculiar to itself, and which place it in happy contrast with instances both of an earlier and of a more recent date. The great contest when England liberated herself for a season from the iron rule of the Stuarts, resembles in its progress, perhaps more than any other, the American revolution; but how different were its results! In the former case a military despotism succeeded, which rendered the people desirous of the return even of a profligate prince, and facilitated the establishment of an oligarchy, from whose oppression the nation is

We can hardly recur to this example too often, or dwell on it too much, for the honour of our country, and of its defenders."—The Speeches and Forensic Arguments of Daniel Webster, p. 356, 357.

* The acquirements of the men who achieved our independence have been greatly underrated. To prove this, we have only to examine the letters written by the officers of the army and the members of congress, from 1774 to the close of the conflict. The literature of the revolution is scattered throughout the history of all the transactions of that eventful period; but in no instance does it shine more conspicuously than in the productions of Washington; he was not a scholar by education or profession; his information was miscellaneous, and by no means extensive, when his early public services began. He knew something of history and mathematics, and something of the military tactics of the day. He, from his youth, saw things, at all times, through a clear medium, and expressed his thoughts with clearness, force, and honesty. His history of his journey to the Ohio, undertaken by the order of Dinwiddie, proves that his judgment was the master trait of his mind. The object of his mission is not a moment forgotten; he looked with a single eye to that object, and he never, for a moment, turned himself, to think of his dangers or his sufferings. At every step such a mind improves. His first address to his army in July, 1775, is full of excellent military rules, but is wanting in that felicitous elegance which he afterwards acquired. He never suffered a sentiment to come from his pen negligently written; all was worked into ease and dignity. No commander that ever lived had so much need of this talent. Others have had to issue orders and to give an account of proceedings; Washington had not only to do these, but other things besides. He had, at times, to perform every duty incident to war, and more, from a pioneer to a field marshal; and from a sutler to a chancellor of the exchequer, at least with his pen; not only this, he had to use every argument to collect troops, and to keep them together, even for the shortest time; apathy was to be aroused; vaulting ambition to be struck down; individual bickerings to be silenced; sectional irritations to be soothed; the quarrelsome and high mettled to be controlled, that the service should not suffer; the faint and despairing to be encouraged; the living to be supported, and heaven, sometimes, only knew how; and the dead were to be duly honoured, according to military usages, when the army had hardly powder enough to fire a volley at the enemy. In all this, the address of Washington was conspicuous, but the proonly now making an effort to escape; in the latter, the principles of liberty have been matured, and the grand spectacle exhibited of the existence of lawful and powerful authority, as remote from despotism as the freedom it protects is from licentiousness. If, again, we compare the American revolution to that of which it has the reputation of being a principal, if not the chief cause, how must infidel France blush at the sight of her garments dyed deep in the blood of her sons, to make way, first for a splendid but deceitful military imperialism, and then for the restoration of a priest-ridden dynasty, to purify herself from which she has required a second sacrifice on the altar of liberty! Whence, then, did the efforts we have been narrating derive their superiority, both as to their character and their results? While many have urged the difference of national temperament and external circumstances, which, doubtless, possessed some influence, we feel no hesitation in affirming, that the distinction is mainly to be attributed to the presence of enlightened religious principle, and intellectual argument.* To enter into the arguments which substantiate this assertion would be foreign to ductions of his pen were more so. He wrote to all, he reasoned with all, and he conquered all. Congress was not at all times in a proper temper to render him the most efficient aid; he was obliged to come upon them in all forms of entreaty; alarming them, at times, by his intimations of leaving the army, using every suggestion which could reach their pride, their patriotism, their honour, courage, or any other faculty, properly, of sympathy, about them. There is not a form of reasoning that he was not obliged to assume; still, every form was pure English, good common sense, in his mother tongue. Cesar wrote his commentaries in the camp, and they are a fine model of chaste and elegant writing; but it must be remembered, that Cesar was a high bred Roman scholar. He was as proud of his eloquence and fine writing, as he was of his fame as a great leader of armies. Wolfe made his addresses and wrote his despatches in the toils and distresses incident to a camp; but these productions are but few, compared with those of Washington. Burgoyne's letters, written in the field, are said to surpass those written in the closet; Nelson's account of the battle of the Nile is sublime; and Bonaparte's address to his soldiers under the pyramids, is full of epic grandeur. But these are momentary bursts of chivalrous feelings; while Washington's addresses, despatches, and letters, to every one, in every part of the country, was a continued exertion of reason, to save his country. When the memory of individual exertion shall be lost, and history shall only speak, in general terms, of the revolutionary conflict, these letters and addresses of Washington will preserve the particular scenes of that day, and bring them at once to the understanding of men. In looking carefully over his productions already published, I cannot find in them one word that is not pure, legitimate English; good Saxon English, through which runs the best currents of true liberty in, thinking and acting, of any language that can be found, at any time or place.

The close of the war of independence, when the people fondly thought that they were about to be rewarded for all their sacrifices, was the most painful period of our history. At that time, from 1783 to 1789, almost every one found his affairs in a deranged state. The state debts which had been made in hopes of prosperous times, then operated severely on all classes in the community. To pay their debts with promptness was impossible, and every relief-act only made the matter worse. It was then that the people found that the great work of independence, as contemplated at the begin-the purpose of historic narrative. Any reader who has given impartial attention to the tone of piety which pervades the public acts of the congress of America, and of her principal leaders, especially those of the commander in chief, as well as the spirit of the people at large, with some exceptions, will not ring of the conflict, was only half done; a form of government was to be fixed upon, to give energy to national power, and success to individual and national enterprise. This portentous crisis formed another epoch for the display of the literary and political attainments of the active and patriotic minds in our country. New men appeared on the important discussion of the adoption of the federal constitution in the several state conventions; and it was found that the quantity of talent and information in the country had greatly increased during the war; and that its standard quality was equally good and precious as that which had been assayed at the commencement of the difficulties. A thousand intellectual lamps were lighted up along our shores, to show the people in what darkness they were groping, and to what a precipice they were hastening. A baleful meteor now and then led the people for a moment astray, but at length the right path was found, and the nation commenced its march onward to prosperity and honour.

Perhaps it were well to pause a moment and name a few of those who displayed their literature and eloquence at this important period. They left unexplored no portion of history. They passed by no lesson of experience; all were faithfully examined and thoroughly sifted, and the people had the benefits of the results. That nation cannot be long in danger that can, on any great event, command her physical and mental powers for her safety and guide.

It was felt by all thinking men, in every part of the country, that the old confederation was no longer a sufficient bond of union. The great pressure of common danger, which had kept all secure, had in a great measure ceased, and the people were hurrying fast on to anarchy, for want of a government that could enforce its requisitions.

From these conventions much of the nature of our people, their habits of thinking, and reasoning, and feeling, may be gathered. In looking over the debates in the several conventions in the different states, we find a great deal of talent displayed, from New Hampshire to Georgia; and we may also see that the education of each state had been nearly on the same model; for in reading the speeches of all, a foreigner would at once pronounce that the orators were trained in the same school. The style of eloquence may vary a little, but the language used in the debates is all in the good old English books. They had the same jealousies, the same hopes and fears, and the same determinations. These jealousies had taken rank hold of common minds in every portion of the country; but it is not too much to say, that those in favour of adopting the constitution were generally of the higher classes of intellect, and those who had most at stake, although it must be conceded that there were many exceptions to this remark. The speakers in favour of adopting the constitution far outnumbered those opposed to it, in proportion to the majority obtained for the final vote.

In the convention of Massachusetts, there were, out of three hundred and fifty-five members, sixty-seven speakers, and not more than eight or ten ventured to oppose the constitution in debate; and yet there were, after every exertion, but a majority of nineteen in favour of the adoption of it. In the convention of New York, which consisted of about sixty members, there was only a majority of two in favour of the adoption; and among the thirteen speakers, there were only two or three in the negative. The talents were certainly on the side of the adoption; the impressions of the people were at first decidedly against it, from the fear that they were giving up too much of their hard earned liberty, and not from any wish to live in a state of anarchy. It must, however, be taken into consideration, that forty years have elapsed since these debates were reported; and at that time the art of reporting speeches was but little known; and it cannot be supposed that in cases where the speakers did not assist the reporters, that we have any thing more than the skeletons of the speeches delivered. The convention of Massachusetts were together from the 9th of January, 1788, to February 7th, twenty-nine days, at which time there were nearly two hundred speeches made; and among the orators some of the first men New England ever produced: Parsons, Ames, Cabot, Gore, King, Dana, Jarvis, Strong, Brooks, Dawes, and others, who exhausted every subject they discussed. The whole of these speeches is comprised in one hundred and fifty octavo pages; and from a comparison of their different styles of speaking on other subjects, I find that the reporter's, not the speaker's style, is to be seen; still, however, much credit is due to him for getting these debates up so well as he did at that time. The New York orators were fortunate, for they undertook to assist the reporter, and of course posterity will have a fair view of their arguments. It must be granted that the New York convention was a highly intellectual body.

Virginia, always true to her native talents, had an experienced reporter in the convention to take down the debates; and fortunately for us, he extended them to three volumes, amounting to six hundred and twelve closely printed pages; and although that body was in session but twenty-six days, and only thirteen or fourteen members attempted to speak, yet we have more matter from these speeches than from the Massachusetts and New York reports together. Those in the Virginia convention, in favour of adopting the proposed constitution, who distinguished themselves by their speeches, were Messrs. Nicholas, Randolph, Madison, Pendleton, Marshall, and Tyler. Those opposed to its adoption, were Patrick Henry, Mason, Monroe, Grayson, and Dawson. Mr. Madison took a very active part, and spoke more than any other member in the convention, although all those mentioned were deeply engaged. It will not be denied, at this day, that throughout the thirteen United States, in these debates on establishing a form of government, a majority of the talents was on the side of the constitution; yet there were able men opposed to it. When the main question was taken, the plurality in Virginia was only ten—eighty-nine voting in the affirmative, and seventy-nine in the negative. The question was ably argued on both sides, and the objections very honestly given. Patrick Henry, and those who acted with him, were fearful of the loss of state influence. They were alarmed at the expression, "we, the people." They saw in this phrase a consolidation of interests which was not consistent with state pride; while, in many states, the people were afraid that individual rights would be lost. These different jealousies were shown at every movement of the states; but at last were happily overcome by the perseverance of the friends of the constitution. A victory was obtained more difficult to achieve than any; yea, than all those of arms which had been gained in the revolutionary struggle. These jealousies were natural, but the conquest over them was glorious.

It is to be regretted, that so many of the speeches of the members of the different conventions, are irrevocably lost for the want of a proper reporter at the time, and from inattention since. It is a mortifying truth that more of our history, or more of the minute facts of which our history has been composed, have been preserved by other nations than by ourselves. The nations of Europe considered our case a new one in the annals of the world; and some of their curious speculators on the progress of events, took infinite pains to procure all the information to be had in respect to us and our proceedings. The Italian historian, Botta, not only procured all the information he could, but set down and wrote the history of our revolution with great fairness, and with tolerable accuracy. Professor Ebeling, of Germany, had the intention, it is said, of writing out our whole history, and collected a great mass of materials for that purpose. The history he did not write; but we have, through the medium of an individual, the benefit of his collections; they having been purchased and brought to this country.

There is one work which deserves our notice, and which ought to be republished, as there are but few copies of it in this country: "The Remembrancer, or an Impartial Repository of Public Events." This work was begun by J. Almon, and published in monthly numbers, in London. It extends over the whole time of the revolution, from 1775 to 1783, and amounts to fourteen volumes, as collected and bound. The work was friendly to the cause of America, and was supported by the friends of this country at that time, and is remarkable for its candour, truth, and fidelity. One already possessed of the general outlines of the great contest between the colonies and the mother country, will find in this work more valuable documents, of a particular and circumstantial nature, to aid him in getting a minute history of his country at that period, than he can in any other work extant. Every one who has read history with attention, and with a desire to gain knowledge, will frequently find that there are a thousand little chinks left by the general writer, that he could wish to see filled up; but knows not where to seek for the facts he is anxious to find. As to the history of our revolution, these volumes will greatly assist him. It has been a fruitful source for the historians themselves. The Remembrancer is something like Niles' Register, and is now what that will be to the future historians of our country. We are deeply indebted to the friends of our cause, at that period, in every part of the world, for their helping hand and good wishes; without which we might have fainted in reaching the goal and obtaining the prize; gratitude should remember what benevolence has forgotten.

After these great exertions for the adoption of the federal constitution had been made in the state conventions, and indeed while they were making, and the question was under discussion, a great deal was written by men of enlightened minds, and given to the public, to clear up the difficulties which had been suggested by those opposed to the form of government provided for in the constitution. Mr. Jay, Mr. Madison, and Mr. Hamilton, brought all the powers of their mighty minds, to satisfy the people that they were doing wisely to support the constitution, not only in convention, but by a series of letters in the public prints. These periodicals, now acknowledged as their productions, unite the soundest maxims of good government, with the clearest and best illustrations of the best forms in which it could appear. These productions may be said to have fixed the public mind. The relations and bearings of the provisions of the constitution, were so distinctly pointed out in them, that all could understand; and such was the correctness and beauty of the style of these numbers, that by them the taste of the country was refined, as well as the views of the citizens enlarged, and their understandings enlightened. I shall not stop, at this moment, to point out the part each one took in this great labour; but simply make this passing remark, that the Federalist stands foremost among American literary productions, whether we consider the subject, the matter, or style of the work, or its usefulness in explaining the views of those learned statesmen who achieved the second part of our independence. The effect of this work was such, that in a few years after it gained general circulation, there was scarcely a man to be found who questioned the propriety of the adoption of the constitution.

The valour which fought out the battles of the revolutionary war, and finally drove the enemy from our shore, and the wisdom which suggested our excellent form of government, and the address and perseverance which led to its adoption, were more than equalled by the wisdom and prudence with which the machinery was set in motion. The first congress under the constitution, was composed of great men; most of them had been reared in the school of experience, and had been employed previously in considering that instrument; in order to assist in forwarding its adoption, they came to their congressional duties with a spirit of forbearance, ready to sacrifice all local prejudices on the altar of their country's good. What the knowledge and experience of one did not reach, the ingenuity of the other suggested, and all went on harmoniously and successfully. There was a delicacy shown to each other in that body, generally speaking, which has never been felt or exhibited since; and perhaps it has never since been so necessary as at that time. The eyes of the community were turned towards congress as towards the trying of an experiment, of which there were nearly as many fears as hopes. To use a phrase from the laws of the solar system, its polarity was inclined towards democracy, as being more congenial to the feelings of the people, and more consistent with the elements of our society, than a stronger government would have been. The people reasoned from expanded views of human nature, and a thorough acquaintance with history. They saw that despotic power destroys the oak of liberty, by cutting up root and branch, and by striking the soil on which it grows with dead ste-liberty as the result, are here closely associated; and if there be any bold enough—we had almost said

rility; while anarchy, if it comes at all, comes in a whirlwind with a hundred hands, and scatters the leaves and breaks the branches; but the root is not always left sapless; and the acorn, trodden under foot, may burst its germ and spring into life, and flourish in a new generation. Violent political discussions often pass away, and leave the lessons of experience to be felt and regarded; but nations rarely recover from the paralysis of despotism. Our ancestors saw the mother country, even in all the disasters and horrors of civil wars, advance in power and influence, while Spain, in the quiet of arbitrary power, was fast sinking into a secondary importance. In England the most useful institutions, and many of her learned men, grew up immediately after a civil war, or in it; while with all the influx of gold from the new world, learning and the arts declined at the same time, in the calm of Spanish despotism.

The literature of nations may be seen, in some measure, in the style in which their laws are written, and by their state papers. We judge of the state of the Romans by the style of the Justinian code, as well as by the poets of the Augustan age. In fact, the style of the laws is a better proof of the general advancement of knowledge, than that of the works of a few poets. The laws reflect the general intelligence, while poetry is perhaps only the reflected imagery of a few individual minds. The laws of the United States show a great extent of knowledge in the civil and commercial relations of society and nations. No country ever produced so many laws in so short a period of time. These laws and regulations are, in general, clear and explicit; sometimes they are marked with the peculiar phraseology of a particular state, as borrowed from the statute book of that state; but this is not perceptible to any one but those deeply read in these state laws. Every day's business is giving a more entire national stamp to the statute book of the United States; and the numerous and lucid decisions of the supreme court have produced uniform constructions in the laws which were in some degree differently construed in different sections of this extended country, at the commencement of our national career.

The style of our state papers has been of a high order, in point of clearness and correctness, the great requisites in communications of a public nature. The first secretaries were men of industry and learning, and they spared no pains to leave on record proofs of their abilities as makers of precedents. A responsible situation, indeed; several of these men were prime scholars, and felt that they were making models for future ages. It is a subject of congratulation to us, that so many patient, industrious, and learned men, were, at that period, found for the discharge of such important duties. The anxiety of the first president to have every thing well matured, and clearly expressed, was favourable for the commencement of such an order of things. The duties of high political officers are always laborious and painful; but when there were but few or no landmarks to guide them, it must have been difficult indeed to have steered so correctly.

Much debating talent had been shown in congress in every stage of organizing and making these laws, the passage of which circumstances imperiously demanded; but there was no particular display of eloquence from any side of the house, until the British treaty called it forth; and perhaps, at no time since, have higher powers been developed in our national assembly, than on that subject. The champions, for and against, came forward and fought valiantly. It was a new question; and there might have been some honest differences; but it was debated upon party grounds, and so decided. Who were right or who were wrong it matters not; it is mentioned as an era in our eloquence, so memorable, that American talent, in speaking, is never mentioned without some allusion to the debate on Jay's treaty.

Literature and science are near in their relationship, and seldom known to be far separated. Literature has generally received more attention in the early ages of nations than science. The sweet influences of Orion and Pleiades had been sung for ages in poetry, before science had marked their courses or weighed them in her balance; and science, after all the discoveries she has made, has adopted the terms used by taste and imagination, long before these discoveries were thought of. Every profession, to be respectaprofane enough—to gainsay the relation of cause and effect in this case, we scarcely know which to deem most at fault, his understanding or his heart.

CHAPTER III.

WASHINGTON'S ADMINISTRATION.

In every department of nature violent efforts are succeeded by a corresponding exhaustion; and the

ble, must unite both in some degree. Without both, they are only trades, possessing neither dignity, nor refinement, nor interest. Bacon was the first among the lawyers who brought taste into the science of the profession. For this, he was derided by Coke as unsound and fanciful. Bacon could do nothing without leaving the impressions of mind, taste, and elegant novelty, upon it. He laid hold of all the fabulous history of gods, and demigods, and heroes, and laid bare its hidden meaning, and, by his explanations, gave utility, point, and beauty, to that which before seemed useless, dull, and extravagant. It is the pride of the present day, that his fame has been defended, and his honesty proved, by one of our own countrymen, after it had been surrounded by falsehood and prejudice, for more than a century and a half. A writer of the first talents, in the North American Review, a few years since, had the honour of showing the world, that Bacon deserved the epithets, brightest, wisest of mankind; but that "meanest" was added at first by wickedness, and perpetuated by one who cared but little whether the epithet was just or unjust, if he could make the libel "point a moral, or adorn a tale." Bacon treated the law as a science capable of employing the graces of literature. After a considerable interval, Blackstone wrote his commentaries, which proved that the fundamental principles of law might be conveyed, even in a choice and clear style, without any quaintness, abruptness, or tedious repetition; and, like other subjects of less gravity, Lord Mansfield delivered his opinions in the best phraseology the English language would permit of in argument or illustration. The lawyers of our own country were men of learning before the revolution, but the manner of arguing at the bar, to the court or jury, was not remarkable for refinement or delicacy. Coarse attacks and sharp retorts were common between members of the bar; and the court either maintained a hard-featured silence, or broke in upon their sparrings with surly dignity. That gentlemanly courtesy, which reigns from one part of our country to another, among judges and advocates, was, for many years, unknown, or thought improper for a tribunal of justice. Not only the arguments of counsel, but the opinions of the bench, are now given with some regard to literary taste; and one not acquainted with law terms, may read the reports without being offended with a parade of technical terms or involved sentences. This branch of science is rapidly increasing; already we have more than three hundred volumes of American reports in law and equity; and, as the present generation of lawyers must go through such a mass of American law decisions, it is fortunate that some regard has been paid to the style in which these cases are made up. Some of these opinions might be selected, which have the freshness and spirit of animated truth conveyed in exquisite taste. Facts are not the less forcible, because they are happily arranged, nor reasonings less convincing, because they are well expressed. The professional men are trying to diffuse as much intelligence and taste in the community as possible, in order that a day of purer literature should succeed. Much has been done, and much more has been planned to be effected hereafter; the numerous agents are busy, and in concert and harmony, in the great work of spreading the sciences and literature throughout the land.

The literature of theology, in this country, suffered, as well as the literature and science of other professions, during the revolution. The pulpit rang with patriotism and politics, and harangues struggles of a nation for liberty and independence afford no exception to this universal law. From the evils inseparable from such contests, the pusillanimous and the sordid may urge arguments in favour of what they deem a prudent and profitable submissiveness to arbitrary sway; but the lover of freedom, while he will not deny that there are evils in national convulsion, even when necessitated by the most justifiable causes, will still scorn to evade them by a base servility; and ill does it become those who have rendered such evils inevitable, to attempt to

upon the good and sound christian duty of fighting for freedom; all very excellent lessons for the times, and which certainly had their uses. After the warning appeals to the brave defenders of the country, it was dull to go back to detailing the enormities of papal power, or speaking of the great beast of seven heads and ten horns; therefore his holiness was left quite alone, except now and then in some good man's form of prayer, from which the epithets of abhorrence for Babylon never had been expunged. Dissertations on Antinomians, Pelagians, and all the host of sectarians, had begun to grow stale, and the doctrines of eternal decrees and predestination were not so attractive to the new generations as they had been to their fathers. From all appearances, the timid began to fear that the pulpit had lost its legitimate, primitive influences. Under this impression, many were turned from the study of this profession, who were intended for it by their parents, and engaged in medicine or law. At this weak moment, if the defenders of the faith will allow that there ever were such moments, infidelity reared its monstrous head, and stalked through our part of christendom with gigantic strides; but, as it has often happened, that which threatened destruction to the altar and the priest, was the cause of giving new and lasting honour to both. Infidelity had for years been disseminated by the philosophers into inquisitive minds, but had never come upon us in the form of popular eloquence, and had not reached common minds engaged in ordinary pursuits, until about the time of the French revolution; it now came under the potential form of superior wisdom, free from the thralldom of error. It dealt out a strong denial of the great truths of the gospel, and made impudence, with now and then a flash of witty scurrility, pass for common sense and true reasoning upon the revelations of God to man, through nature and her laws, and by the inspirations of holy writ. At first, great shipwreck was made of the faith of thousands; the weak were bewildered, and the unlearned entangled. The truly pious still believed that the church was built upon a rock, and that the gates of hell should not, finally, prevail against it; yet they were discouraged at the progress of infidelity, and were cut to the heart at hearing the authenticity of the scriptures doubted, and the ministers of our holy religion ridiculed in every possible form of contempt; called by opprobrious epithets; charged with ignorance and hypocrisy; and their downfall prophesied with confidence and joy. For a while there was some confusion in the church, but the purest men soon roused themselves from idleness, or rather from idle disputes about trifles, or non-essentials, and many of them plunged into the depths of learning, to answer the falsehoods and sneers of the scoffers, who laid pretensions to having penetrated into the recesses of oriental literature, and having detected the errors of christianity. The contest was animated, and the ministers of light struggled hard with the ministers of darkness. Great minds entered the contest, and, after a while, the dreams of Condorcet and the scurrilities of Paine, were swept away together, and infidelity was first scouted by learning, piety, and taste, and, at length, proscribed by the irresistible power of fashion. The works of Watson and Tytler, and, towards the close of the struggle, of many others, were found, not only in the hands of the polemic, or in the library of the speculative, but on the toilets of the fair, with the last work of the imagination from Southey or Campbell; for the ecclesiastical writers had added to the science of theology the most sublime of all contemplations, the charms of

The exhausting effect of their exertions was felt by the people of the United States for a considerable period after peace, as well as independence, had been secured. The enthusiasm of a popular contest terminating in victory, began to subside, and the sacrifices of the revolution soon became known and felt. The claims of those who toiled, and fought, and suffered in the arduous struggle, were strongly urged, and the government had neither resources nor power to satisfy or to silence them. The federal head had no separate or exclusive fund. The members of congress depended on the states which they respectively represented, even for their own maintenance, and money for national purposes could only be obtained by requisitions on the different members of the confederacy. On them it became necessary immediately to call for funds to discharge the arrears of pay due to the soldiers of the revolution, and the interest on the debt which the government had been compelled to contract. The legislatures of the different states received these requisitions with respect, listened to the monitory warnings of congress with deference, and with silent and inactive acquiescence. Their own situation, indeed, was full of embarrassment. The wealth of the country had been totally exhausted during the revolution. Taxes could not be collected, because there was no money to represent the value of the little personal property which had not been, and the land which could not be, destroyed; and commerce, though preparing to burst from its thralldom, had not yet had time to restore to the annual produce of the country its exchangeable value. The states owed each a heavy debt for local services rendered during the revolution, for which it was bound to provide, and each had its own domestic government to support. Under these circumstances, it is not surprising that each state was anxious to retain for its own benefit the small but rising revenue derived from foreign commerce; and that the custom-houses in each commercial city were considered as the most valuable sources of income which the states possessed. Each state, therefore, made its own regulations, its tariff, and tonnage duties, and, as a natural consequence, the different states clashed with each other; one nation became more favoured than another under the same circumstances; and one state pursued a system injurious to the interests of another. Hence the confidence of foreign countries was destroyed; and they would not enter into treaties of commerce with the confederated government, while they were not likely to be carried into effect. A general decay of trade, the rise of imported merchandise, the fall of produce, and an uncommon decrease of the value of lands, ensued.

The distress of the inhabitants was continually on the increase; and in Massachusetts, where it was most felt, an insurrection of a serious character was the consequence. Near the close of the year 1786, the populace assembled to the number of two thousand, in the north-western part of the state, and, choosing Daniel Shays their leader, demanded that the collection of debts should be suspended, and that the legislature should authorize the emission of paper money for general circulation. Two bodies of militia, drawn from those parts of the state where disaffection did not prevail, were immediately despatched against them, one under the command of General Lincoln, the other of General Shepard. The disaffected were dispersed with less difficulty than had been apprehended, and, abandoning their seditious purposes, accepted the proffered indemnity of the government.

The time at length came when the public mind gave tokens of being prepared for a change in the constitution of the general government—an occurrence the necessity of which had long been foreseen by Washington, and most of the distinguished patriots of that period. Evil had accumulated upon evil, till the mass became too oppressive to be endured, and the voice of the nation cried out for relief. The first decisive measures proceeded from the merchants, who came forward almost simultaneously in all parts of the country, with representations of the utter prostration of the mercantile interests, and petitions for a speedy and efficient remedy. It was shown, that the advantages of this most important source of national prosperity were flowing into the hands of foreigners, and that the native merchants were suffering for the want of a just protection and a uniform system of trade. The wise and reflecting were convinced that some decided efforts were necessary to strengthen the general government, or that a dissolution of the union, and perhaps a devastating anarchy, would be inevitable.

literature and taste. The reading and thinking part of the community were delighted to witness the commencement of a new era in the rhetoric, eloquence, and logic of the pulpit; useless divisions and subdivisions, and their scholastic divinity, with loose and spongy declamation, gave place to fair inductions, correct illustrations, and philanthropic views. The ways of God to man were satisfactorily justified to the understandings of the mighty in intellect, and to the humble and lowly seekers of the truth. Religion wore the smile of innocence and the robe of purity, as she was destined to do from the beginning. The charms of a delicate and finished literature now came from the pulpit, and the temple of God became, as it ought ever to be, a place of instruction for the mind and for the affections, as well as for learning the great doctrines of salvation.—American Editor.

The first step towards a general reformation was rather accidental than premeditated. Certain citizens of Virginia and Maryland had formed a scheme for promoting the navigation of the Potomac and Chesapeake Bay, and commissioners were appointed by those two states to meet at Alexandria, and devise some plan of operation. These persons made a visit to Mount Vernon, and while there, it was proposed among themselves that more important objects should be connected with the purpose at first in view, and that the state governments should be solicited to appoint other commissioners, with enlarged powers, instructed to form a plan for maintaining a naval force in the Chesapeake, and also to fix upon some system of duties on exports and imports in which both states should agree, and that in the end congress should be petitioned to allow these privileges. This project was approved by the legislature of Virginia, and commissioners were accordingly appointed. The same legislature passed a resolution recommending the design to other states, and inviting them to unite, by their commissioners, in an attempt to establish such a system of commercial relations as would promote general harmony and prosperity. Five states only, in addition to Virginia, acceded to this proposition, namely, Maryland, Delaware, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and New York. From these states commissioners assembled at Annapolis, but they had hardly entered into a discussion of the topics which naturally forced themselves into view, before they discovered the powers with which they were intrusted to be so limited, as to tie up their hands from effecting any purpose that could be of essential utility. On this account, as well as from the circumstance that so few states were represented, they wisely declined deciding on any important measures in reference to the particular subject for which they had come together. This convention is memorable, however, as having been the prelude to the one which followed. Before the commissioners adjourned, a report was agreed upon, in which the necessity of a revision and reform of the articles of the old federal compact was strongly urged, and which contained a recommendation to all the state legislatures for the appointment of deputies, to meet at Philadelphia, with more ample powers and instructions. This proposal was eventually carried into effect, and, in conformity with it, a convention of delegates from the several states met at Philadelphia in May, 1787. Of this body of eminent statesmen, George Washington was unanimously elected president. They deliberated with closed doors during a period of four months. One party in the convention was anxious to enlarge, another to abridge, the authority delegated to the general government. This was the first germ of parties in the United States; not that materials were wanting, for the dissensions of the revolution had left behind some bitterness of spirit, and feelings that only awaited an opportunity for their disclosure. The divisions in the convention proved the foundation of many a subsequent struggle. At length a constitution was agreed on, which, after being reported to congress, was submitted for ratification to conventions held in the respective states. This constitution differs, in many important particulars, from the articles of confederation; and, by its regulations, connects the states more closely together, under a general and supreme government, composed of three departments, legislative, executive, and judicial; and invested with powers essential to its being respected, both by foreign nations and the states whose interest it was designed to secure. The provisions and characteristics of this interesting and important political code, will receive the consideration to which they are so justly entitled in another department of our work.

As that party which was desirous to extend the powers of the constitution, had been the most anxious for the formation of this system, and the most zealous advocates for its adoption, it almost naturally followed that the administration of it was committed to their hands. This party, which might, from their opinions, have been denominated nationalists, or, in more modern phraseology, centralists, acquired the name of federalists, while the appellation of anti-federalists was given to their antagonists. The latter, ardently attached to freedom, imagined that rulers, possessing such extensive sway, such abundant patronage, and such independent tenure of office, would become fond of the exercise of power, and in the end arrogant and tyrannical. The former, equally devoted to the cause of national liberty, contended that to preserve it an energetic government was necessary. They described, with powerful effect, the evils actually endured from the inefficiency of the confederation, and demanded that a trial at least should be made of the remedy proposed.

In eleven states, a majority, though in some instances a small one, decided in favour of the ratification of the constitution. Provision was then made for the election of the officers to compose the executive and legislative departments. In the highest station, the electors, by a unanimous vote, placed the illustrious Washington; and to the office of vice-president, by a vote nearly unanimous, they elevated John Adams, who, in stations less conspicuous, had, with equal patriotism, rendered important services to his country. On the 23d of April the president elect arrived at New York, where he was received by the governor of the state, and conducted, with military honours, through an immense concourse of people, to the apartments provided for him. Here he received the salutations of foreign ministers, public bodies, political characters, and private citizens of distinction, who pressed around him to offer their congratulations, and to express their joy at seeing the man who had the confidence of all, at the head of the American republic. On the 30th of April the president was inaugurated. Having taken the oath of office in an open gallery adjoining the senate chamber, in the view of an immense concourse of people, who attested their joy by loud and repeated acclamations, he returned to the senate chamber, where he delivered the following appropriate address:—

“Fellow-citizens of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

“Among the vicissitudes incident to life, no event could have filled me with greater anxieties, than that of which the notification was transmitted by your order, and received on the 14th day of the present month. On the one hand, I was summoned by my country, whose voice I can never hear but with veneration and love, from a retreat which I had chosen with the fondest predilection, and, in my flattering hopes, with an immutable decision, as the asylum of my declining years: a retreat which was rendered every day more necessary as well as more dear to me, by the addition of habit to inclination, and of frequent interruptions in my health to the gradual waste committed on it by time. On the other hand, the magnitude and difficulty of the trust to which the voice of my country called me, being sufficient to awaken in the wisest and most experienced of her citizens, a distrustful scrutiny into his qualifications, could not but overwhelm with despondence, one, who, inheriting inferior endowments from nature, and unpractised in the duties of civil administration, ought to be peculiarly conscious of his own deficiencies. In this conflict of emotions, all I dare aver is, that it has been my faithful study to collect my duty from a just appreciation of every circumstance by which it might be affected. All I dare hope, is, that, if in accepting this task, I have been too much swayed by a grateful remembrance of former instances, or by an affectionate sensibility to this transcendent proof of the confidence of my fellow citizens, and have thence too little consulted my incapacity as well as disinclination, for the weighty and untried cares before me, my error will be palliated by the motives which misled me, and its consequences be judged by my country, with some share of the partiality in which they originated.

“Such being the impressions under which I have in obedience to the public summons, repaired to the present station, it will be peculiarly improper to omit, in this first official act, my fervent supplications to that Almighty Being, who rules over the universe, who presides in the councils of nations, and whose providential aids can supply every human defect, that his benediction may consecrate to the liberties and happiness of the people of the United States, a government instituted by themselves for these essential purposes, and may enable every instrument employed in its administration, to execute with success the functions allotted to his charge. In tendering this homage to the great Author of every public and private good, I assure myself that it expresses your sentiments not less than my own; nor those of my fellow citizens at large less than either. No people can be bound to acknowledge and adore the invisible hand, which conducts the affairs of men, more than the people of the United States. Every step, by which they have advanced to the character of an independent nation, seems to have been distinguished by some token of providential agency. And in the important revolution just accomplished in the system of their united government, the tranquil deliberations, and voluntary consent of so many distinct communities, from which the event has resulted, cannot be compared with the means by which most governments have been established, without some return of pious gratitude, along with an humble anticipation of the future blessings which the past seem to presage. These reflections, arising out of the present crisis, have forced themselves too strongly on my mind to be suppressed. You will join with me, I trust, in thinking that there are none under the influence of which the proceedings of a new and free government can more auspiciously commence.

“By the article establishing the executive department, it is made the duty of the President, ‘to recommend to your consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient.’ The circumstances under which I now meet you, will acquit me from entering into that subject, further than to refer to the great constitutional charter under which you are assembled, and which, in defining your powers, designates the objects to which your attention is to be given. It will be more consistent with those circumstances, and far more congenial with the feelings which actuate me, to substitute, in place of a recommendation of particular measures, the tribute that is due to the talents, the rectitude, and the patriotism which adorn the characters selected to devise and adopt them. In these honourable qualifications, I behold the surest pledges, that, as on one side no local prejudices or attachments, no separate views nor party animosities, will misdirect the comprehensive and equal eye which ought to watch over this great assemblage of communities and interests ; so, on another, that the foundations of our national policy will be laid in the pure and immutable principles of private morality ; and the pre-eminence of free government be exemplified by all the attributes which can win the affections of its citizens, and command the respect of the world.

"I dwell on this prospect with every satisfaction which an ardent love for my country can inspire. Since there is no truth more thoroughly established, than that there exists in the economy and course of nature, an indissoluble union between virtue and happiness—between duty and advantage—between the genuine maxims of an honest and magnanimous policy, and the solid rewards of public prosperity and felicity ; since we ought to be no less persuaded that the propitious smiles of Heaven can never be expected on a nation that disregards the eternal rules of order and right which heaven itself has ordained : and since the preservation of the sacred fire of liberty, and the destiny of the republican model of government, are justly considered as deeply, perhaps as finally, staked on the experiment intrusted to the hands of the American people.

"Besides the ordinary objects submitted to your care, it will remain with your judgment to decide, how far an exercise of the occasional power delegated by the fifth article of the constitution, is rendered expedient at the present juncture by the nature of objections which have been urged against the system, or by the degree of inquietude which has given birth to them. Instead of undertaking particular recommendations on this subject, in which I could be guided by no lights derived from official opportunities, I shall again give way to my entire confidence in your discernment and pursuit of the public good. For I assure myself, that whilst you carefully avoid every alteration which might endanger the benefits of a united and effective government, or which ought to await the future lessons of experience ; a reverence for the characteristic rights of freemen, and a regard for the public harmony, will sufficiently influence your deliberations on the question, how far the former can be more impregably fortified, or the latter be safely and advantageously promoted.

"To the preceding observations I have one to add, which will be most properly addressed to the House of Representatives. It concerns myself, and will therefore be as brief as possible. When I was first honoured with a call into the service of my country, then on the eve of an arduous struggle for its liberties, the light in which I contemplated my duty required that I should renounce every pecuniary compensation. From this resolution I have in no instance departed. And being still under the impressions which produced it, I must decline, as inapplicable to myself, any share in the personal emoluments, which may be indispensably included in a permanent provision for the executive department ; and must accordingly pray, that the pecuniary estimates for the station in which I am placed, may, during my continuance in it, be limited to such actual expenditures as the public good may be thought to require.

"Having thus imparted to you my sentiments, as they have been awakened by the occasion which brings us together, I shall take my present leave ; but not without resorting once more to the benign Parent of the human race, in humble supplication, that since he has been pleased to favour the American people with opportunities for deliberating in perfect tranquillity, and dispositions for deciding with unparalleled unanimity on a form of government, for the security of their union, and the advancement of their happiness ; so his divine blessing may be equally conspicuous in the enlarged views, the temperate consultations, and the wise measures on which the success of this government must depend."

In their answer to this speech, the senate say, "The unanimous suffrage of the elective body in your favour, is peculiarly expressive of the gratitude, confidence, and affection of the citizens of America, and is the highest testimonial at once of your merit, and their esteem. We are sensible, sir, that nothing but the voice of your fellow citizens could have called you from a retreat, chosen with the fondest predilection, endeared by habit, and consecrated to the repose of declining years. We rejoice, and with us all America, that, in obedience to the call of our common country, you have returned once more to public life. In you all parties confide ; in you all interests unite ; and we have no doubt that your past services, great as they have been, will be equalled by your future exertions ; and that your prudence and sagacity, as a statesman, will tend to avert the dangers to which we were exposed, to give stability to the present government, and dignity and splendour to that country, which your skill and valour, as a soldier, so eminently contributed to raise to independence and to empire."

The affection for the person and character of the president with which the answer of the house of representatives glowed, promised that between this branch of the legislature also and the executive, the most harmonious co-operation in the public service might be expected.

"The representatives of the people of the United States," says this address, "present their congratulations on the event by which your fellow citizens have attested the pre-eminence of your merit. You have long held the first place in their esteem. You have often received tokens of their affection. You now possess the only proof that remained of their gratitude for your services, of their reverence for your wisdom, and of their confidence in your virtues. You enjoy the highest, because the truest honour, of being the first magistrate, by the unanimous choice of the freest people on the face of the earth."

After noticing the several communications made in the speech, intense of deep felt respect and affection, the answer concludes thus :

"Such are the sentiments with which we have thought fit to address you. They flow from our own hearts, and we verily believe that among the millions we represent, there is not a virtuous citizen whose heart will disown them.

"All that remains is, that we join in your fervent supplications for the blessing of heaven on our country; and that we add our own for the choicest of these blessings on the most beloved of her citizens."

The government being now completely organized, and a system of revenue established, the president proceeded to make appointments of suitable persons to fill the offices which had been created.* After a laborious and important session, in which perfect harmony subsisted between the executive and the legislature, congress adjourned on the 29th of September to the first Monday in the succeeding January.

At the next session of congress, which commenced in January, 1790, Mr. Hamilton, the secretary of the treasury, made his celebrated report upon the public debts contracted during the revolutionary war. Taking an able and enlarged view of the advantages of public credit, he recommended that not only the debts of the continental congress, but those of the states arising from their exertions in the common cause, should be funded or assumed by the general government; and that provision should be made for paying the interest, by imposing taxes on certain articles of luxury, and on spirits distilled within the country. The report of the secretary was largely discussed, and with great force of argument and eloquence. In conclusion, congress passed an act for the assumption of the state debts, and for funding the national debt. By the provisions of this act, 21,500,000 dollars of the state debts were assumed in specific proportions; and it was particularly enacted, that no certificate should be received from a state creditor which could be "ascertained to have been issued for any purpose other than compensations and expenditures for services or supplies towards the prosecution of the late war, and the defence of the United States, or of some part thereof, during the same." Thus was the national debt funded upon principles which considerably lessened the weight of the public burdens, and gave much satisfaction to the public creditors. The produce of the sales of the lands lying in the western territory, and the surplus product of the revenue, after satisfying the appropriations which were charged upon it, with the addition of two millions which the president was authorized to borrow at five per cent., constituted a sinking fund to be applied to the reduction of the debt. The effect of these measures was great and rapid. The permanent value thus given to the debt produced a result equal to the most favourable anticipations. The sudden increase of monied capital derived from it invigorated commerce, and consequently gave a new stimulus to agriculture.

It has already been stated, that when the new government was first organized, but eleven states had ratified the constitution. Afterwards North Carolina and Rhode Island, the two dissenting states, adopted it; the former in November, 1789, the latter in May, 1790. In 1791, Vermont adopted it, and applied to congress to be admitted into the union. An act was also passed, declaring that the district of Kentucky, then part of Virginia, should be admitted into the union on the 1st day of June in the succeeding year.

During the year 1790, a termination was put to the war which, for several years, had raged between the Creek Indians and the state of Georgia. Pacific overtures were also made to the hostile tribes inhabiting the banks of the Sciota and the Wabash. These being rejected, an army of fourteen hundred men, commanded by General Harmer, was despatched against them. Two battles were fought near Chillicothe, in Ohio, between successive detachments from this army and the Indians, in which the latter were victorious. Emboldened by these successes, they continued to make more vigorous attacks upon the frontier settlements, which suffered all the distressing calamities of an Indian war. Additional troops were raised, and the command of the whole, amounting to nearly two thousand men, was given to General St. Clair. By desertion and detachments, this force was, however, reduced to fourteen hundred, when, on the 3d of November, 1791, they encamped a few miles from the villages on the Miami. But before sunrise the next morning, just after the troops were dismissed from the parade, they were attacked unexpectedly by the Indians. The new levies, who were in front, rushed back in confusion upon the regulars. The latter, however, with great intrepidity, advanced into the midst of the enemy, who retired from covert to covert, keeping always beyond reach, and again returning as soon as the troops were recalled from pursuit. At length, after a contest of three or four hours, St. Clair, whose ill-health disabled him from performing the active duties of commander, determined to withdraw from the field the remnant of his troops; fortunately, the victorious Indians preferred the plunder of the camp to pursuit, and the vanquished continued their retreat unmolested to the frontier settlements. In this battle, the numbers engaged on each side were supposed to be equal. Of the whites, the slaughter was almost beyond example. Six hundred and thirty were killed and missing, and two hundred and sixty were wounded—a loss which proves at once the obstinacy of the defence, and the bravery of the assailants. On receiving information of this disaster, congress, resolving to prosecute the war with increased vigour, made provision for augmenting, by enlistment, the military force of the nation to five thousand men.

In the course of this year was completed the first census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States. They amounted to 3,921,326, of which number 695,655 were slaves. The revenue, according to the report of the secretary of the treasury, amounted to 4,771,000 dollars, the exports to about nineteen, and the imports to about twenty millions. A great improvement in the circumstances of the people began at this period to be visible. The establishment of a firm and regular government, and confidence in the men whom they had chosen to administer it, gave an impulse to their exertions which bore them rapidly forward in the career of prosperity.

Pursuant to the authority contained in the several acts on the subject of a permanent seat of the government of the United States, a district of ten miles square for this purpose was fixed on, comprehending lands on both sides of the River Potomac, and the towns of Alexandria and Georgetown. A city was laid out, and the sales which took place produced funds for carrying on the necessary public buildings.

The war in Europe had embraced those powers with whom the United States had the most extensive relations. The French people regarded the Americans as their brethren, bound to them by the ties of gratitude; and when the kings of Europe, dreading the establishment of republicanism in her borders, assembled in arms to restore monarchy to France, they looked across the Atlantic for sympathy and assistance. The new government, recalling the minister whom the king had appointed, despatched the citizen Genet, of ardent temper and a zealous republican, to supply his place. In April, 1793, he arrived at Charleston, in South Carolina, where he was received by the governor and the citizens, in a manner expressive of their warm attachment to his country, and their cordial approbation of the change of her institutions. Flattered by his reception, and presuming that the nation and the government were actuated by similar feelings, he undertook to authorize the fitting and arming of vessels in that port, enlisting men, and giving commissions to cruise and commit hostilities on nations with whom the United States were at peace; captured vessels were brought into port, and the consuls of France assumed, under the authority of M. Genet, to hold courts of admiralty on them, to try, condemn, and authorize their sale. The declaration of war made by France against Great Britain and Holland reached the United States early in the same month. The president,* regarding the situation of these states, issued his proclamation of neutrality on the 9th of May. In July, he requested the recall of M. Genet, who was soon afterwards recalled, and succeeded by M. Fauchet.

After the defeat of St. Clair by the Indians, in 1791, General Wayne was appointed to command the American forces. Taking post near the country of the enemy, he made assiduous and long protracted endeavours to negotiate a peace. Failing in these, he marched against them at the head of three thousand men. On the 20th of August, 1794, an action took place in the vicinity of one of the British garrisons, on the banks of the Miami. A rapid and vigorous charge roused the savages from their coverts, and they were driven more than two miles at the point of the bayonet. Broken and dismayed, they fled without renewing the combat. In this decisive battle, the loss of the Americans in killed and wounded, including officers, was one hundred and seven. Among the slain were Captain Campbell and Lieutenant Fowles, both of whom fell in the first charge. The American troops engaged in the battle did not amount to nine hundred; the number of Indians was two thousand. After remaining on the banks of the Miami three days, during which time the houses and cornfields above and below the fort were burnt, General Wayne, on the 28th, returned with the army to Au Glaize, having destroyed all the villages and corn within fifty miles of the river. The Indians still continuing hostilities, their whole country was laid waste, and forts were erected in the heart of their settlements. The effect of the battle of the 20th of August was instantly and extensively felt. To the victory gained by the Americans is ascribed the rescue of the United States from a general war with the Indians north-west of the Ohio; and its influence is believed to have extended to the Indians in Georgia. In 1795, a treaty was concluded at Grenville, which, long and faithfully observed, gave peace and security to the frontier inhabitants, permitting the superabundant population of the eastern states to spread with astonishing rapidity over the fertile region northwest of the Ohio.

The year 1794 is distinguished by an insurrection in Pennsylvania. In 1791, congress had enacted laws, laying duties upon spirits distilled within the United States, and upon stills. From the commencement of the operation of these laws, combinations were formed in the four western counties of Pennsylvania to defeat them, and violence was repeatedly committed. In July of the present year, about one hundred persons, armed with guns and other weapons, attacked the house of an inspector of the revenue, and wounded some persons within it. They seized the marshal of the district of Pennsylvania, who had been previously fired on while in the execution of his duty by a party of armed men, and compelled him to enter into stipulations to forbear the execution of his office. Both the inspector and the marshal were obliged to fly from that part of the country to the seat of government. These and many other outrages induced President Washington, on the 7th of August, to issue a proclamation, commanding the insurgents to disperse, and warning all persons against aiding, abetting, or comforting the perpetrators of these treasonable acts, and requiring all officers, and other citizens, according to their respective duties and the laws of the land, to exert their utmost endeavours to prevent and suppress such dangerous proceedings. On the 25th of September the president issued a second proclamation, admonishing the insurgents; forcibly describing the obstinate and perverse spirit with which the lenient propositions of the government had been received; and declaring his fixed determination, in obedience to the duty assigned to him by the constitution, "to take care that the laws be faithfully executed," and to reduce the refractory to obedience. Fifteen thousand men, placed under the command of Governor Lee, of Virginia, were marched into the disaffected counties. The strength of this army rendering resistance desperate, none was offered, and no blood was shed. A few of the most active leaders were seized and detained for legal prosecution. The great body of the insurgents, on submission, were pardoned, as were also the leaders, after trial and conviction of treason. The government acquired the respect of the people by this exertion of its force and their affection by this display of its lenity.

Great Britain and the United States had each been incessantly complaining that the other had violated the stipulations contained in the treaty of peace. The former was accused of having carried away negroes at the close of the revolutionary war; and of retaining in her possession certain military posts situated in the western wilderness, and within the limits of the United States. The latter were accused of preventing the loyalists from regaining possession of their estates, and British subjects from recovering debts contracted before the commencement of hostilities. For the purpose of adjusting these mutual complaints, and also for concluding a commercial treaty, Mr. Adams had been appointed, in 1785, minister to the court of St. James; the British ministry then declined negotiating on the subject; but after the constitution of 1789 was ratified, ministers were interchanged, and the discussion was prosecuted with no little zeal. In 1794, Mr. Jay being then minister from the United States, a treaty was concluded, which, in the spring of the next year, was laid before the senate. That body advised the president to ratify it, on condition that an alteration should be made in one of the articles. The democratic party, however, exclaimed in intemperate language against most of the stipulations it contained; and the partisans of France swelled the cry of condemnation. Public meetings were held in various parts of the union, at which resolutions were passed expressing warm disapprobation of the treaty, and an earnest wish that the president would withhold his ratification. General Washington, believing that an adjustment of differences would conduce to the prosperity of the republic, and that the treaty before him was the best that could, at that time, be obtained, gave it his assent, in defiance of popular clamour, and issued his proclamation stating its ratification, and declaring it to be the law of the land. The predominant party in the house of representatives expressed surprise that this proclamation should be issued before the sense of the house was taken on the subject, as they denied the power of the president and senate to complete a treaty without their sanction. In March, a resolution passed, requesting the president "to lay before the house a copy of the instructions to the minister of the United States, who negotiated the treaty with the king of Great Britain communicated by his message of the 1st of March, together with the correspondence and other documents relative to the said treaty, excepting such of the said papers as any existing negotiation may render improper to be disclosed." This resolve placed the president in a situation of high responsibility. He knew that the majority of the house entertained the opinion that a treaty was not valid until they had acted upon it. To oppose, in a government constituted like that of the United States, the popular branch of the legislature, would be attended with hazard, and subject him to much censure and abuse; but considerations of this nature make but weak impressions on a mind supremely solicitous to promote the public interest. Upon the most mature deliberation, the president conceived that to grant this request of the house would establish a false and dangerous principle in the diplomatic transactions of the nation, and he gave a denial to their request in an answer eminent for mildness, firmness, and perspicuity, which concluded with the following brief recapitulation of the argument: "As, therefore, it is perfectly clear to my understanding that the assent of the house of representatives is not necessary to the validity of a treaty; as the treaty with Great Britain exhibits in itself all the objects requiring legislative provision, and on these the papers called for can throw no light; and as it is essential to the due administration of the government, that the boundaries fixed by the constitution between the different departments should be preserved; a just regard to the constitution, and to the duty of my office, under all the circumstances of this case, forbid a compliance with your request."

A resolution moved in the house to make the necessary appropriations to carry the British treaty into effect, excited among the members the strongest emotions, and gave rise to speeches highly argumentative, eloquent, and animated. The debate was protracted until the people took up the subject: In their respective corporations meetings were held, the strength of parties was fully tried, and it clearly appeared that the great majority were disposed to rally around the executive. Innumerable petitions were presented to congress, praying them to make the requisite appropriations. Unwilling to take upon themselves the consequences of resisting the public will, they yielded to this call.

The conduct of Spain towards the United States had always been cold and unfriendly. She feared lest the principles of liberty and the desire of independence should find their way into her contiguous American provinces. At length, becoming involved in a war with France, embarrassed at home, and intimidated by the unauthorized preparations which, under the auspices of Genet, were making in Kentucky to invade Louisiana, she intimated her readiness to conclude a satisfactory treaty, should an envoy extraordinary be sent to Madrid for that purpose. Thomas Pinckney was accordingly appointed. In October, 1795, a treaty was signed, securing to the citizens of the United States the free navigation of the Mississippi to the ocean, and the privilege of landing and depositing cargoes at New Orleans.

During this year also a treaty was concluded with the regency of Algiers, with which the republic was previously at war. It stipulated that the United States, in conformity with the practice of other nations, should, as the price of peace, pay an annual tribute to the sovereign of that country.

The last two or three years had witnessed several changes in the important offices of the nation. On the first day of the year 1794, Mr. Jefferson resigned the office of secretary of state, and was succeeded by Mr. Randolph. He had performed the duties of that office with extraordinary ability, and to the entire satisfaction of the president. He was considered the leader of the republican party, enjoying their highest confidence and warmest attachment. On the last day of January, 1795, Mr. Hamilton retired from the office of secretary of the treasury. He possessed distinguished talents, and had exerted those talents to establish order where all was confusion, and to raise from the lowest depression the credit of the country. His complete success greatly exalted his reputation, and to him the federalists felt a sincerity of attachment equalled only by that entertained for Washington. He was peculiarly obnoxious to the republican party, and was accused by them of partiality to England, and of misconduct in office. After the closest scrutiny, his official character was acknowledged, by his enemies, to be without stain. He was succeeded by Oliver Wolcott. At the close of the year 1794, General Knox resigned the office of secretary of war, and Colonel Pickering, of Massachusetts, was appointed in his place. In August Mr. Randolph, having lost the confidence of the president, and having in consequence retired from the administration, Mr. Pickering was appointed his successor in the department of state, and James M'Henry, of Maryland, was made secretary of war. No republican being now at the head of any of the departments, many of the leaders of that party withdrew their support from the administration; but the confidence of the people in the integrity and patriotism of the president experienced not the slightest abatement.

The conduct adopted by France towards the American republic continued to be a source of vexation. M. Fauchet charged the administration with sentiments of hostility to the allies of the United States, with partiality for their former foes, and urged the adoption of a course more favourable to the cause of liberty. Mr. Morris, the minister to Paris, having incurred the displeasure of those in power, was recalled at their request, and his place supplied by Mr. Monroe. Being an ardent republican, he was received in the most respectful manner by the convention, who decreed that the flags of the two republics, entwined together, should be suspended in the legislative hall, as a mark of their eternal union and friendship. M. Adet was appointed soon after to succeed M. Fauchet. He brought with him the colours

* Friends and fellow-citizens,

The period for a new election of a citizen to administer the executive government of the United States, being not far distant, and the time actually arrived when your thoughts must be employed in designating the person who is to be clothed with that important trust, it appears to me proper, especially as it may conduce to a more distinct expression of the public voice, that I should now apprise you of the resolution I have formed, to decline being considered among the number of those out of whom a choice is to be made.

I beg you, at the same time, to do me the justice to be assured, that this resolution has not been taken without a strict regard to all the considerations appertaining to the relation which binds a dutiful citizen to his country; and that, in withdrawing the tender of service, which silence, in my situation, might imply, I am influenced by no diminution of zeal for your future interest; no deficiency of grateful respect for your past kindness; but am supported by a full conviction that the step is compatible with both.

The acceptance of, and continuance hitherto in the office to which your suffrages have twice called me, have been a uniform sacrifice of inclination to the opinion of duty, and to a deference for what appeared to be your desire. I constantly hoped that it would have been much earlier in my power, consistently with motives which I was not at liberty to disregard, to return to that retirement from which I had been reluctantly drawn. The strength of my inclination to do this, previous to the last election, had even led to the preparation of an address to declare it to you; but mature reflection on the then perplexed and critical posture of our affairs with foreign nations, and the unanimous advice of persons entitled to my confidence, impelled me to abandon the idea. I rejoice that the state of your concerns, external as well as internal, no longer renders the pursuit of inclination incompatible with the sentiment of duty or propriety; and am persuaded, whatever partiality may be retained for my services, that, in the present circumstances of our country, you will not disapprove my determination to retire.

The impressions with which I first undertook the arduous trust, were explained on the proper occasion. In the discharge of this trust, I will only say, that I have with good intentions contributed towards the organization and administration of the government, the best exertions of which a very fallible judgment was capable. Not unconscious in the outset, of the inferiority of my qualifications, experience in my own eyes, perhaps still more in the eyes of others, has strengthened the motives to diffidence of myself; and every day the increasing weight of years, admonishes me more and more, that the shade of retirement is as necessary to me as it will be welcome. Satisfied that if any circumstances have given peculiar value to my services, they were temporary, I have the consolation to believe, that while choice and prudence invite me to quit the political scene, patriotism does not forbid it.

In looking forward to the moment which is intended to terminate the career of my public life, my feelings do not permit me to suspend the deep acknowledgment of that debt of gratitude which I owe to my beloved country, for the many honours it has conferred ought to be engraven upon the hearts of his countrymen. In the most earnest and affectionate manner he called upon them to cherish an immoveable attach-upon me; still more for the steadfast confidence with which it has supported me; and for the opportunities I have thence enjoyed, of manifesting my inviolable attachment, by services faithful and persevering, though in usefulness unequal to my zeal. If benefits have resulted to our country from these services, let it always be remembered to your praise, and as an instructive example in our annals, that, under circumstances in which the passions, agitated in every direction, were liable to mislead, amidst appearances sometimes dubious, vicissitudes of fortune, often discouraging, in situations in which, not unfrequently, want of success has countenanced the spirit of criticism, the constancy of your support was the essential prop of the efforts, and a guarantee of the plans by which they were effected. Profoundly penetrated with this idea, I shall carry it with me to my grave, as a strong incitement to unceasing vows, that Heaven may continue to you the choicest tokens of its beneficence; that your union and brotherly affection may be perpetual; that the free constitution, which is the work of your hands, may be sacredly maintained; that its administration, in every department, may be stamped with wisdom and virtue; that, in fine, the happiness of the people of these states, under the auspices of liberty, may be made complete, by so careful a preservation, and so prudent a use of this blessing, as will acquire to them the glory of recommending it to the applause, the affection, and the adoption of every nation which is yet a stranger to it.

Here, perhaps, I ought to stop; but a solicitude for your welfare, which can not end but with my life, and the apprehension of danger natural to that solicitude, urge me, on an occasion like the present, to offer to your solemn contemplation, and to recommend to your frequent review, some sentiments, which are the result of much reflection—of no inconsiderable observation—and which appear to me all important to the permanency of your felicity as a people. These will be afforded to you with the more freedom, as you can only see in them the disinterested warnings of a parting friend, who can possibly have no personal motive to bias his counsel; nor can I forget, as an encouragement to it, your indulgent reception of my sentiments on a former and not dissimilar occasion.

Interwoven as is the love of liberty with every ligament of your hearts, no recommendation of mine is necessary to fortify or confirm the attachment.

The unity of government, which constitutes you one people, is also now dear to you. It is justly so; for it is a main pillar in the edifice of your real independence; the support of your tranquillity at home, your peace abroad; of your safety; of your prosperity; of that very liberty which you so highly prize. But as it is easy to foresee, that from different causes and from different quarters, much pains will be taken, many artifices employed, to weaken, in your minds, the conviction of this truth; as this is the point in your political fortress against which the batteries of internal and external enemies will be most constantly and actively (though often covertly and insidiously) directed, it is of infinite moment that you should properly estimate the immense value of your national union, to your collective and individual happiness; that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, and immoveable attachment to it; accustoming yourselves to think and speak of it as of the palladium of your political safety and prosperity; watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety; discountenancing whatever may suggest even a suspicion that it can, in any event, be abandoned; and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts.

For this you have every inducement of sympathy and interest. Citizens by birth or choice, of a common country, that country has a right to concentrate your affections. The name of American, which belongs to you in your national capacity, must always exalt the just pride of patriotism, more than any appellation derived from local discriminations. With slight shades of difference, you have the same religion, manners, habits, and political principles. You have, in a common cause, fought and triumphed together: the independence and liberty you possess, are the work of joint coun-ment to the national union, to watch for its preservation with jealous anxiety, to discountenance even the suggestion that it could in any event be abandoned, cils and joint efforts, of common dangers, sufferings, and successes.

But these considerations, however powerfully they address themselves to your sensibility, are greatly outweighed by those which apply more immediately to your interest: here every portion of our country finds the most commanding motives for carefully guarding and preserving the union of the whole.

The North, in an unrestrained intercourse with the South, protected by the equal laws of a common government, finds, in the productions of the latter, great additional resources of maritime and commercial enterprise, and precious materials of manufacturing industry. The South, in the same intercourse, benefiting by the same agency of the North, sees its agriculture grow, and its commerce expand. Turning partly into its own channels the seamen of the North, it finds its particular navigation invigorated: and while it contributes, in different ways, to nourish and increase the general mass of the national navigation, it looks forward to the protection of a maritime strength, to which itself is unequally adapted. The East, in like intercourse with the West, already finds, and in the progressive improvement of interior communication, by land and water, will more and more find a valuable vent for the commodities which it brings from abroad, or manufactures at home. The West derives from the East supplies requisite to its growth and comfort; and what is perhaps of still greater consequence, it must, of necessity, owe the secure enjoyment of indispensable outlets for its own productions, to the weight, influence, and the future maritime strength of the Atlantic side of the union, directed by an indissoluble community of interest as one nation. Any other tenure by which the West can hold this essential advantage, whether derived from its own separate strength, or from an apostate and unnatural connexion with any foreign power, must be intrinsically precarious.

While, then, every part of our country thus feels an immediate and particular interest in union, all the parts combined can not fail to find, in the united mass of means and efforts, greater strength, greater resource, proportionably greater security from external danger, a less frequent interruption of their peace by foreign nations: and what is of inestimable value, they must derive from union an exemption from those broils and wars between themselves, which so frequently afflict neighbouring countries, not tied together by the same government; which their own rivalships alone would be sufficient to produce, but which opposite foreign alliances, attachments, and intrigues, would stimulate and embitter. Hence, likewise, they will avoid the necessity of those overgrown military establishments, which, under any form of government, are inauspicious to liberty, and which are to be regarded as particularly hostile to republican liberty; in this sense it is, that your union ought to be considered as a main prop of your liberty, and that the love of the one ought to endeavor to you the preservation of the other.

These considerations speak a persuasive language to every reflecting and virtuous mind, and exhibit the continuance of the union as a primary object of patriotic desire. Is there a doubt, whether a common government can embrace so large a sphere? Let experience solve it. To listen to mere speculation in such a case, were criminal. We are authorized to hope, that a proper organization of the whole, with the auxiliary agency of governments for the respective subdivisions, will afford a happy issue to the experiment. It is well worth a fair and full experiment. With such powerful and obvious motives to union, affecting all parts of our country, while experience shall not have demonstrated its impracticability, there will always be reason to distrust the patriotism of those who, in any quarter, may endeavour to weaken its bands.

In contemplating the causes which may disturb our union, it occurs as a matter of serious concern, that any ground should have been furnished for characterizing parties by geographical discriminations:—Northern and Southern: Atlantic and Western: whence designing men may endeavour to excite a belief that there is a real difference of local interests and views. One of the expedients of

party to acquire influence within particular districts is, to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other districts. You cannot shield yourselves too much against the jealousies and heart burnings which spring from these misrepresentations: they tend to render alien to each other those who ought to be bound together by fraternal affection. The inhabitants of our western country have lately had a useful lesson on this head; they have seen in the negotiation by the executive, and in the unanimous ratification by the senate, of the treaty with Spain, and in the universal satisfaction at that event throughout the United States, a decisive proof how unfounded were the suspicions propagated among them, of a policy in the general government, and in the Atlantic states, unfriendly to their interests, in regard to the Mississippi: they have been witnesses to the formation of two treaties; that with Great Britain, and that with Spain, which secure to them every thing they could desire, in respect to our foreign relations, towards confirming their prosperity. Will it not be their wisdom to rely for the preservation of these advantages on the union by which they were procured? Will they not henceforth be deaf to those advisers, if such there are, who would sever them from their brethren, and connect them with aliens?

To the efficacy and permanency of your union, a government for the whole is indispensable. No alliance, however strict between the parts, can be an adequate substitute; they must inevitably experience the infractions and interruptions which all alliances, in all times, have experienced. Sensible of this momentous truth, you have improved upon your first essay, by the adoption of a constitution of government better calculated than your former, for an intimate union, and for the efficacious management of your common concerns. This government, the offspring of our own choice, uninfluenced and unawed, adopted upon full investigation and mature deliberation, completely free in its principles, in the distribution of its powers, uniting security with energy, and containing within itself a provision for its own amendment, has a just claim to your confidence and your support. Respect for its authority, compliance with its laws, acquiescence in its measures, are duties enjoined by the fundamental maxims of true liberty. The basis of our political systems is, the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions of government: but the constitution which at any time exists, till changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people, is sacredly obligatory upon all. The very idea of the power and the right of the people to establish government, pre-supposes the duty of every individual to obey the established government.

All obstructions to the execution of the laws, all combinations and associations, under whatever plausible character, with the real design to direct, control, counteract, or awe the regular deliberation and action of the constituted authorities, are destructive of this fundamental principle, and of fatal tendency. They serve to organize faction, to give it an artificial and extraordinary force, to put in the place of the delegated will of the nation, the will of a party, often a small but artful and enterprising minority of the community: and, according to the alternate triumphs of different parties, to make the public administration the mirror of the ill-concerted and incongruous projects of faction, rather than the organ of consistent and wholesome plans, digested by common councils, and modified by mutual interests.

However combinations or associations of the above description may now and then answer popular ends, they are likely, in the course of time and things, to become potent engines, by which cunning, ambitious, and unprincipled men, will be enabled to subvert the power of the people, and to usurp for themselves the reins of government; destroying, afterwards, the very engines which had lifted them to unjust dominion.

Towards the preservation of your government, and the permanency of your present happy state, it is requisite, not only that you steadily discountenance irregular oppositions to its acknowledged authority, but also, that you resist with care the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however specious the pretends. One method he represented as particularly hostile to republican liberty. While he recommended the most implicit obedience to the acts of the established government, of assault may be to effect, in the forms of the constitution, alterations which will impair the energy of the system, and thus to undermine what can not be directly overthrown. In all the changes to which you may be invited, remember, that time and habit are at least as necessary to fix the true character of governments, as of other human institutions; that experience is the surest standard by which to test the real tendency of the existing constitution of a country; that facility in changes, upon the credit of mere hypothesis and opinion, exposes to perpetual change, from the endless variety of hypotheses and opinion; and remember, especially, that for the efficient management of your common interests, in a country so extensive as ours, a government of as much vigour as is consistent with the perfect security of liberty, is indispensable. Liberty itself will find in such a government, with powers properly distributed and adjusted, its surest guardian. It is, indeed, little else than a name, where the government is too feeble to withstand the enterprises of faction, to confine each member of the society within the limits prescribed by the laws, and to maintain all in the secure and tranquil enjoyment of the rights of person and property.

I have already intimated to you the danger of parties in the state, with particular reference to the founding of them on geographical discriminations. Let me now take a more comprehensive view, and warn you, in the most solemn manner, against the baneful effects of the spirit of party generally.

The spirit, unfortunately, is inseparable from our nature, having its root in the strongest passions of the human mind. It exists, under different shapes, in all governments, more or less stifled, controlled, or repressed; but in those of the popular form it is seen in its greatest rankness, and is truly their worst enemy.

The alternate domination of one faction over another, sharpened by the spirit of revenge, natural to party dissension, which, in different ages and countries, has perpetrated the most horrid enormities, is itself a frightful despotism. But this leads, at length, to a more formal and permanent despotism. The disorders and miseries which result, gradually incline the minds of men to seek security and repose in the absolute power of an individual, and, sooner or later, the chief of some prevailing faction, more able or more fortunate than his competitors, turns this disposition to the purposes of his own elevation on the ruins of public liberty.

Without looking forward to an extremity of this kind, (which, nevertheless, ought not to be entirely out of sight,) the common and continual mischiefs of the spirit of party are sufficient to make it the interest and duty of a wise people to discourage and restrain it.

It serves always to distract the public councils, and enfeeble the public administration. It agitates the community with ill-founded jealousies and false alarms; kindles the animosity of one part against another; foment, occasionally, riot and insurrection. It opens the door to foreign influence and corruption, which find a facilitated access to the government itself, through the channels of party passions. Thus the policy and the will of one country are subjected to the policy and will of another.

There is an opinion, that parties, in free countries, are useful checks upon the administration of the government, and serve to keep alive the spirit of liberty. This, within certain limits, is probably true; and in governments of a monarchical cast, patriotism may look with indulgence, if not with favour, upon the spirit of party. But in those of the popular character, in governments purely elective, it is a spirit not to be encouraged. From their natural tendency, it is certain there will always be enough of that spirit for every salutary purpose. And there being constant danger of excess, the effort ought to be, by force of public opinion, to mitigate and assuage it. A fire not to be quenched, it demands a uniform vigilance to prevent its bursting into a flame, lest, instead of warming, it should consume.

It is important, likewise, that the habits of thinking, in a free country, should inspire caution in those entrusted with its administration, to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department, to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power, and proneness to abuse it, which predominates in the human heart, is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position. The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositories, and constituting each the guardian of the public weal, against invasions by the others, has been evinced by experiments ancient and modern: some of them in our own country, and under our own eyes. To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them. If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be, in any particular, wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the constitution designates. But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this, in one instance, may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance, in permanent evil, any partial or transient benefit which the use can, at any time, yield.

Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism, who should labour to subvert these great pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens. The mere politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and cherish them. A volume could not trace all their connexions with private and public felicity. Let it simply be asked, where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths, which are the instruments of investigation in courts of justice? And let us with caution indulge the supposition, that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principles.

It is substantially true, that virtue or morality is a necessary spring of popular government. The rule indeed extends with more or less force to every species of free government. Who, that is a sincere friend to it, can look with indifference upon attempts to shake the foundation of the fabric.

Promote, then, as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion, it is essential that public opinion should be enlightened.

As a very important source of strength and security, cherish public credit. One method of preserving it is to use it as sparingly as possible: avoiding occasions of expense by cultivating peace, but remembering also that timely disbursements to prepare for danger, frequently prevent much greater disbursements to repel it; avoiding, likewise, the accumulation of debt, not only by shunning occasions of expense, but by vigorous exertions in time of peace, to discharge the debts, which unavoidable wars may have occasioned, not ungenerously throwing upon posterity the burden which we ourselves ought to bear. The execution of these maxims belongs to your representatives, but it is necessary that public opinion should co-operate. To facilitate to them the performance of their duty, it is essential that you should practically bear in mind, that, towards the payment of debts there must be revenue; that to have revenue there must be taxes; that no taxes can be devised which are not more or less inconvenient and unpleasant; that the intrinsic embarrassment, inseparable from the selection of the proper objects, (which is always a choice of difficulties,) ought to be a decisive motive for a candid construction of the conduct of the government in making it, and for a spirit of acquiescence in the measures for obtaining revenue which the public exigencies may at any time dictate.

Observe good faith and justice towards all nations; cultivate peace and harmony with all. Religion and morality enjoin this conduct; and can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it? It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and, at no distant period, direct, control, counteract, or overawe the regular deliberation and action of the constituted authorities, he wished also to guard against the spirit of innova-

a great nation, to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence. Who can doubt but, in the course of time and things, the fruits of such a plan would richly repay any temporary advantages which might be lost by a steady adherence to it? Can it be, that Providence has not connected the permanent felicity of a nation with its virtue? The experiment, at least, is recommended by every sentiment which ennobles human nature. Alas! is it rendered impossible by its vices?

In the execution of such a plan, nothing is more essential than that permanent inveterate antipathies against particular nations, and passionate attachments for others, should be excluded; and that, in place of them, just and amicable feelings towards all should be cultivated. The nation which indulges towards another an habitual hatred, or an habitual fondness, is, in some degree, a slave. It is a slave to its animosity or to its affection, either of which is sufficient to lead it astray from its duty and its interest. Antipathy in one nation against another, disposes each more readily to offer insult and injury, to lay hold of slight causes of umbrage, and to be haughty and intractable, when accidental or trifling occasions of dispute occur. Hence frequent collisions, obstinate, envenomed, and bloody contests. The nation, prompted by ill will and resentment, sometimes impels to war the government, contrary to the best calculations of policy. The government sometimes participates in the national propensity, and adopts, through passion, what reason would reject; at other times, it makes the animosity of the nation subservient to projects of hostility instigated by pride, ambition, and other sinister and pernicious motives. The peace often, sometimes perhaps the liberty, of nations has been the victim.

So, likewise, a passionate attachment of one nation to another produces a variety of evils. Sympathy for the favourite nation, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest, in cases where no real common interest exists, and infusing into one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels and wars of the latter, without adequate inducement or justification. It leads also to concessions to the favourite nation of privileges denied to others, which is apt doubly to injure the nation making the concessions; by unnecessarily parting with what ought to have been retained, and by exciting jealousy, ill will, and a disposition to retaliate, in the parties from whom equal privileges are withheld; and it gives to ambitious, corrupted, or deluded citizens (who devote themselves to the favourite nation) facility to betray, or sacrifice the interest of their own country, without odium, sometimes even with popularity; gilding with the appearances of a virtuous sense of obligation, a commendable deference for public opinion, or a laudable zeal for public good, the base or foolish compliances of ambition, corruption, or infatuation.

As avenues to foreign influence in innumerable ways, such attachments are particularly alarming to the truly enlightened and independent patriot. How many opportunities do they afford to tamper with domestic factions, to practise the art of seduction, to mislead public opinion, to influence or awe the public councils! Such an attachment of a small or weak, towards a great and powerful nation, dooms the former to be the satellite of the latter.

Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence (I conjure you to believe me, fellow citizens) the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake; since history and experience prove that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government. But that jealousy, to be useful, must be impartial; else it becomes the instrument of the very influence to be avoided, instead of a defence against it. Excessive partiality for one foreign nation, and excessive dislike for another, cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side, and serve to veil and even second the arts of influence on the other. Real patriots, who may resist the intrigues of the favourite, are liable to become suspected and odious; while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people, to surrender their interests.

The great rule of conduct for us, in regard to foreign nations, is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little tion upon the principles of the constitution. Aware that the energy of the system might be enfeebled by alterations, he thought that no change should be made without an evident necessity; and that, in so extensive a country, as much vigour as is consistent with liberty was indispensable. On the other hand, he pointed out the danger of a real despotism, by breaking down the partitions between the several departments of government, by destroying the reciprocal political connexion as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith.—Here let us stop.

Europe has a set of primary interests, which to us have none, or a very remote relation. Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves, by artificial ties, in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities.

Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon, to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation; when we may choose peace or war, as our interest, guided by justice, shall counsel.

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalry, interest, humour, or caprice?

It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliances with any portion of the foreign world; so far, I mean, as we are now at liberty to do it; for let me not be understood as capable of patronising infidelity to existing engagements. I hold the maxim no less applicable to public than to private affairs, that honesty is always the best policy. I repeat it, therefore, let those engagements be observed in their genuine sense. But, in my opinion, it is unnecessary and would be unwise to extend them.

Taking care always to keep ourselves, by suitable establishments, on a respectable defensive posture, we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies.

Harmony, and a liberal intercourse with all nations, are recommended by policy, humanity, and interest. But even our commercial policy should hold an equal and impartial hand; neither seeking nor granting exclusive favours or preferences; consulting the natural course of things; diffusing and diversifying, by gentle means, the streams of commerce, but forcing nothing: establishing, with powers so disposed, in order to give trade a stable course, to define the rights of our merchants, and to enable the government to support them, conventional rules of intercourse, the best that present circumstances and mutual opinions will permit, but temporary, and liable to be, from time to time, abandoned or varied, as experience and circumstances shall dictate; constantly keeping in view, that it is folly in one nation to look for disinterested favours from another; that it must pay with a portion of its independence for whatever it may accept under that character; that by such acceptance, it may place itself in the condition of having given equivalents for nominal favours, and yet of being reproached with ingratitude for not giving more. There can be no greater error than to expect or calculate upon real favours from nation to nation. It is an illusion, which experience must cure, which a just pride ought to discard.

In offering to you, my countrymen, these counsels of an old and affectionate friend, I dare not hope they will make the strong and lasting impression I could wish; that they will control the usual current of the passions, or prevent our nation from running the course which has hitherto marked the destiny of nations; but if I checks, and consolidating the different powers. Against the spirit of party, so peculiarly baneful in an elective government, he uttered his most solemn remonstrances, as well as against inveterate antipathies or passionate attachments in respect to foreign nations. While he thought that the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly and impartially awake against the wiles of foreign influence, he wished that good faith and justice should be observed may even flatter myself, that they may be productive of some partial benefit, some occasional good; that they may now and then recur to moderate the fury of party spirit, to warn against the mischiefs of foreign intrigues, to guard against the impostures of pretended patriotism; this hope will be a full recompense for the solicitude for your welfare by which they have been dictated.

How far, in the discharge of my official duties, I have been guided by the principles which have been delineated, the public records, and other evidences of my conduct, must witness to you and the world. To myself, the assurance of my own conscience is, that I have at least believed myself to be guided by them.

In relation to the still subsisting war in Europe, my proclamation of the 22d of April, 1793, is the index to my plan. Sanctioned by your approving voice, and by that of your representatives in both houses of congress, the spirit of that measure has continually governed me, uninfluenced by any attempts to deter or divert me from it.

After deliberate examination, with the aid of the best lights I could obtain, I was well satisfied that our country, under all the circumstances of the case, had a right to take, and was bound in duty and interest to take a neutral position. Having taken it, I determined, as far as should depend upon me, to maintain it with moderation, perseverance, and firmness.

The considerations which respect the right to hold this conduct, it is not necessary on this occasion to detail. I will only observe, that, according to my understanding of the matter, that right, so far from being denied by any of the belligerent powers, has been virtually admitted by all.

The duty of holding a neutral conduct may be inferred, without any thing more, from the obligation which justice and humanity impose on every nation, in cases in which it is free to act, to maintain inviolate the relations of peace and amity towards other nations.

The inducements of interest, for observing that conduct, will best be referred to your own reflections and experience. With me, a predominant motive has been, to endeavour to gain time to our country to settle and mature its yet recent institutions, and to progress, without interruption, to that degree of strength and consistency, which is necessary to give it, humanly speaking, the command of its own fortunes.

Though in reviewing the incidents of my administration, I am unconscious of intentional error, I am, nevertheless, too sensible of my defects, not to think it probable that I may have committed many errors. Whatever they may be, I fervently beseech the Almighty to avert or mitigate the evils to which they may tend. I shall also carry with me the hope, that my country will never cease to view them with indulgence; and that, after forty-five years of my life dedicated to its service, with an upright zeal, the faults of incompetent abilities will be consigned to oblivion, as myself must soon be to the mansions of rest.

Relying on its kindness in this as in other things, and actuated by that fervent love towards it which is so natural to a man, who views in it the native soil of himself and his progenitors for several generations; I anticipate, with pleasing expectation, that retreat, in which I promise myself to realize, without alloy, the sweet enjoyment of partaking, in the midst of my fellow-citizens, the benign influence of good laws under a free government—the ever favourite object of my heart, and the happy reward, as I trust, of our mutual cares, labours, and dangers.

GEORGE WASHINGTON

towards all nations, and peace and harmony cultivated. In his opinion, honesty, no less in public than in private affairs, was always the best policy. Providence, he believed, had connected the permanent felicity of a nation with its virtue. Other subjects to which he alluded, were the importance of credit, of economy, of a reduction of the public debt, and of literary institutions; above all, he recommended religion and morality as indispensably necessary to political prosperity. This address to the people of the United States was received with the highest veneration and gratitude. Several of the state legislatures ordered it to be put upon their journals, and every citizen considered it as the legacy of the most distinguished American patriot.

On the 7th of December, 1796, the president for the last time met the national legislature. In his speech, after taking a view of the situation of the United States, regardless of opposition and censure, he recommended the attention of congress to those measures which he deemed essential to national independence, honour, and prosperity. On the 4th of March, 1797, he attended the inauguration of his successor in office. Great sensibility was manifested by the members of the legislature and other distinguished characters when he entered the senate chamber, and much admiration expressed at the complacency and delight he manifested at seeing another clothed with the authority with which he had himself been invested. Having paid his affectionate compliments to Mr. Adams, as president of the United States, he bade adieu to the seat of government, and hastened to the delights of domestic life. He intended that his journey should have been private, but the attempt was vain; the same affectionate and respectful attentions were on this occasion paid him which he had received during his presidency. In his retirement at Mount Vernon he gave the world the glorious example of a man voluntarily disrobing himself of the highest authority, and returning to private life, with a character having upon it no stain of ambition, of covetousness, of profusion, of luxury, of oppression, or of injustice; while it was adorned with the presence of virtues and graces, brilliant alike in the shade of retirement and in the glare of public life.

CHAPTER IV.

THE ADMINISTRATION OF JOHN ADAMS AND JEFFERSON.

WHEN the determination of Washington not again to accept of the presidentship left open the high office to the competition of the leaders of the great political parties, no exertion was spared throughout the union to give success to their respective claims. The federalists, desiring that the system of measures adopted by Washington should be pursued, and dreading the influence of French sentiments and principles, made the most active efforts to elect John Adams. The republicans, believing their opponents less friendly than themselves to the maxims of liberty, and too much devoted to the British nation and to British institutions, made equal exertions to elect Thomas Jefferson. The result was the choice of Mr. Adams to be president, and Mr. Jefferson to be vice-president.

The President was inaugurated on the 4th day of March, and made the following speech:

"When it was first perceived, in early times, that no middle course for America remained, between unlimited submission to a foreign legislature and a total independence of its claims; men of reflection were less apprehensive of danger from the formidable power of fleets and armies they must determine to resist, than from those contests and dissensions, which would certainly arise, concerning the forms of government to be instituted over the whole, and over the parts of this extensive country. Relying, however, on the purity of their intentions, the justice of their cause, and the integrity and intelligence of the people, under an overruling Providence, which had so signally protected this country from the first; the representatives of this nation, then consisting of little more than half its present numbers, not only broke to pieces the chains which were forging, and the rod of iron that was lifted up, and frankly cut asunder the ties which had bound them, and launched into an ocean of uncertainty.

"The zeal and ardour of the people during the revolutionary war, supplying the place of government, commanded a degree of order, sufficient at least for the temporary preservation of society. The confederation, which was early felt to be necessary, was prepared from the models of the Batavian and Helvetic confederacies, the only examples which remain, with any detail and precision, in history, and certainly the only ones, which the people at large had ever considered. But, reflecting on the striking difference, in so many particulars, between this country and those, where a courier may go from the seat of government to the frontier in a single day, it was then certainly foreseen by some, who assisted in Congress at the formation of it, that it could not be durable.

"Negligence of its regulations, inattention to its recommendations, if not disobedience to its authority, not only in individuals, but in states, soon appeared with their melancholy consequences; universal languor, jealousies, rivalries of states; decline of navigation and commerce; discouragement of necessary manufactures; universal fall in the value of lands and their produce; contempt of public and private faith; loss of consideration and credit with foreign nations; and at length, in discontents, animosities, combinations, partial conventions, and insurrection, threatening some great national calamity.

"In this dangerous crisis, the people of America were not abandoned by their usual good sense, presence of mind, resolution, or integrity. Measures were pursued to concert a plan, to form a more perfect union, establish justice, ensure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty. The public disquisition, discussions, and deliberations, issued in the present happy constitution of government.

"Employed in the service of my country abroad during the whole course of these transactions, I first saw the constitution of the United States in a foreign country. Irritated by no literary altercation, animated by no public debate, heated by no party animosity, I read it with great satisfaction, as the result of good heads, prompted by good hearts; as an experiment, better adapted to the genius, character, situation, and relations of this nation and country, than any which had ever been proposed or suggested. In its general principles and great outlines, it was conformable to such a system of government as I had ever most esteemed; and in some states, my own native state in particular, had contributed to establish. Claiming a right of suffrage in common with my fellow-citizens in the adoption or rejection of a constitution, which was to rule me and my posterity, as well as them and theirs, I did not hesitate to express my approbation of it on all occasions, in public and in private. It was not then nor has been since any objection to it, in my mind, that the executive and senate were not more permanent. Nor have I entertained a thought of promoting any alteration in it, but such as the people themselves, in the course of their experience, should see and feel to be necessary or expedient, and by their representatives in congress and the state legislatures, according to the constitution itself, adopt and ordain.

"Returning to the bosom of my country, after a painful separation from it for ten years, I had the honour to be elected to a station under the new order of things, and I have repeatedly laid myself under the most serious obligations to support the constitution. The operation of it has equalled the most sanguine expectations of its friends; and from an habitual attention to it, satisfaction in its administration, and delight in its effects upon the peace, order, prosperity, and happiness of the nation, I have acquired an habitual attachment to it, and veneration for it.

"What other form of government, indeed, can so well deserve our esteem and love?

"There may be little solidity in an ancient idea, that congregations of men into cities and nations are the most pleasing objects in the sight of superior intelligences: but this is very certain, that to a benevolent human mind there can be no spectacle presented by any nation, more pleasing, more noble, majestic, or august, than an assembly like that, which has so often been seen in this and the other chamber of Congress—of a government, in which the executive authority, as well as that of all the branches of the legislature, are exercised by citizens selected at regular periods by their neighbours, to make and execute laws for the general good. Can any thing essential, any thing more than mere ornament and decoration, be added to this by robes or diamonds? Can authority be more amiable or respectable, when it descends from accidents or institutions established in remote antiquity, than when it springs fresh from the hearts and judgments of an honest and enlightened people? For, it is the people only that are represented: it is their power and majesty that is reflected, and only for their good, in every legitimate government, under whatever form it may appear. The existence of such a government as ours for any length of time, is a full proof of a general dissemination of knowledge and virtue throughout the whole body of the people. And what object of consideration, more pleasing than this, can be presented to the human mind? If national pride is ever justifiable or excusable, it is when it springs, not from power or riches, grandeur or glory, but from conviction of national innocence, information, and benevolence.

"In the midst of these pleasing ideas, we should be unfaithful to ourselves, if we should ever lose sight of the danger to our liberties, if any thing partial or extraneous should infect the purity of our free, fair, virtuous and independent elections. If an election is to be determined by a majority of a single vote, and that can be procured by a party through artifice or corruption, the government may be the choice of a party, for its own ends, not of the nation for the national good. If that solitary suf frage can be obtained by foreign nations, by flattery or menaces, by fraud or violence, by terror, intrigue, or venality; the government may not be the choice of the American people, but of foreign nations. It may be foreign nations who govern us, and not we, the people, who govern ourselves: and candid men will acknowledge, that in such cases, choice would have little advantage to boast of, over lot or chance.

"Such is the amiable and interesting system of government, (and such are some of the abuses to which it may be exposed,) which the people of America have exhibited to the admiration and anxiety of the wise and virtuous of all nations for eight years; under the administration of a citizen who, by a long course of great actions, regulated by prudence, justice, temperance, and fortitude, conducting a people inspired with the same virtues, and animated with the same ardent patriotism and love of liberty, to independence and peace, to increasing wealth and unexampled prosperity, has merited the gratitude of his fellow-citizens, commanded the highest praises of foreign nations, and secured immortal glory with posterity.

"In that retirement, which is his voluntary choice, may he long live to enjoy the delicious recollection of his services, the gratitude of mankind; the happy fruits of them to himself and the world, which are daily increasing, and that splendid prospect of the future fortunes of his country, which is opening from year to year. His name may be still a rampart, and the knowledge that he lives, a bulwark against all open or secret enemies of his country's peace.

"This example has been recommended to the imitation of his successors, by both houses of congress, and by the voice of the legislatures and the people, throughout the nation.

"On this subject it might become me better to be silent, or to speak with diffidence; but, as something may be expected, the occasion, I hope, will be admitted as an apology, if I venture to say, that, if a preference, upon principle, of a free republican government, formed upon long and serious reflection, after a diligent and impartial inquiry after truth; if an attachment to the constitution of the United States, and a conscientious determination to support it, until it shall be altered by the judgments and wishes of the people, expressed in the mode prescribed in it; if a respectful attention to the constitutions of the individual states, and a constant caution and delicacy towards the state governments; if an equal and impartial regard to the rights, interests, honour, and happiness of all the states in the union, without preference or regard to a northern or southern, eastern or western position, their various political opinions on essential points, or their personal attachments; if a love of virtuous men of all parties and denominations; if a love of science and letters, and a wish to patronize every rational effort to encourage schools, colleges, universities, academies, and every institution for propagating knowledge, virtue, and religion, among all classes of the people, not only for their benign influence on the happiness of life, in all its stages and classes, and of society in all its forms, but, as the only means of preserving our constitution from its natural enemies, the spirit of sophistry, the spirit of party, the spirit of intrigue, profligacy, and corruption, and the pestilence of foreign influence, which is the angel of destruction to elective governments; if a love of equal laws, of justice and humanity, in the interior administration; if an inclination to improve agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, for necessity, convenience, and defence; if a spirit of equity and humanity towards the aboriginal nations of America, and a disposition to meliorate their condition, by inclining them to be more friendly to us, and our citizens to be more friendly to them; if an inflexible determination to maintain peace and inviolable faith with all nations, and that system of neutrality and impartiality among the belligerent powers of Europe, which has been adopted by the government, and so solemnly sanctioned by both houses of congress, and applauded by the legislatures of the states and the public opinion, until it shall be otherwise ordained by congress; if a personal esteem for the French nation, formed in a residence of seven years chiefly among them, and a sincere desire to preserve the friendship, which has been so much for the honour and interest of both nations; if, while the conscious honour and integrity of the people of America, and the internal sentiment of their own power and energies must be preserved, an earnest endeavour to investigate every just cause, and remove every colourable pretence of complaint; if an intention to pursue, by amicable negotiation, a reparation for the injuries that have been committed on the commerce of our fellow-citizens, by whatever nation; and if success can not be obtained, to lay the facts before the legislature, that they may consider what further measures the honour and interest of the government and its constituents demand; if a resolution to do justice, as far as may depend upon me, at all times, and to all nations, and maintain peace, friendship, and benevolence, with all the world; if an unshaken confidence in the honour, spirit, and resources of the American people, on which I have so often hazarded my all, and never been deceived ; if elevated ideas of the high destinies of this country, and of my own duties towards it, founded on a knowledge of the moral principles and intellectual improvements of the people, deeply engraven on my mind in early life, and not obscured but exalted by experience and age ; and with humble reverence I feel it my duty to add—if a veneration for the religion of a people, who profess and call themselves Christians, and a fixed resolution to consider a decent respect for christianity among the best recommendations for the public service, can enable me, in any degree, to comply with your wishes, it shall be my strenuous endeavour, that this sagacious injunction of the two Houses shall not be without effect.

“ With this great example before me ; with the sense and spirit, the faith and honour, the duty and interest of the same American people, pledged to support the constitution of the United States, I entertain no doubt of its continuance in all its energy ; and my mind is prepared, without hesitation, to lay myself under the most solemn obligations to support it, to the utmost of my power.

“ And may that Being, who is supreme over all, the patron of order, the fountain of justice, and the protector, in all ages of the world, of virtuous liberty, continue his blessing upon this nation and its government, and give it all possible success and duration, consistent with the ends of his providence.”

Mr. Pinckney had been appointed minister plenipotentiary to the French republic in 1796. The object of his mission was stated, in his letter of credence, to be, “ to maintain that good understanding which, from the commencement of the alliance, had subsisted between the two nations ; and to efface unfavourable impressions, banish suspicions, and restore that cordiality which was at once the evidence and pledge of a friendly union.” On inspecting his letter of credence, the directory announced to him their determination “ not to receive another minister plenipotentiary from the United States, until after the redress of grievances demanded of the American government, which the French republic had a right to expect from it.” The American minister was afterward obliged, by a written mandate, to quit the territories of the French republic. Besides other hostile indications, American vessels were captured wherever found ; and, under the pretext of their wanting a document, with which the treaty of commerce had been uniformly understood to dispense, they were condemned as prizes.

summoned congress to meet on the 15th of June when, in a firm and dignified speech, he stated the great and unprovoked outrages of the French government. Having mentioned a disposition indicated in the executive directory to separate the people of America from their government, “ such attempts,” he added, “ ought to be repelled with a decision which shall convince France and all the world that we are not a degraded people, humiliated under a colonial spirit of fear and sense of inferiority, fitted to be the miserable instruments of foreign influence, and regardless of national honour, character, and interest.” He expressed, however, his wish for an accommodation, and his purpose of attempting it. “ Retaining still the desire which has uniformly been manifested by the American government to preserve peace and friendship with all nations, and believing that neither the honour nor the interest of the United States absolutely forbade the repetition of advances for securing these desirable objects with France, he should,” he said, “ institute a fresh attempt at negotiation, and should not fail to promote and accelerate an accommodation on terms compatible with the rights, duties, interests, and honour of the nation.” In the mean time, he earnestly recommended it to congress to provide effectual measures of defence.

To make a last effort to obtain reparation and security, three envoys extraordinary were appointed, at the head of whom was General Pinckney. By their instructions, “ Peace and reconciliation were to be pursued by all means compatible with the honour and the faith of the United States ; but no national engagements were to be impaired ; no innovations to be permitted upon those internal regulations for the preservation of peace, which had been deliberately and uprightly established ; nor were the rights of the government to be surrendered.” These ambassadors also the directory refused to receive. They were, however, addressed by persons verbally instructed by Talleyrand, the minister of foreign relations, to make proposals. In explicit terms, these unofficial agents demanded a large sum of money before any negotiation could be opened. To this insulting demand a decided negative was given. A compliance was, nevertheless, repeatedly urged, until at length the envoys refused to hold with them any further communication.

When these events were known in the United States they excited general indignation. The spirit of party appeared to be extinct. “ Millions for defence, not a cent for tribute,” resounded from every quarter of the union. The treaty of alliance with France was declared by congress to be no longer in force; and authority was given for capturing armed French vessels. Provision was made for raising immediately a small regular army, and, in case events should render it expedient, for augmenting it. A direct tax and additional internal duties were laid. To command the armies of the United States, President Adams, with the unanimous advice of the senate, appointed George Washington. He consented, but with great reluctance, to accept the office, declaring, however, that he cordially approved the measures of the government.

The first act of hostility between the two nations appears to have been committed by the Insurgente, which was in a short period after so signally beaten by an American frigate. The schooner Retaliation, Lieutenant-Commandant Bainbridge, being deluded into the power of this vessel, was captured and carried into Guadaloupe. Several other United States armed vessels were in company with the Retaliation, and pursued by the French squadron, but were probably saved from capture by the address of Lieutenant Bainbridge, who, being asked by the French commodore what was the force of the vessels chased, exaggerated it with so much adroitness as to induce him to recall his ships. The Constellation went to sea under the command of Captain Truxton. In February, 1799, he encountered the Insurgente, and, after a close action of about an hour and a half, compelled her to strike. The rate of the Constellation was thirty-two guns, that of the Insurgente forty. The former had three men wounded, one of whom shortly after died, and none killed; the latter had forty-one wounded, and twenty-nine killed. This victory, which was so brilliant and decisive, with such a wonderful disparity of loss, gave great eclat to the victor and to the navy. Commodore Truxton again put to sea in the Constellation, being destined to renew his triumphs, and the humiliation of the foe. In February, 1800, he fell in with the Vengeance, a French ship of fifty-four guns, with which he began an engagement that lasted, with great obstinacy and spirit on both sides, from eight o'clock in the evening till one in the morning, when the Vengeance was completely silenced, and sheered off. The Constellation, having lost her mainmast, was too much injured to pursue her. The captain of the Vengeance is said to have twice surrendered during the contest, but his signals were not understood amidst the darkness of night and the confusion of battle.

The United States, thus victorious in arms at home and on the ocean, commanded the respect of their enemy; and the Directory made overtures of peace. The president immediately appointed ministers, who, on their arrival at Paris, found the executive authority in the possession of Bonaparte as first consul. They were promptly received, and in September, 1800, a treaty was concluded satisfactory to both countries.

The services of Washington had not been required in his capacity of commander in chief; but he did not live to witness the restoration of peace. On Friday, December 13, while attending some improvements upon his estate, he was exposed to a light rain, which wetted his neck and hair. Unapprehensive of danger, he passed the afternoon in his usual manner; but at night was seized with an inflammatory affection of the windpipe, attended by fever, and a quick and laborious respiration. About twelve or fourteen ounces of blood were taken from him. In the morning, his family physician, Dr. Craik, was sent for; but the utmost exertions of medical skill were applied in vain. Believing from the commencement of his complaint that it would be mortal, a few hours before his departure, and after repeated efforts to be understood, he succeeded in expressing a desire that he might be permitted to die without being disquieted by unavailing attempts to rescue him from his fate. When he could no longer swallow, he undressed himself and got into bed, there to await his dissolution. To his friend and physician he said, with difficulty, "Doctor, I am dying, and have been dying for a long time; but I am not afraid to die." Respiration became more and more contracted and imperfect until half-past eleven on Saturday night, when, retaining the full possession of his intellect, he expired without a struggle. Thus, in the sixty-eighth year of his age, died the father of his country.* Infor solidity of judgment, and consummate prudence of conduct. He was not so eminent for any one quality of greatness and worth, as for the union of those great, amiable, and good qualities, which are very rarely combined in the same character.

"In domestic and private life, he blended the authority of the master with the care and kindness of the guardian and friend. Solicitous for the welfare of his slaves, while at Mount Vernon, he every morning rode round his estates to examine their condition; for the sick, physicians were provided; and to the weak and infirm every necessary comfort was administered. The servitude of the negroes lay with weight upon his mind; he often made it the subject of conversation, and revolved several plans for their general

* "General Washington was exactly six feet in height; he appeared taller, as his shoulders rose a little higher than the true proportion. His eyes were of a grey, and his hair of a brown colour. His limbs were well formed, and indicated strength. His complexion was light, and his countenance serene and thoughtful. His manners were graceful, manly, and dignified. His general appearance never failed to engage the respect and esteem of all who approached him. Reserved, but not haughty, in his disposition, he was accessible to all in concerns of business; but he opened himself only to his confidential friends; and no art or address could draw from him an opinion which he thought prudent to conceal.

"He was not so much distinguished for brilliancy of genius as telligence of this event, as it rapidly spread, produced spontaneous, deep, and unaffected grief, suspending every other thought, and absorbing every different feeling. Congress, then in session at Philadelphia, immediately adjourned. On assembling the next day, the house of representatives resolved, "that the speaker's chair should be shrouded in black, and the members wear black during the session; and that a joint committee should be appointed to devise the most suitable manner of paying honour to the memory of the man first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen." The senate of the United States, in an address to the president on this melancholy occasion, indulged their patriotic pride, while they did not transgress the bounds of truth, in speaking of their Washington. "Ancient and modern names," said they, "are diminished before him. Greatness and guilt have too often been allied; but his fame is whiter than it is brilliant. The destroyers of nations stood abashed at the majesty of his virtues. It reproved the intemperance of their ambition, and darkened the splendour of victory. The scene is closed, and we are no longer anxious lest misfortune should sully his glory: he has travelled on to the end of his journey, and carried with him an increasing weight of honour; he has deposited it safely where misfortune cannot tarnish it,—where malice cannot blast it."

According to the unanimous resolution of congress, a funeral procession moved from the legislative hall to the German Lutheran church, where an oration was delivered by General Lee, a representative from Virginia. The procession was grand and solemn; the oration impressive and eloquent. Throughout the union similar marks of affliction were exhibited; a whole people appeared in mourning. In every part of the republic funeral orations were delivered, and the best talents of the nation were devoted to an expression of the nation's grief.

In the year 1800 the seat of government of the United States was removed to Washington, in the emancipation. His industry was unremitted, and his method so exact, that all the complicated business of his military command and civil administration, was managed without confusion and without hurry.

"Not feeling the lust of power, and ambitious only for honourable fame, he devoted himself to his country upon the most disinterested principles; and his actions wore not the semblance but the reality of virtue: the purity of his motives was accredited, and absolute confidence placed in his patriotism. While filling a public station, the performance of his duty took the place of pleasure, emolument, and every private consideration. During the more critical years of the war, a smile was scarcely seen upon his countenance; he gave himself no moments of relaxation; but his whole mind was engrossed to execute successfully his trust.

"He was as eminent for piety as for patriotism. His public and private conduct evince, that he impressively felt a sense of the superintendence of God, and of the dependance of man. In his addresses, while at the head of the army, and of the national government, he gratefully noticed the signal blessings of Providence, and fervently commended his country to divine benediction. In private, he was known to have been habitually devout. In the establishment of his presidential household, he reserved to himself the sabbath, free from the interruptions of private visits, or public business; and, throughout the eight years of his civil administration, he gave to the institutions of christianity the influence of his example.

After congratulating the people of the United States on the assembling of congress at the permanent seat of their government, and congress on the prospect of a residence not to be changed, the president said, "It would be unbecoming the representatives of this nation to assemble for the first time in this solemn temple, without looking up to the Supreme Ruler of the universe, and imploring his blessing. May this territory be the residence of virtue and happiness! In this city may that piety and virtue, that wisdom and magnanimity, that constancy and self-government, which adorned the great character whose name it bears, be for ever held in veneration! Here, and throughout our country, may simple manners, pure morals, and true religion, flourish for ever."

At this period a presidential election again occurred. From the time of the adoption of the constitution, the republican party had been gradually increasing in numbers. The two parties being now nearly equal, the contest inspired both with uncommon ardour. The federalists supported Mr. Adams and General Pinckney; the republicans, Mr. Jefferson and Colonel Burr. The two latter received a small majority of the electoral votes; and as they received also an equal number, the selection of one of them to be president devolved upon the house of representatives. After thirty-five trials, during which the nation felt intense solicitude, Mr. Jefferson was chosen. Colonel Burr received the votes of the federalists, and lost, in consequence, the confidence of his former friends. By the provisions of the constitution he became, of course, vice-president. On his inauguration, Mr. Jefferson made the following speech to both houses of congress.

"Friends and fellow-citizens,
"Called upon to undertake the duties of the first executive office of our country, I avail myself of the presence of that portion of my fellow-citizens which is here assembled, to express my grateful thanks for the favour with which they have been pleased to look

perintendence of God, and of the dependance of man. In his addresses, while at the head of the army, and of the national government, he gratefully noticed the signal blessings of Providence, and fervently commended his country to divine benediction. In private, he was known to have been habitually devout. In the establishment of his presidential household, he reserved to himself the sabbath, free from the interruptions of private visits, or public business; and, throughout the eight years of his civil administration, he gave to the institutions of christianity the influence of his example.

"Uniting the talents of the soldier with the qualifications of the statesman, and pursuing, unmoved by difficulties, the noblest end by the purest means, he had the supreme satisfaction of beholding the complete success of his great military and civil services, in the independence and happiness of his country."—Bancroft's Life of Washington, vol. ii. p. 214.

towards me, to declare a sincere consciousness, that the task is above my talents, and that I approach it with those anxious and awful presentiments, which the greatness of the charge, and the weakness of my powers, so justly inspire. A rising nation, spread over a wide and fruitful land, traversing all the seas with the rich productions of their industry, engaged in commerce with nations who feel power and forget right, advancing rapidly to destinies beyond the reach of mortal eye ; when I contemplate these transcendent objects, and see the honour, the happiness, and the hopes of this beloved country committed to the issue and the auspices of this day, I shrink from the contemplation, and humble myself before the magnitude of the undertaking. Utterly, indeed, should I despair, did not the presence of many, whom I here see, remind me, that, in the other high authorities provided by our constitution, I shall find resources of wisdom, of virtue, and of zeal, on which to rely under all difficulties. To you, then, gentlemen, who are charged with the sovereign functions of legislation, and to those associated with you, I look with encouragement for that guidance and support which may enable us to steer with safety the vessel in which we are all embarked, amidst the conflicting elements of a troubled world.

“During the contest of opinion through which we have past, the animation of discussions and of exertions, has sometimes worn an aspect which might impose on strangers unused to think freely, and to speak and to write what they think ; but this being now decided by the voice of the nation, announced according to the rules of the constitution, all will of course arrange themselves under the will of the law, and unite in common efforts for the common good. All too will bear in mind this sacred principle, that though the will of the majority is in all cases to prevail, that will, to be rightful, must be reasonable ; that the minority possess their equal rights, which equal laws must protect, and to violate which would be oppression. Let us then, fellow-citizens, unite with one heart and one mind, let us restore to social intercourse, that harmony and affection without which, liberty, and even life itself, are but dreary things. And let us reflect, that having banished from our land that religious intolerance under which mankind so long bled and suffered, we have yet gained little, if we countenance a political intolerance, as despotic as wicked, and capable of as bitter and bloody persecutions. During the throes and convulsions of the ancient world, during the agonizing spasms of infuriated man, seeking through blood and slaughter his long lost liberty, it was not wonderful that the agitation of the billows should reach even this distant and peaceful shore ; that this should be more felt and feared by some, and less by others ; and should divide opinions as to measures of safety ; but every difference of opinion is not a difference of principle. We have called by different names brethren of the same principle. We are all republicans : we are all federalists. If there be any among us who would wish to dissolve this Union, or to change its republican form, let them stand undisturbed as monuments of the safety with which error of opinion may be tolerated, where reason is left free to combat it. I know, indeed, that some honest men fear that a republican government cannot be strong ; that this government is not strong enough. But would the honest patriot, in the full tide of successful experiment, abandon a government which has so far kept us free and firm, on the theoretic and visionary fear, that this government, the world's best hope, may, by possibility, want energy to preserve itself ? I trust not. I believe this, on the contrary, the strongest government on earth. I believe it the only one, where every man, at the call of the law, would fly to the standard of the law, and would meet invasions of the public order as his own personal concern. Sometimes it is said, that man cannot be trusted with the government of himself. Can he then be trusted with the government of others ? Or, have we found angels in the form of kings, to govern him ? Let history answer this question.

“Let us then, with courage and confidence, pursue our own federal and republican principles ; our attachment to union and representative government. Kindly separated by nature and a wide ocean from the exterminating havoc of one quarter of the globe ; too high minded to endure the degradations of the others ; possessing a chosen country, with room enough for our descendants to the thousandth and thousandth generation, entertaining a due sense of our equal right to the use of our own faculties, to the acquisitions of our own industry, to honour and confidence from our fellow-citizens, resulting not from birth, but from our actions and their sense of them, enlightened by a benign religion, professed indeed and practised in various forms, yet all of them inculcating honesty, truth, temperance, gratitude, and the love of man, acknowledging and adoring an overruling providence, which, by all its dispensations, proves that it delights in the happiness of man here, and his greater happiness hereafter ; with all these blessings, what more is necessary to make us a happy and prosperous people ? Still one thing more, fellow-citizens, a wise and frugal government, which shall restrain men from injuring one another, shall leave them otherwise free to regulate their own pursuits of industry and improvement, and shall not take from the mouth of labour the bread it has earned. This is the sum of good government ; and this is necessary to close the circle of our felicities.

"About to enter, fellow-citizens, on the exercise of duties which comprehend every thing dear and valuable to you, it is proper you should understand what I deem the essential principles of our government, and consequently, those which ought to shape its administration. I will compress them within the narrowest compass they will bear, stating the general principle, but not all its limitations. Equal and exact justice to all men, of whatever state or persuasion, religious or political : peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations, entangling alliances with none : the support of the state governments in all their rights, as the most competent administrations for our domestic concerns, and the surest bulwarks against anti-republican tendencies : the preservation of the general government in its whole constitutional vigour, as the sheet anchor of our peace at home, and safety abroad : a jealous care of the right of election by the people, a mild and safe corrective of abuses which are lopped by the sword of revolution where peaceable remedies are unprovided : absolute acquiescence in the decisions of the majority, the vital principle of republics, from which there is no appeal but to force, the vital principle and immediate parent of despotism : a well disciplined militia, our best reliance in peace, and for the first moments of war, till regulars may relieve them : the supremacy of the civil over the military authority : economy in the public expense, that labour may be lightly burdened : the honest payment of our debts and sacred preservation of the public faith : encouragement of agriculture, and of commerce as its handmaid : the diffusion of information, and arraignment of all abuses at the bar of the public reason : freedom of religion ; freedom of the press ; and freedom of person, under the protection of the habeas corpus : and trial by juries impartially selected. These principles form the bright constellation, which has gone before us, and guided our steps through an age of revolution and reformation. The wisdom of our sages, and blood of our heroes, have been devoted to their attainment : they should be the creed of our political faith, the text of civic instruction, the touchstone by which to try the services of those we trust ; and should we wander from them in moments of error or of alarm, let us hasten to retrace our steps, and to regain the road which alone leads to peace, liberty, and safety.

"I repair, then, fellow-citizens, to the post you have assigned me. With experience enough in subordinate offices to have seen the difficulties of this, the greatest of all, I have learned to expect that it will rarely fall to the lot of imperfect man, to retire from this station with the reputation, and the favour, which bring him into it. Without pretensions to that high confidence you reposed in our first and greatest revolutionary character, whose pre-eminent services had entitled him to the first place in his country's love, and destined for him the fairest page in the volume of faithful history, I ask so much confidence only as may give firmness and effect to the legal administration of your affairs. I shall often go wrong through defect of judgment. When right, I shall often be thought wrong by those whose positions will not command a view of the whole ground. I ask your indulgence for my own errors, which will never be intentional ; and your support against the errors of others, who may condemn what they would not, if seen in all its parts. The approbation implied by your suffrage, is a great consolation to me for the past ; and my future solicitude will be, to retain the good opinion of those who have bestowed it in advance, to conciliate that of others, by doing them all the good in my power, and to be instrumental to the happiness and freedom of all.

"Relying then on the patronage of your good will, I advance with obedience to the work, ready to retire from it whenever you become sensible how much better choices it is in your power to make. And may that infinite Power which rules the destinies of the universe, lead our councils to what is best, and give them a favourable issue for your peace and prosperity."

A second census of the inhabitants of the United States was completed in 1801. They amounted to 5,319,762, having in ten years increased nearly one million four hundred thousand. In the same number of years the exports increased from nineteen to ninety-four millions, and the revenue from 4,771,000 to 12,945,000 dollars. This rapid advance in the career of prosperity has no parallel in the history of nations, and is to be attributed principally to the institutions of the country, which, securing equal privileges to all, gave to the enterprise and industry of all free scope and full encouragement.

In 1802, the state of Ohio was admitted into the union. It was formerly a portion of the north-western territory, for the government of which, in 1787, an ordinance was passed by the continental congress. In thirty years from its first settlement, the number of its inhabitants exceeded half a million. The state of Tennessee, which was previously a part of North Carolina, and which lies between that state and the river Mississippi, had been admitted in 1796.

The right of deposit at New Orleans, conceded to the citizens of the United States by Spain, and necessary to the people of the western country, had, until this period, been freely enjoyed. In October, the chief officer of that city prohibited the exercise of it in future. This violation of a solemn engagement produced, throughout the states of Ohio and Kentucky, indignant clamour and violent commotion. In congress a proposition was made to take possession by force of the whole province of Louisiana; but a more pacific course was adopted. Knowing that the province had been ceded, although not transferred, to France, the president instituted a negotiation to acquire it by purchase. In April, 1803, a treaty was concluded, conveying it to the United States for fifteen millions of dollars. Its acquisition was considered by the United States of the greatest importance, as it gave them the entire control of a river which is one of the noblest in the world.

At this period, also, there was another important acquisition of territory. The friendly tribe of Kaskaskia Indians, reduced by wars and other causes to a few individuals who were unable to defend themselves against the neighbouring tribes, transferred its country to the United States; reserving only a sufficiency to maintain its members in an agricultural way. The stipulations on the part of the United States were, to extend to them patronage and protection, and to give them certain annual aids, in money, implements of agriculture, and other articles of their choice. This ceded country extends along the Mississippi from the mouth of the Illinois to and up the Ohio; and is esteemed as among the most fertile within the limits of the union.

The United States had for some time enjoyed the undisputed repose of peace, with only one exception. Tripoli, the least considerable of the Barbary states, had made demands, founded neither in right nor in compact, and had denounced war on the failure of the American government to comply with them before a given day. The president, on this occasion, sent a small squadron of frigates into the Mediterranean, with assurances to that power of the sincere desire of the American government to remain in peace; but with orders to protect our commerce against the threatened attack. It was a seasonable and salutary measure; for the bey had already declared war; and the American commerce in the Mediterranean was blockaded, while that of the Atlantic was in peril. The arrival of the squadron dispelled the danger. The Insurgente, which had been so honourably added to the American navy, and the Pickering, of fourteen guns, the former commanded by Captain Fletcher, the latter by Captain Hillar, were lost in the equinoctial gale, in September, 1800. In 1801, the Enterprise, of fourteen guns, Captain Sterrett, fell in with a Tripolitan ship of war of equal force. The action continued three hours and a half, the corsair fighting with great obstinacy, and even desperation, until she struck, having lost fifty killed and wounded, while the Enterprise had not a man injured. In 1803, Commodore Preble assumed the command of the Mediterranean squadron, and after humbling the emperor of Morocco, who had begun a covert war upon American commerce, concentrated most of his force before Tripoli. On arriving off that port, Captain Bainbridge, in the frigate Philadelphia, of forty-four guns, was sent into the harbour to reconnoitre. While in eager pursuit of a small vessel, he unfortunately advanced so far that the frigate grounded, and all attempts to remove her were in vain. The sea around her was immediately covered with Tripolitan gunboats, and Captain Bainbridge was compelled to surrender. This misfortune, which threw a number of accomplished officers and a valiant crew into oppressive bondage, and which shed a gloom over the whole nation, as it seemed at once to increase the difficulties of a peace a hundred fold, was soon relieved by one of the most daring and chivalrous exploits that is found in naval annals. Lieutenant Stephen Decatur, then one of Commodore Preble's subalterns, proposed a plan for re-capturing or destroying the Philadelphia. The American squadron was at that time lying at Syracuse. Agreeably to the plan proposed, Lieutenant Decatur, in the ketch Intrepid, four guns and seventy-five men, proceeded, under the escort of the Syren, Captain Stewart, to the harbour of Tripoli. The Philadelphia lay within half gun-shot of the bashaw's castle, and several cruisers and gunboats surrounded her with jealous vigilance. The Intrepid entered the harbour alone, about eight o'clock in the evening, and succeeded in getting near the Philadelphia, between ten and eleven o'clock, without having awakened suspicion of her hostile designs. This vessel had been captured from the Tripolitans, and, assuming on this occasion her former national appearance, was permitted to warp alongside, under the alleged pretence that she had lost all her anchors. The moment the vessel came in contact, Decatur and his followers leaped on board, and soon overwhelmed a crew which was paralyzed with consternation. Twenty of the Tripolitans were killed. All the surrounding batteries being opened upon the Philadelphia, she was immediately set on fire, and not abandoned until thoroughly wrapped in flames; when, a favouring breeze springing up, the Intrepid extricated herself from her prey, and sailed triumphantly out of the harbour amid the light of the conflagration. Not the slightest loss occurred on the side of the Americans to shade the splendour of the enterprise.

In July, 1804, Commodore Preble brought together all his forces before Tripoli, determined to try the effect of a bombardment. The enemy having sent some of his gunboats and galleys without the reef at the mouth of the harbour, two divisions of American gunboats were formed for the purpose of attacking them, while the large vessels assailed the batteries and town. On the 3d of August this plan was put in execution. The squadron approached within gun-shot of the town, and opened a tremendous fire of shot and shells, which was as promptly returned by the Tripolitan batteries and shipping. At the same time the two divisions of gunboats, the first under the command of Captain Somers, the second under Captain Stephen Decatur, who had been promoted as a reward for his late achievement, advanced against those of the enemy. The squadron was about two hours under the enemy's batteries, generally within pistol-shot, ranging by them in deliberate succession, alternately silencing their fires, and launching its thunders into the very palace of the bashaw; while a more animated battle was raging in another quarter. Simultaneously with the bombardment the American gunboats had closed in desperate conflict with the enemy. Captain Decatur, bearing down upon one of superior force, soon carried her by boarding, when, taking his prize in tow, he grappled with another, and in like manner transferred the fight to the enemy's deck. In the fierce encounter which followed this second attack, Captain Decatur, having broken his sword, closed with the Turkish commander, and both falling in the struggle, gave him a mortal wound with a pistol-shot, just as the Turk was raising his dirk to plunge it into his breast. Lieutenant Trippe, of Captain Decatur's squadron, had boarded a third large gunboat, with only one midshipman and nine men, when his boat fell off, and left him to wage the unequal fight of eleven against thirty-six, which was the number of the enemy. Courage and resolution, however, converted this devoted little band into a formidable host, which, after a sanguinary contest, obliged the numerous foe to yield, with the loss of fourteen killed and seven wounded. Lieutenant Trippe received eleven sabre wounds, and had three of his party wounded, but none killed. Several bombardments and attacks succeeded each other at intervals throughout the month. Day after day death and devastation were poured into Tripoli with unsparing perseverance, each attack exhibiting instances of valour and devotedness which will give lustre to history. The eyes of Europe were drawn to the spot where a young nation, scarcely emerged into notice, was signally chastising the despotic and lawless infidel, to whom some of her most powerful governments were then paying tribute.
